This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. APPENDIX

TO THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THIS is the first number of the Appendix to the Congressional Globe for the second session of the Thirty Second Congress. It will contain all the Messages of the President of the United States, the Reports of the Executive Departments, and all the speeches of Members of Congress withheld by them for revision. All the Laws that may be passed during the session will be published in the same form, so that they may be bound up with the Congressional Globe and Appendix.

Subscription price of the Congressional Globe and Appendix and the Laws for this session, (payable in advance,) $3 00.

A sufficient number of copies will be printed to supply all who may subscribe before the 15th of January.

MESSAGE

OF THE

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

The brief space which has elapsed since the close of your last session has been marked by no extraordinary political event. The quadrennial election of Chief Magistrate has passed off with less than the usual excitement. However individuals and parties may have been disappointed in the result, it is nevertheless a subject of national congratulation that the choice has been effected by the independent suffrages of a free people, undisturbed by those influences which in other countries have too often affected the purity of popular elections.

Our grateful thanks are due to an All-merciful Providence, not only for staying the pestilence which in different forms has desolated some of our cities, but for crowning the labors of the husbandman with an abundant harvest, and the nation generally with the blessings of peace and prosperity.

Within a few weeks the public mind has been deeply affected by the death of Daniel Webster, filling at his decease the office of Secretary of State. His associates in the Executive Government have sincerely sympathized with his family and the public generally on this mournful occasion. His commanding talents, his great political and professional eminence, his well-tried patriotism, and his long and faithful services, in the most important public trusts, have caused his death to be lamented throughout the country, and have earned for him a lasting place in our history.

In the course of the last summer considerable anxiety was caused for a short time by an official intimation from the Government of Great Britain that orders had been given for the protection of the fisheries upon the coasts of the British Provinces in North America against the alleged encroachments of the fishing vessels of the United States and France. The shortness of this notice and the season of the year seemed to make it a matter of urgent importance. It was at first apprehended that an increased naval force had been ordered to the fishing grounds to carry into effect the British interpretation of those provisions in the convention of 1818, in reference to the true intent of which the two Governments differ. It was soon discovered that such was not the design of Great Britain, and satisfactory explanations of the real objects of the measure have been given both here and in London.

The unadjusted difference, however, between the two Governments as to the interpretation of the first article of the convention of 1818 is still a matter of importance. American fishing vessels within nine or ten years have been excluded from waters to which they had free access for twenty-five years after the negotiation of the treaty. In 1845 this exclusion was relaxed so far as concerns the Bay of Fundy, but the just and liberal intention of the Home Government, in compliance with what we think the true construction of the convention, to open all the other outer bays to our fishermen, was abandoned, in consequence of the opposition of the colonies. Notwithstanding this, the United States have, since the Bay of Fundy was reopened to our fishermen, in 1845, pursued the most liberal course toward the colonial fishing interests. By the revenue law of 1846, the duties on colonial fish entering our ports were very greatly reduced, and by the warehousing act it is allowed to be entered in bond without payment of duty. In this way colonial fish has acquired the monopoly of the export trade in our market, and is entering to some extent into the home consumption. These facts were among those which increased the sensibility of our fishing interest, at the movement in question.

These circumstances, and the incidents above alluded to, have led me to think the moment favorable for a reconsideration of the entire subject of the fisheries, on the coasts of the British Provinces, with a view to place them upon a more liberal footing of reciprocal privilege. A willingness to meet us in some arrangement of this kind is understood to exist on the part of Great Britain, with a desire on her part to include in one comprehensive settlement, as well this subject as the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British Provinces. I have thought that whatever arrangements may be made on these two subjects, it is expedient that they should be embraced in separate conventions. The illness and death of the late Secretary of State prevented the commencement of the contemplated negotiation. Pains have been taken to collect the information required for the details of such an arrangement. The subject is attended with considerable difficulty. If it is found practicable to come to an agreement mutually acceptable to the two parties, conventions may be concluded in the course of the present winter. The control of Congress over all the provisions of such an arrangement, affecting the revenue, will of course be reserved.

The affairs of Cuba formed a prominent topic in my last annual message. They remain in an uneasy condition, and a feeling of alarm and irritation on the part of the Cuban authorities appears to exist. This feeling has interfered with the regular commercial intercourse between the United States and the Island, and led to some acts of which we have a right to complain. But the Captain General of Cuba is clothed with no power to treat with foreign Governments, nor is he in any degree under the control of the Spanish Minister at Washington. Any communication which he may hold with an agent of a foreign Power is informal and matter of courtesy. Anxious to put an end to the existing inconveniences, (which seemed to rest on a misconception,) I directed the newly-appointed Minister to Mexico to visit Havana, on his way to Vera Cruz. He was respectfully received by the Captain General, who conferred with him freely on the recent occurrences; but no permanent arrangement was effected.

In the mean time, the refusal of the Captain General to allow passengers and the mail to be landed in certain cases, for a reason which does not furnish, in the opinion of this Government even a good presumptive ground for such prohibition, has been made the subject of a serious remonstrance at Madrid; and I have no reason to doubt that due respect will be paid by the Government of her Catholic Majesty to the representations which our Minister has been instructed to make on the subject.

It is but justice to the Captain General to add, that his conduct toward the steamers employed to carry the mails of the United States to Havana has, with the exceptions above alluded to, been marked with kindness and liberality, and indicates no general purpose of interfering with the commercial correspondence and intercourse between the Island and this country.

Early in the present year official notes were received from the Ministers of France and England, inviting the Government of the United States to become a party with Great Britain and France to a tripartite convention, in virtue of which the three Powers should severally and collectively disclaim, now and for the future, all intention to obtain possession of the Island of Cuba, and should bind themselves to discountenance all attempts to that effect on the part of any Power or individual whatever. This invitation has been respectfully declined, for reasons which it would occupy too much space in this communication to state in detail, but which led me to think that the proposed measure would be of doubtful constitutionality, impolitic, and unavailing. I have, however, in common with several of my predecessors, directed the Ministers of France and England to be assured that the United States entertain no designs against Cuba; but that, on the contrary, I should regard its incorporation into the Union at the present time as fraught with serious peril.

Were this Island comparatively destitute of inhabitants, or occupied by a kindred race, I should regard it, if voluntarily ceded by Spain, as a most desirable acquisition. But, under existing circumstances, I should look upon its incorporation into our Union as a very hazardous measure. It would bring into the Confederacy a population of a different national stock, speaking a different language, and not likely to harmonize with the other members. It would probably affect, in a prejudicial manner, the industrial interests of the South; and it might revive those conflicts of opinion between the different sections of the country, which lately shook the Union to its center, and which have been so happily compromised.

The rejection by the Mexican Congress of the convention which had been concluded between that Republic and the United States, for the protection of a transit way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and of the interests of those citizens of the United States who had become proprietors of the rights which Mexico had conferred on one of her own citizens in regard to that transit, has thrown a serious obstacle in the way of the attainment of a very desirable national object. I am still willing to hope that the differences on the subject which exist, or may hereafter arise, between the Governments, will be amicably adjusted. This subject, however, has already engaged the attention of the Senate of the United States, and requires no further comment in this communication.

The settlement of the question respecting the port of San Juan de Nicaragua, and of the controversy between the Republics of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, in regard to their boundaries, was considered indispensable to the commencement of the ship-canal between the two oceans, which was the subject of the convention between the United States and Great Britain of the 19th of April, 1850. Accordingly, a proposition for the same purposes, addressed to the two Governments in that quarter, and to the Mosquito Indians, was agreed to in April last by the Secretary of State and the Minister of her Britannic Majesty. Besides the wish to aid in reconciling the differences of the two Republics, I engaged in the negotiation from a desire to place the great work of a ship-canal between the two oceans under one jurisdiction, and to establish the important port of San Juan de Nicaragua under the government of a civilized Power. The proposition in question was assented to by Costa Rica and the Mosquito Indians. It has not proved equally acceptable to Nicaragua; but it is to be hoped that the further negotiations on the subject which are in train will be carried on in that spirit of conciliation and compromise which ought always to prevail on such occasions, and that they will lead to a satisfactory result.

I have the satisfaction to inform you that the Executive Government of Venezuela has acknowledged some claims of citizens of the United States, which have for many years past been urged by our Chargé d'Affaires at Caraccas. It is hoped that the same sense of justice will actuate the Congress of that Republic in providing the means for their payment.

The recent revolution in Buenos Ayres and the Confederated States having opened the prospect of an improved state of things in that quarter, the Governments of Great Britain and France determined to negotiate with the Chief of the new Confederacy for the free access of their commerce to the extensive countries watered by the tributaries of the La Plata; and they gave a friendly notice of this purpose to the United States, that we might, if we thought proper, pursue the same course. In compliance with this invitation, our Minister at Rio Janeiro and our Chargé d'Affaires at Buenos Ayres have been fully authorized to conclude treaties with the newly-organized Confederation, or the States composing it. The delays which have taken place in the formation of the new Government have as yet prevented the execution of those instructions; but there is every reason to hope that these vast countries will be eventually opened to our commerce.

A treaty of commerce has been concluded between the United States and the Oriental Republic of Uruguay, which will be laid before the Senate. Should this convention go into operation, it will open to the commercial enterprise of our citizens a country of great extent and unsurpassed in natural resources, but from which foreign nations have hitherto been almost wholly excluded.

The correspondence of the late Secretary of State with the Peruvian Chargé d'Affaires relative to the Lobos Islands was communicated to Congress toward the close of the last session. Since that time, on further investigation of the subject, the doubts which had been entertained of the title of Peru to those Islands have been removed; and I have deemed it just that the temporary wrong which had been unintentionally done her, from want of information, should be repaired by an unreserved acknowledgment of her sovereignty.

I have the satisfaction to inform you that the course pursued by Peru has been creditable to the liberality of her Government. Before it was known by her that her title would be acknowledged at Washington, her Minister of Foreign Affairs had authorized our Chargé d'Affaires at Lima to announce to the American vessels which had gone to the Lobos for guano, that the Peruvian Government was willing to freight them on its own account. This intention has been carried into effect by the Peruvian Minister here, by an arrangement which is believed to be advantageous to the parties in interest.

Our settlements on the shores of the Pacific have already given a great extension, and in some respects a new direction, to our commerce in that ocean. A direct and rapidly-increasing intercourse has sprung up with Eastern Asia. The waters of the Northern Pacific, even into the Arctic sea, have of late years been frequented by our whalemen. The application of steam to the general purposes of navigation is becoming daily more common, and makes it desirable to obtain fuel and other necessary supplies at convenient points on the route between Asia and our Pacific shores. Our unfortunate countrymen who from time to time suffer shipwreck on the coasts of the eastern seas are entitled to protection. Besides these specific objects, the general prosperity of our States on the Pacific requires that an attempt should be made to open the opposite regions of Asia to a mutually beneficial intercourse. It is obvious that this attempt could be made by no Power to so great advantage as by the United States, whose constitutional system excludes every idea of distant colonial dependencies. I have accordingly been led to order an appropriate naval force to Japan, under the command of a discreet and intelligent officer of the highest rank known to our service. He is instructed to endeavor to obtain from the Government of that country some relaxation of the inhospitable and anti-social system which it has pursued for about two centuries. He has been directed particularly to remonstrate, in the strongest language, against the cruel treatment to which our shipwrecked mariners have often been subjected, and to insist that they shall be treated with humanity. He is instructed, however, at the same time, to give that Government the amplest assurances that the objects of the United States are such, and such only, as I have indicated, and that the expedition is friendly and peaceful. Notwithstanding the jealousy with which the Governments of Eastern Asia regard all overtures from foreigners, I am not without hopes of a beneficial result of the expedition. Should it be crowned with success, the advantages will not be confined to the United States, but, as in the case of China, will be equally enjoyed by all the other maritime Powers. I have much satisfaction in stating that in all the steps preparatory to this expedition, the Government of the United States has been materially aided by the good offices of the King of the Netherlands, the only European Power having any commercial relations with Japan.

In passing from this survey of our foreign relations, I invite the attention of Congress to the condition of that department of the Government to which this branch of the public business is intrusted. Our intercourse with foreign Powers has of late years greatly increased, both in consequence of our own growth and the introduction of many new States into the family of nations. In this way the Department of State has become overburdened. It has, by the recent establishment of the Department of the Interior, been relieved of some portion of the domestic business. If the residue of the business of that kind, such as the distribution of Congressional documents, the keeping, publishing, and distribution of the laws of the United States, the execution of the copyright law, the subject of reprieves and pardons, and some other subjects relating to interior administration, should be transferred from the Department of State, it would unquestionably be for the benefit of the public service. I would also suggest that the building appropriated to the State Department is not fire-proof; that there is reason to think there are defects in its construction, and that the archives of the Government in charge of the Department, with the precious collections of the manuscript papers of Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, Madison, and Monroe, are exposed to destruction by fire. A similar remark may be made of the buildings appropriated to the War and Navy Departments.

The condition of the Treasury is exhibited in the annual report from that Department.

The cash receipts into the Treasury for the fiscal year ending the 30th June last, exclusive of trust funds, were forty-nine millions seven hundred and twenty-eight thousand three hundred and eighty-six dollars and eighty-nine cents, ($49,728,386 89,) and the expenditures for the same period, likewise exclusive of trust funds, were forty-six millions seven thousand eight hundred and ninety-six dollars and twenty cents, ($46,007.896 20;) of which nine millions four hundred and fifty-five thousand eight hundred and fifteen dollars and eighty-three cents ($9,455,815 83) was on account of the principal and interest of the public debt, including the last installment of the indemnity to Mexico, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, leaving a balance of $14,633,136 37 in the Treasury on the first day of July last. Since this latter period, further purchases of the principal of the public debt have been made to the extent of two millions four hundred and fifty-six thousand five hundred and forty-seven dollars and forty-nine cents, ($2,456,547 49,) and the surplus in the Treasury will continue to be applied to that object, whenever the stock can be procured within the limits, as to price, authorized by law.

The value of foreign merchandise imported during the last fiscal year was two hundred and seven millions two hundred and forty thousand one hundred and one dollars, ($207,240,101;) and the value of domestic productions exported was one hundred and forty-nine millions eight hundred and sixty-one thousand nine hundred and eleven dollars, ($149,861,911,) besides seventeen millions two hundred and four thousand and twenty-six dollars ($17,204,026) of foreign merchandise exported; making the aggregate of the entire exports one hundred and sixty-seven millions sixty-five thousand nine hundred and thirty-seven dollars, ($167,065,937;) exclusive of the above there was exported forty-two millions five hundred and seven thousand two hundred and eighty-five dollars ($42,507,285) in specie; and imported from foreign ports five millions two hundred and sixty-two thousand six hundred and forty-three dollars, ($5,262,643.)

In my first annual message to Congress I called your attention to what seemed to me some defects in the present tariff, and recommended such modifications as in my judgment were best adapted to remedy its evils and promote the prosperity of the country. Nothing has since occurred to change my views on this important question.

Without repeating the arguments contained in my former message, in favor of discriminating, protective duties, I deem it my duty to call your attention to one or two other considerations affecting this subject. The first is, the effect of large importations of foreign goods upon our currency. Most of the gold of California, as fast as it is coined, finds its way directly to Europe, in payment for goods purchased. In the second place, as our manufacturing establishments are broken down by competition with foreigners, the capital invested in them is lost, thousands of honest and industrious citizens are thrown out of employment, and the farmer to that extent is deprived of a home market for the sale of his surplus produce. In the third place, the destruction of our manufactures leaves the foreigner without competition in our market, and he consequently raises the price of the article sent here for sale, as is now seen in the increased cost of iron imported from England. The prosperity and wealth of every nation must depend upon its productive industry. The farmer is stimulated to exertion by finding a ready market for his surplus products, and benefited by being able to exchange them, without loss of time or expense of transportation, for the manufactures which his comfort or convenience requires. This is always done to the best advantage where a portion of the community in which he lives is engaged in other pursuits. But most manufactures require an amount of capital, and a practical skill, which cannot be commanded, unless they be protected for a time from ruinous competition from abroad. Hence the necessity of laying those duties upon imported goods which the Constitution authorizes for revenue, in such a manner as to protect and encourage the labor of our own citizens. Duties, however, should not be fixed at a rate so high as to exclude the foreign article, but should be so graduated as to enable the domestic manufacturer fairly to compete with the foreigner in our own markets; and by this competition to reduce the price of the manufactured article to the consumer to the lowest rate at which it can be produced. This policy would place the mechanic by the side of the farmer, create a mutual interchange of their respective commodities, and thus stimulate the industry of the whole country, and render us independent of foreign nations for the supplies required by the habits or necessities of the people.

Another question, wholly independent of protection, presents itself; and that is, whether the duties levied should be upon the value of the article at the place of shipment, or, where it is practicable, a specific duty, graduated according to quantity, as ascertained by weight or measure. All our duties are at present ad valorem. A certain per centage is levied on the price of the goods at the port of shipment in a foreign country. Most commercial nations have found it indispensable, for the purpose of preventing fraud and perjury, to make the duties specific whenever the article is of such a uniform value in weight or measure as to justify such a duty. Legislation should never encourage dishonesty, or crime. It is impossible that the revenue officers at the port where the goods are entered and the duties paid, should know with certainty what they cost in the foreign country. Yet the law requires that they should levy the duty according to such cost. They are therefore compelled to resort to very unsatisfactory evidence to ascertain what that cost was. They take the invoice of the importer, attested by his oath, as the best evidence of which the nature of the case admits. But every one must see that the invoice may be fabricated, and the oath by which it is supported false, by reason of which the dishonest importer pays a part only of the duties which are paid by the honest one, and thus indirectly receives from the Treasury of the United States a reward for his fraud and perjury. The reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, heretofore made on this subject, show conclusively that these frauds have been practiced to a great extent. The tendency is to destroy that high moral character for which our merchants have long been distinguished; to defraud the Government of its revenue; to break down the honest importer by a dishonest competition; and, finally, to transfer the business of importation to foreign and irresponsible agents, to the great detriment of our own citizens. I therefore again most earnestly recommend the adoption of specific duties, wherever it is practicable, or a home valuation, to prevent these frauds.

I would also again call your attention to the fact that the present tariff in some cases imposes a higher duty upon the raw material imported, than upon the article manufactured from it; the consequence of which is, that the duty operates to the encouragement of the foreigner and the discouragement of our own citizens.

For full and detailed information in regard to the general condition of our Indian affairs, I respectfully refer you to the report of the Secretary of the Interior and the accompanying documents.

The Senate not having thought proper to ratify the treaties which had been negotiated with the tribes of Indians in California and Oregon, our relations with them have been left in a very unsatisfactory condition.

In other parts of our territory particular districts of country have been set apart for the exclusive occupation of the Indians, and their right to the lands within those limits has been acknowledged and respected. But in California and Oregon there has been no recognition by the Government of the exclusive right of the Indians to any part of the country. They are therefore mere tenants at sufferance, and liable to be driven from place to place, at the pleasure of the whites.

The treaties which have been rejected proposed to remedy this evil by allotting to the different tribes districts of country suitable to their habits of life, and sufficient for their support. This provision, more than any other, it is believed, led to their rejection; and as no substitute for it has been adopted by Congress, it has not been deemed advisable to attempt to enter into new treaties of a permanent character, although no effort has been spared by temporary arrangements to preserve friendly relations with them.

If it be the desire of Congress to remove them from the country altogether, or to assign to them particular districts more remote from the settlements of the whites, it will be proper to set apart by law the territory which they are to occupy, and to provide the means necessary for removing them to it. Justice alike to our own citizens and to the Indians requires the prompt action of Congress on this subject.

The amendments proposed by the Senate, to the treaties which were negotiated with the Sioux Indians of Minnesota, have been submitted to the tribes who were parties to them, and have received their assent. A large tract of valuable territory has thus been opened for settlement and cultivation, and all danger of collision with these powerful and warlike bands has been happily removed.

The removal of the remnant of the tribe of Seminole Indians from Florida has long been a cherished object of the Government, and it is one to which my attention has been steadily directed. Admonished by past experience of the difficulty and cost of the attempt to remove them by military force, resort has been had to conciliatory measures. By the invitation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs several of the principal chiefs recently visited Washington, and whilst here acknowledged, in writing, the obligation of their tribe to remove with the least possible delay. Late advices from the special agent of the Government represent that they adhere to their promise, and that a council of their people has been called to make their preliminary arrangements. A general emigration may therefore be confidently expected at an early day.

The report from the General Land Office shows increased activity in its operations. The survey of the northern boundary of Iowa has been completed with unexampled dispatch. Within the last year 9,822,953 acres of public land have been surveyed, and 5,032,463 acres brought into market.

In the last fiscal year there were sold	1,553,071	acres.
Located with bounty land warrants	3,201,314	"
Located with other certificates	115,682	"
Making a total of	4,870,067	"
In addition, there were—
Reported under swamp land grants	5,219,188	"
For internal improvements, railroads, &c.	3,025,920	"
Making an aggregate of	13,115,175	"

Being an increase in the amount of lands sold and located under land warrants of 569,220 acres over the previous year.

The whole amount thus sold, located under land warrants, reported under swamp land grants, and selected for internal improvements, exceeds that of the previous year by 3,342,372 acres; and the sales would, without doubt, have been much larger but for the extensive reservations for railroads in Missouri, Mississippi, and Alabama.

For the quarter ending 30th September, 1852, there were sold	243,255	acres.
Located with bounty land warrants	1,387,116	"
Located with other certificates	15,649	"
Reported under swamp land grants	2,485,233	"
Making an aggregate for the quarter of	4,131,253	"

Much the larger portion of the labor of arranging and classifying the returns of the last census has been finished, and it will now devolve upon Congress to make the necessary provision for the publication of the results in such form as shall be deemed best. The apportionment of representation, on the basis of the new census, has been made by the Secretary of the Interior, in conformity with the provisions of law relating to that subject, and the recent elections have been made in accordance with it.

I commend to your favorable regard the suggestion contained in the report of the Secretary of the Interior, that provision be made by law for the publication and distribution, periodically, of an analytical digest of all the patents which have been, or may hereafter be, granted for useful inventions and discoveries, with such descriptions and illustrations as may be necessary to present an intelligible view of their nature and operation. The cost of such publication could easily be defrayed out of the patent fund; and I am persuaded that it could be applied to no object more acceptable to inventors, and beneficial to the public at large.

An appropriation of $100,000 having been made at the last session for the purchase of a suitable site, and for the erection, furnishing, and fitting up of an Asylum for the Insane of the District of Columbia, and of the Army and Navy of the United States, the proper measures have been adopted to carry this beneficent purpose into effect.

By the latest advices from the Mexican Boundary Commission, it appears that the survey of the river Gila, from its confluence with the Colorado to its supposed intersection with the western line of New Mexico, has been completed. The survey of the Rio Grande has also been finished from the point agreed on by the Commissioners as "the point where it strikes the southern boundary of New Mexico" to a point one hundred and thirty-five miles below Eagle Pass, which is about two thirds of the distance along the course of the river to its mouth.

The appropriation which was made at the last session of Congress for the continuation of the survey is subject to the following proviso:

"Provided, That no part of this appropriation 'shall be used or expended until it shall be made 'satisfactorily to appear to the President of the 'United States that the southern boundary of New 'Mexico is not established by the commissioner 'and surveyor of the United States further north 'of the town called 'Paso' than the same is laid 'down in Disturnell's map, which is added to the 'treaty."

My attention was drawn to this subject by a report from the Department of the Interior, which reviewed all the facts of the case, and submitted for my decision the question whether, under existing circumstances, any part of the appropriation could be lawfully used or expended for the further prosecution of the work. After a careful consideration of the subject, I came to the conclusion that it could not, and so informed the head of that Department. Orders were immediately issued by him to the commissioner and surveyor to make no further requisitions on the Department, as they could not be paid, and to discontinue all operations on the southern line of New Mexico. But as the Department had no exact information as to the amount of provisions and money which remained unexpended in the hands of the commissioner and surveyor, it was left discretionary with them to continue the survey down the Rio Grande as far as the means at their disposal would enable them, or at once to disband the Commission. A special messenger has since arrived from the officer in charge of the survey on the river, with information that the funds subject to his control were exhausted, and that the officers and others employed in the service were destitute alike of the means of prosecuting the work and of returning to their homes.

The object of the proviso was doubtless to arrest the survey of the southern and western lines of New Mexico, in regard to which different opinions have been expressed; for it is hardly to be supposed that there could be any objection to that part of the line which extends along the channel of the Rio Grande. But the terms of the law are so broad as to forbid the use of any part of the money for the prosecution of the work, or even for the payment, to the officers and agents, of the arrearages of pay which are justly due to them.

I earnestly invite your prompt attention to this subject, and recommend a modification of the terms of the proviso, so as to enable the Department to use as much of the appropriation as will be necessary to discharge the existing obligations of the Government, and to complete the survey of the Rio Grande to its mouth.

It will also be proper to make further provision by law for the fulfillment of our treaty with Mexico, for running and marking the residue of the boundary line between the two countries.

Permit me to invite your particular attention to the interests of the District of Columbia, which are confided by the Constitution to your peculiar care.

Among the measures which seem to me of the greatest importance to its prosperity, are the introduction of a copious supply of water into the city of Washington, and the construction of suitable bridges across the Potomac, to replace those which were destroyed by high water in the early part of the present year.

At the last session of Congress an appropriation was made to defray the cost of the surveys necessary for determining the best means of affording an unfailing supply of good and wholesome water. Some progress has been made in the survey, and as soon as it is completed the result will be laid before you.

Further appropriations will also be necessary for grading and paving the streets and avenues, and inclosing and embellishing the public grounds within the city of Washington.

I commend all these objects, together with the charitable institutions of the District, to your favorable regard.

Every effort has been made to protect our frontier, and that of the adjoining Mexican States, from the incursions of the Indian tribes. Of about eleven thousand men of which the Army is composed, nearly eight thousand are employed in the defense of the newly-acquired territory, (including Texas,) and of emigrants proceeding thereto. I am gratified to say that these efforts have been unusually successful. With the exception of some partial outbreaks in California and Oregon, and occasional depredations on a portion of the Rio Grande, owing, it is believed, to the disturbed state of that border region, the inroads of the Indians have been effectually restrained.

Experience has shown, however, that whenever the two races are brought into contact, collisions will inevitably occur. To prevent these collisions the United States have generally set apart portions of their territory for the exclusive occupation of the Indian tribes. A difficulty occurs, however, in the application of this policy to Texas. By the terms of the compact by which that State was admitted into the Union, she retained the ownership of all the vacant lands within her limits. The government of that State, it is understood, has assigned no portion of her territory to the Indians; but as fast as her settlements advance lays it off into counties, and proceeds to survey and sell it. This policy manifestly tends, not only to alarm and irritate the Indians, but to compel them to resort to plunder for subsistence. It also deprives this Government of that influence and control over them without which no durable peace can ever exist between them and the whites. I trust, therefore, that a due regard for her own interests, apart from considerations of humanity and justice, will induce that State to assign a small portion of her vast domain for the provisional occupancy of the small remnants of tribes within her borders, subject of course to her ownership and eventual jurisdiction. If she should fail to do this, the fulfillment of our treaty stipulations with Mexico, and our duty to the Indians themselves, will, it is feared, become a subject of serious embarrassment to the Government. It is hoped, however, that a timely and just provision by Texas may avert this evil.

No appropriations for fortifications were made at the last two sessions of Congress. The cause of this omission is, probably, to be found in a growing belief that the system of fortifications adopted in 1816, and heretofore acted on, requires revision.

The subject certainly deserves full and careful investigation; but it should not be delayed longer than can be avoided. In the mean time there are certain works which have been commenced—some of them nearly completed—designed to protect our principal sea-ports, from Boston to New Orleans, and a few other important points. In regard to the necessity for these works, it is believed that little difference of opinion exists among military men. I therefore recommend that the appropriations necessary to prosecute them be made.

I invite your attention to the remarks on this subject, and on others connected with his Department, contained in the accompanying report of the Secretary of War.

Measures have been taken to carry into effect the law of the last session making provision for the improvement of certain rivers and harbors, and it is believed that the arrangements made for that purpose will combine efficiency with economy. Owing chiefly to the advanced season when the act was passed, little has yet been done in regard to many of the works beyond making the necessary preparations. With respect to a few of the improvements, the sums already appropriated will suffice to complete them, but most of them will require additional appropriations. I trust that these appropriations will be made, and that this wise and beneficent policy, so auspiciously resumed, will be continued. Great care should be taken, however, to commence no work which is not of sufficient importance to the commerce of the country to be viewed as national in its character. But works which have been commenced should not be discontinued until completed, as otherwise the sums expended will, in most cases, be lost.

The report from the Navy Department will inform you of the prosperous condition of the branch of the public service committed to its charge. It presents to your consideration many topics and suggestions of which I ask your approval. It exhibits an unusual degree of activity in the operations of the Department during the past year. The preparations for the Japan expedition, to which I have already alluded; the arrangements made for the exploration and survey of the China Seas, the Northern Pacific, and Behring's Straits; the incipient measures taken towards a reconnoissance of the Continent of Africa eastward of Liberia; the preparation for an early examination of the tributaries of the river La Plata, which a recent decree of the Provisional Chief of the Argentine Confederation has opened to navigation; all these enterprises, and the means by which they are proposed to be accomplished, have commanded my full approbation, and I have no doubt will be productive of most useful results.

Two officers of the Navy were heretofore instructed to explore the whole extent of the Amazon river, from the confines of Peru to its mouth. The return of one of them has placed in the possession of the Government an interesting and valuable account of the character and resources of a country abounding in the materials of commerce, and which, if opened to the industry of the world, will prove an inexhaustible fund of wealth. The report of this exploration will be communicated to you as soon as it is completed.

Among other subjects offered to your notice by the Secretary of the Navy, I select for special commendation, in view of its connection with the interests of the Navy, the plan submitted by him for the establishment of a permanent corps of seamen, and the suggestions he has presented for the reorganization of the Naval Academy.

In reference to the first of these, I take occasion to say that I think it will greatly improve the efficiency of the service, and that I regard it as still more entitled to favor for the salutary influence it must exert upon the naval discipline, now greatly disturbed by the increasing spirit of insubordination, resulting from our present system. The plan proposed for the organization of the seamen furnishes a judicious substitute for the law of September, 1850, abolishing corporal punishment, and satisfactorily sustains the policy of that act, under conditions well adapted to maintain the authority of command and the order and security of our ships. It is believed that any change which proposes permanently to dispense with this mode of punishment, should be preceded by a system of enlistment which shall supply the Navy with seamen of the most meritorious class, whose good deportment and pride of character may preclude all occasion for a resort to penalties of a harsh or degrading nature. The safety of a ship and her crew is often dependent upon immediate obedience to a command, and the authority to enforce it must be equally ready. The arrest of a refractory seaman, in such moments, not only deprives the ship of indispensable aid, but imposes a necessity for double service on others whose fidelity to their duties may be relied upon in such an emergency. The exposure to this increased and arduous labor, since the passage of the act of 1850, has already had, to a most observable and injurious extent, the effect of preventing the enlistment of the best seamen in the Navy. The plan now suggested is designed to promote a condition of service in which this objection will no longer exist. The details of this plan may be established in great part, if not altogether, by the Executive, under the authority of existing laws; but I have thought it proper, in accordance with the suggestion of the Secretary of the Navy, to submit it to your approval.

The establishment of a corps of apprentices for the Navy, or boys to be enlisted until they become of age, and to be employed under such regulations as the Navy Department may devise, as proposed in the report, I cordially approve and commend to your consideration; and I also concur in the suggestion that this system for the early training of seamen may be most usefully ingrafted upon the service of our merchant-marine.

The other proposition of the report to which I have referred—the reorganization of the Naval Academy—I recommend to your attention as a project worthy of your encouragement and support. The valuable services already rendered by this institution entitle it to the continuance of your fostering care.

Your attention is respectfully called to the report of the Postmaster General for the detailed operation of his Department during the last fiscal year, from which it will be seen that the receipts from postages for that time were less by $1,431,696 than for the preceding fiscal year, being a decrease of about 23 per cent.

This diminution is attributable to the reduction in the rates of postage made by the act of March 3, 1851, which reduction took effect at the commencement of the last fiscal year.

Although in its operation during the last year the act referred to has not fulfilled the predictions of its friends by increasing the correspondence of the country in proportion to the reduction of postage, I should nevertheless question the policy of returning to higher rates. Experience warrants the expectation that as the community becomes accustomed to cheap postage, correspondence will increase. It is believed that from this cause, and from the rapid growth of the country in population and business, the receipts of the Department must ultimately exceed its expenses, and that the country may safely rely upon the continuance of the present cheap rate of postage.

In former messages I have, among other things, respectfully recommended to the consideration of Congress the propriety and necessity of further legislation for the protection and punishment of foreign consuls residing in the United States; to revive with certain modifications the act of 10th March, 1838, to restrain unlawful military expeditions against the inhabitants of conterminous States or Territories; for the preservation and protection from mutilation or theft of the papers, records, and archives of the nation; for authorizing the surplus revenue to be applied to the payment of the public debt in advance of the time when it will become due; for the establishment of land offices for the sale of the public lands in California and the Territory of Oregon; for the construction of a road from the Mississippi valley to the Pacific ocean; for the establishment of a Bureau of Agriculture for the promotion of that interest, perhaps the most important in the country; for the prevention of frauds upon the Government in applications for pensions and bounty lands; for the establishment of a uniform fee bill, prescribing a specific compensation for every service required of clerks, district attorneys, and marshals; for authorizing an additional regiment of mounted men, for the defense of our frontiers against the Indians, and for fulfilling our treaty stipulations with Mexico to defend her citizens against the Indians "with equal diligence and energy as our own;" for determining the relative rank between the naval and civil officers in our public ships, and between the officers of the Army and Navy in the various grades of each; for reorganizing the naval establishment by fixing the number of officers in each grade, and providing for a retired list upon reduced pay of those unfit for active duty; for prescribing and regulating punishments in the Navy; for the appointment of a commission to revise the public statutes of the United States, by arranging them in order, supplying deficiencies, correcting incongruities, simplifying their language, and reporting them to Congress for its final action; and for the establishment of a commission to adjudicate and settle private claims against the United States. I am not aware, however, that any of these subjects have been finally acted upon by Congress. Without repeating the reasons for legislation on these subjects which have been assigned in former messages, I respectfully recommend them again to your favorable consideration.

I think it due to the several Executive Departments of this Government, to bear testimony to the efficiency and integrity with which they are conducted. With all the careful superintendence which it is possible for the heads of those Departments to exercise, still the due administration and guardianship of the public money must very much depend on the vigilance, intelligence, and fidelity of the subordinate officers and clerks, and especially on those intrusted with the settlement and adjustment of claims and accounts. I am gratified to believe that they have generally performed their duties faithfully and well. They are appointed to guard the approaches to the public Treasury, and they occupy positions that expose them to all the temptations and seductions which the cupidity of peculators and fraudulent claimants can prompt them to employ. It will be but a wise precaution to protect the Government against that source of mischief and corruption, as far as it can be done, by the enactment of all proper legal penalties. The laws, in this respect, are supposed to be defective, and I therefore deem it my duty to call your attention to the subject, and to recommend that provision be made by law for the punishment not only of those who shall accept bribes, but also of those who shall either promise, give, or offer to give to any of those officers or clerks a bribe or reward touching or relating to any matter of their official action or duty.

It has been the uniform policy of this Government, from its foundation to the present day, to abstain from all interference in the domestic affairs of other nations. The consequence has been, that while the nations of Europe have been engaged in desolating wars, our country has pursued its peaceful course to unexampled prosperity and happiness. The wars in which we have been compelled to engage, in defense of the rights and honor of the country, have been fortunately of short duration. During the terrific contest of nation against nation, which succeeded the French Revolution, we were enabled, by the wisdom and firmness of President Washington, to maintain our neutrality. While other nations were drawn into this wide sweeping whirlpool, we sat quiet and unmoved upon our own shores. While the flower of their numerous armies was wasted by disease, or perished by hundreds of thousands upon the battle-field, the youth of this favored land were permitted to enjoy the blessings of peace beneath the paternal roof. While the States of Europe incurred enormous debts, under the burden of which their subjects still groan, and which must absorb no small part of the product of the honest industry of those countries for generations to come, the United States have once been enabled to exhibit the proud spectacle of a nation free from public debt; and, if permitted to pursue our prosperous way for a few years longer in peace, we may do the same again.

But it is now said by some that this policy must be changed. Europe is no longer separated from us by a voyage of months, but steam navigation has brought her within a few days' sail of our shores. We see more of her movements, and take a deeper interest in her controversies. Although no one proposes that we should join the fraternity of potentates who have for ages lavished the blood and treasure of their subjects in maintaining "the balance of power," yet it is said that we ought to interfere between contending sovereigns and their subjects, for the purpose of overthrowing the monarchies of Europe and establishing in their place republican institutions. It is alleged that we have heretofore pursued a different course from a sense of our weakness, but that now our conscious strength dictates a change of policy, and that it is consequently our duty to mingle in these contests and aid those who are struggling for liberty.

This is a most seductive but dangerous appeal to the generous sympathies of freemen. Enjoying as we do the blessings of a free Government, there is no man who has an American heart that would not rejoice to see these blessings extended to all other nations. We cannot witness the struggle between the oppressed and his oppressor any where without the deepest sympathy for the former, and the most anxious desire for his triumph. Nevertheless, is it prudent or is it wise to involve ourselves in these foreign wars? Is it indeed true that we have heretofore refrained from doing so merely from the degrading motive of a conscious weakness? For the honor of the patriots who have gone before us, I cannot admit it. Men of the Revolution who drew the sword against the oppressions of the mother country, and pledged to Heaven "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor" to maintain their freedom, could never have been actuated by so unworthy a motive. They knew no weakness or fear where right or duty pointed the way, and it is a libel upon their fair fame for us, while we enjoy the blessings for which they so nobly fought and bled, to insinuate it. The truth is, that the course which they pursued was dictated by a stern sense of international justice; by a statesman-like prudence and a far-seeing wisdom, looking not merely to the present necessities, but to the permanent safety and interest of the country. They knew that the world is governed less by sympathy than by reason and force; that it was not possible for this nation to become a "propagandist" of free principles without arraying against it the combined Powers of Europe; and that the result was more likely to be the overthrow of republican liberty here than its establishment there. History has been written in vain for those who can doubt this. France had no sooner established a republican form of government than she manifested a desire to force its blessings on all the world. Her own historian informs us that, hearing of some petty acts of tyranny in a neighboring principality, "The National Convention declared that she 'would afford succor and fraternity to all nations 'who wished to recover their liberty; and she 'gave it in charge of the executive power to give 'orders to the generals of the French armies to aid 'all citizens who might have been or should be 'oppressed in the cause of liberty." Here was the false step which led to her subsequent misfortunes. She soon found herself involved in war with all the rest of Europe. In less than ten years her government was changed from a Republic to an Empire; and finally, after shedding rivers of blood, foreign Powers restored her exiled dynasty, and exhausted Europe sought peace and repose in the unquestioned ascendency of monarchial principles. Let us learn wisdom from her example. Let us remember that revolutions do not always establish freedom. Our own free institutions were not the offspring of our Revolution. They existed before. They were planted in the free charters of self-government under which the English colonies grew up, and our Revolution only freed us from the dominion of a foreign Power, whose government was at variance with those institutions. But European nations have had no such training for self-government, and every effort to establish it by bloody revolutions has been, and must, without that preparation, continue to be a failure. Liberty, unregulated by law, degenerates into anarchy, which soon becomes the most horrid of all despotisms. Our policy is wisely to govern ourselves, and thereby to set such an example of national justice, prosperity, and true glory, as shall teach to all nations the blessings of self-government, and the unparalleled enterprise and success of a free people.

We live in an age of progress, and ours is emphatically a country of progress. Within the last half-century the number of States in this Union has nearly doubled, the population has almost quadrupled, and our boundaries have been extended from the Mississippi to the Pacific. Our territory is chequered over with railroads, and furrowed with canals. The inventive talent of our country is excited to the highest pitch, and the numerous applications for patents for valuable improvements distinguish this age and this people from all others. The genius of one American has enabled our commerce to move against wind and tide, and that of another has annihilated distance in the transmission of intelligence. The whole country is full of enterprise. Our common schools are diffusing intelligence among the people, and our industry is fast accumulating the comforts and luxuries of life. This is in part owing to our peculiar position, to our fertile soil, and comparatively sparse population; but much of it is also owing to the popular institutions under which we live, to the freedom which every man feels to engage in any useful pursuit, according to his taste or inclination, and to the entire confidence that his person and property will be protected by the laws. But whatever may be the cause of this unparalleled growth in population, intelligence, and wealth, one thing is clear, that the Government must keep pace with the progress of the people. It must participate in their spirit of enterprise, and while it exacts obedience to the laws, and restrains all unauthorized invasions of the rights of neighboring States, it should foster and protect home industry, and lend its powerful strength to the improvement of such means of intercommunication as are necessary to promote our internal commerce and strengthen the ties which bind us together as a people.

It is not strange, however much it may be regretted, that such an exuberance of enterprise should cause some individuals to mistake change for progress, and the invasion of the rights of others for national prowess and glory. The former are constantly agitating for some change in the organic law, or urging new and untried theories of human rights. The latter are ever ready to engage in any wild crusade against a neighboring people, regardless of the justice of the enterprise, and without looking at the fatal consequences to ourselves and to the cause of popular government. Such expeditions, however, are often stimulated by mercenary individuals, who expect to share the plunder or profit of the enterprise without exposing themselves to danger, and are led on by some irresponsible foreigner, who abuses the hospitality of our own Government by seducing the young and ignorant to join in his scheme of personal ambition or revenge, under the false and delusive pretense of extending the area of freedom. These reprehensible aggressions but retard the true progress of our nation and tarnish its fair fame. They should, therefore, receive the indignant frowns of every good citizen who sincerely loves his country and takes a pride in its prosperity and honor.

Our Constitution, though not perfect, is doubtless the best that ever was formed. Therefore, let every proposition to change it be well weighed, and if found beneficial, cautiously adopted. Every patriot will rejoice to see its authority so exerted as to advance the prosperity and honor of the nation, whilst he will watch with jealousy any attempt to mutilate this charter of our liberties, or pervert its powers to acts of aggression or injustice. Thus shall conservatism and progress blend their harmonious action in preserving the form and spirit of the Constitution, and at the same time carry forward the great improvements of the country with a rapidity and energy which freemen only can display.

In closing this, my last annual communication, permit me, fellow-citizens, to congratulate you on the prosperous condition of our beloved country. Abroad its relations with all foreign Powers are friendly; its rights are respected, and its high place in the family of nations cheerfully recognized. At home we enjoy an amount of happiness, public and private, which has probably never fallen to the lot of any other people. Besides affording to our own citizens a degree of prosperity, of which on so large a scale I know of no other instance, our country is annually affording a refuge and a home to multitudes, altogether without example, from the Old World.

We owe these blessings, under Heaven, to the happy Constitution and Government which were bequeathed to us by our fathers, and which it is our sacred duty to transmit in all their integrity to our children. We must all consider it a great distinction and privilege to have been chosen by the people to bear a part in the administration of such a Government. Called by an unexpected dispensation to its highest trust, at a season of embarrassment and alarm, I entered upon its arduous duties with extreme diffidence. I claim only to have discharged them to the best of an humble ability, with a single eye to the public good; and it is with devout gratitude, in retiring from office, that I leave the country in a state of peace and prosperity.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

WASHINGTON, December 6, 1852.

Report of the Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, December 4, 1852.

SIR: I beg leave to submit a brief account of the operations of this Department during the year.

The efforts of the Department have been principally directed to the defense of our frontiers and those of Mexico from the Indian tribes within our borders. For this purpose, out of about 11,000 officers and men borne on the rolls of the Army, about 8,000 are employed in the defense of Texas, New Mexico, California, and Oregon, or of emigrants destined to the last two.

It affords me great pleasure to say that the efforts of the Department for this purpose have been attended with more than usual success.

The benefits that were anticipated from the judicious arrangements made by the commanders of the 8th and 9th military departments (Texas and

New Mexico) have been fully realized. With the exception of a portion of the Rio Grande country, the former has been comparatively exempt from Indian depredations. A number of persons of desperate character and fortunes were attracted to that frontier by the lawless attempts of Carvajal, and after his defeat they dispersed through the country, and resorted to plunder for subsistence. On the other hand, many of the inhabitants of Mexico either sought to avenge themselves for the wrongs inflicted on them by that adventurer and his followers, or found in his lawless proceedings a justification for their own, and retaliated on the peaceable inhabitants.

The Indians in that vicinity availed themselves of the confusion and alarm consequent upon this state of things to renew their depredations. Thefts, robberies, and even assassinations were the consequence.

Although the prevention or punishment of disorders like these, when committed by others than Indians, belongs rather to the civil authorities of the State than to the military force of the United States, the commanding officer used every exertion to put a stop to them, and for that purpose ordered several additional companies of troops to the part of the State where they had occurred. It is believed that these measures have been, at least partially, successful. So long, however, as the species of border warfare which has lately been carried on in that region between the inhabitants of the two countries continues, it will be difficult, if not impossible, with any number of troops, and with the strictest vigilance on the part of their officers, to prevent, on so extensive a frontier, a repetition of these disorders.

In New Mexico, the depredations of the Indians have been entirely arrested. The Navajos and the Apaches, the two most formidable tribes in all that region, have been completely overawed, and manifest every desire to be at peace with the whites.

In consequence of frequent collisions between the Indians and the white inhabitants of California and Oregon, it was deemed advisable to send the fourth regiment of infantry to the Pacific, to replace the mounted riflemen that had been ordered thence to Texas.

Intelligence has been recently received that the Yuma Indians, a bold and hostile tribe, occupying a portion of country on the Gila and Colorado rivers, whose inroads and depredations have been the source of frequent annoyance and alarm to the inhabitants both of our own territory and of the Mexican State of Sonora, have agreed to a peace.

The troops stationed on the frontier may justly be considered as in active service—a service, too, in which they are exposed to all the hardships and dangers of war without its excitement to stimulate or its hopes of honorable distinction to sustain them.

Owing to the many officers who, from disability or other causes, are excused from duty, the cares and responsibilities of command frequently devolve on a small number; and the establishment, during the last season, of a number of new posts, has added very much to the labors both of the officers and men; nevertheless, it affords me great pleasure to bear testimony to the cheerfulness and alacrity with which all have discharged their duties. To Brevet Major General Smith and Brevet Colonel Sumner, in particular, much praise is due. The former, although in feeble health, has been unremitting in his exertions; and to his energy and judicious arrangements his department is greatly indebted for the comparative tranquillity it enjoys. The latter has not only succeeded in arresting the incursions of the Indians within his command, but has greatly reduced its expenditures.

Brevet Brigadier General Hitchcock has also displayed great energy and prudence, and done all that it was possible to do with a very inadequate force, and amid many difficulties and embarrassments, to protect his extensive command.

I regret to say that the attempt to cultivate farms by the troops has, but in few instances, during the past season, been attended with beneficial results. This failure is owing in part to the constant activity in which it has been found necessary to keep the troops, and to the necessity of employing them in the construction of barracks and in other works at the many new posts that have recently been established. Hopes are entertained, however, that when a fair trial of the experiment can be made, it will, at least at such of the posts as are favorably situated for the purpose, be more successful.

In spite of this failure, of the unusual activity of the troops during the past season, and of the fact that so large a portion of them are stationed on the remote frontier, I have the satisfaction to announce that the expenditures have been considerably reduced, and this, too, in the Quartermaster's Department—that branch of the service of which the expenditures are most affected by these circumstances. The expenses of that department, ascertained and estimated, (exclusive of clothing, the amount of which is fixed by permanent regulations,) continue to exhibit an annual decrease, viz: for the current year, as compared with the last year, a reduction of $501,252, and for the next year, as compared with the current year, a further reduction of $500,000.

In spite, however, of every effort to reduce the expenses of the Army, they must continue to be very great in proportion to its numbers, so long as it is necessary to maintain so large a force in countries which supply so little of what is necessary to its support as those in which the greater part of it is now stationed. I beg leave, therefore, to repeat the suggestion contained in my last annual report, that sound policy, no less than humanity, requires that some other means than force should be tried to restrain the Indians and to prevent the frequent collisions that occur between them and the white inhabitants in their neighborhood. The whole history of our country shows that whenever the two races are brought frequently into contact, collisions (generally produced by aggressions of the stronger on the weaker party) are inevitable. I know of no other means by which those collisions can be prevented than a rigid adherence to the policy which has heretofore been successfully pursued, of setting apart a portion of territory for the exclusive occupancy of the Indians.

A difficulty occurs in the application of this policy to Texas. By the terms of the compact admitting that State into the Union she reserved to herself all the vacant territory within her limits. It is understood that she acknowledges no right of occupancy in the Indians within her borders, but proceeds to lay off her territory into counties, and as fast as it is needed, to sell it, without assigning any portion of it to them, or providing in any other mode for their support. Nothing could be more calculated to alarm and irritate the Indians and to produce collisions between them and the whites than the adoption of this policy. It, in fact, drives the Indians to desperation, by leaving them no alternative but to steal or to starve. It also deprives the Government of the United States of that control over them and of the territory they occupy which is necessary for their own preservation as well as for the safety of the white settlements in their vicinity. If the United States are bound to protect Texas against the Indians, it is manifest that the Government of that State should do nothing to thwart, but, on the contrary, all in its power to promote, the fulfillment of this duty. I therefore respectfully suggest the expediency of endeavoring to make some arrangement with that State whereby a portion of her vast unoccupied domain may be temporarily allotted to the exclusive occupancy of the Indians within her borders.

What policy, however, it may be deemed proper to adopt in reference to the Indian tribes in Texas, California, and Oregon, is a question only of humanity or of temporary policy, as the period cannot be very remote when they will be swept before the resistless tide of emigration which continually flows towards these countries.

The case is different with regard to New Mexico. That Territory is so remote and inaccessible, and holds out such little inducement to emigration, that the struggle between the two races is destined, in all probability, to continue there long after it shall have ceased in every other portion of the continent.

By the last census the total population of New Mexico, exclusive of wild Indians, is (in round numbers) 61,000 souls, and its whole real estate is estimated at (in round numbers) $2,700,000.

To protect this small population we are compelled to maintain a large military force, at an annual expense nearly equal to half the value of the whole real estate of the Territory. Would it not be better to induce the inhabitants to abandon a country which seems hardly fit for the habitation of civilized man, by remunerating them for their property in money or in lands situated in more favored regions? Even if the Government paid for the property quintuple its value, it would still, merely on the score of economy, be largely the gainer by the transaction, and the troops now stationed in New Mexico would be available for the protection of other portions of our own and of the Mexican territory. Unless the means I have indicated, or some other, be adopted to relieve the Indians from the necessity of plundering to procure the means of subsistence, their depredations must not only continue but increase. This would require a corresponding increase in the means of protection. In that view I concur in the recommendation of the General-in-Chief, that an additional regiment of mounted men be authorized.

Allow me to call your attention to the state of our defenses on the sea-coast.

Shortly after the termination of the last war with Great Britain a Board of Engineers was organized to prepare a system of coast defense.

This Board recommended that fortifications be constructed at a number of points on the sea-coast and on the northern lakes. Their recommendation was adopted, and its execution was commenced, first, by repairing and enlarging such of the old works as were deemed worthy of preservation; secondly, by the construction of new works, beginning, of course, with those that were considered the most important.

Although doubts have been occasionally expressed whether some of the works proposed by the Board might not be dispensed with, and whether others were not on a scale unnecessarily large, the works recommended by it slowly but steadily advanced, and until the year 1850 Congress never failed, except in a single instance, to provide the necessary means for prosecuting them. In the last-mentioned year, no appropriations for fortifications were made, but the House of Representatives adopted a resolution directing the Secretary of War to submit, at their next session, a report on this subject. That report was submitted, but no action was taken on it, and no appropriation was made.

It is believed that this omission was caused by an opinion which seems to prevail that the system adopted by the Board of 1816, if not originally too extensive, has become so in consequence of events that have since occurred, and ought to be revised and restricted.

In that opinion I concur; and in the report above-mentioned I expressed the opinion that many of the works embraced in the original plan might and ought to be dispensed with.

The subject is undoubtedly worthy of all the consideration that Congress can bestow upon it; and it is to be hoped that they will, at an early period, adopt some mode of revising the plan, and making any changes in it which the present circumstances of the country may seem to them to require.

In the mean time, however, there are a number of works which have been commenced, and are in various stages of advancement, but the prosecution of which is suspended for the want of the necessary appropriations. Most of these works are highly important, being intended for the protection of our principal sea-ports and naval stations, viz: Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Charleston, Savannah, Pensacola, Mobile, and New Orleans, or other points of scarcely less importance.

Whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the extent to which the system of fortifications should be carried, all must admit that no expense should be spared to render points like those abovementioned absolutely impregnable by any force that may reasonably be expected to be brought against them.

I hereto append a statement of these unfinished works, showing the amounts required to complete them respectively, and the sums that could be advantageously expended on each of them during the next fiscal year, and earnestly recommend that Congress be urged to make the necessary appropriations with a view to the completion, if not of all, at least of the most important among them at as early a period as practicable. If this be not done, the large sums already expended on them will in many cases be lost.

Among the works recommended by the Board which have not yet been commenced, there are several which appear to me of obvious necessity. I refer particularly to those designed for the protection of New Bedford and of San Francisco, both of which are now entirely defenseless.

It is also the opinion of the engineers that a work at Sandy Hook, for the protection of the outer harbor of New York, is necessary to complete the defenses of that city.

Congress also omitted the last two sessions to make the usual appropriations for the purchase of the heavy ordnance used in coast defense. As this description of ordnance is generally intended for fortifications, it has been the practice to estimate for it under the head of "Armament of Fortifications." It is hardly necessary to observe, however, that it is an indispensable part of any system of defense that may be adopted, and that the fewer the fortifications the greater the quantity that will be required.

On this subject I beg leave to subjoin a few remarks contained in the report on fortifications above referred to:

"Whatever policy may be adopted with reference to fortifications, it will still be necessary to provide a much larger supply of ordnance than we now have on hand. By reference to the report from the head of the Ordnance Bureau, hereto annexed, (marked C,) it will be seen that the whole number of guns, of all calibers, now on hand, whether in the forts or in the arsenals, amounts only to 3,535; and that of gun-carriages is still smaller. The entire number of guns that can be mounted in the forts already completed (Classes A and B) amounts to 4,572 guns; and if the works now in progress of construction should be completed, the total number of guns that would then be required for all the forts would be 6,093. It appears, therefore, that the supply of ordnance now on hand is very inadequate, even to the present wants of the service. I will observe, too, that even if Congress should determine to restrict the system of fortifications, this would not obviate the necessity for a large increase in the supply of heavy ordnance. Some means of defense must be employed, and cannon is an indispensable part of any system that may be adopted.

"It appears, too, from the reports hereto appended, that the great naval Powers of Europe have, within a few years past, greatly increased the caliber of the guns mounted on their vessels-of-war. This renders it obviously necessary that the power of the batteries intended to resist them should also be proportionably increased. I believe it is the opinion of all officers, both of the Army and Navy, who have devoted much attention to this subject, that many of the guns now in our most important forts ought to be removed, and others of longer range substituted. A glance at the report of the Ordnance Bureau will show how very deficient we are in the heavy descriptions of ordnance, particularly in eight and ten-inch columbiads, the most effective weapons against vessels-of-war.

"To manufacture cannon of good quality is a work that demands considerable time; and as they are imperishable when properly taken care of, there is no good reason why the Government should not at once provide the requisite supply.

"In connection with this subject, I would venture to suggest that provision be made for a distribution of artillery among the militia of the States and Territories. Our people are more deficient in the knowledge of this arm than of any other, and yet it is the one that would be most required in a war with any European Power. If a standing appropriation were made applicable to the distribution of artillery, and of the book on artillery practice among the States and Territories, it would tend very much to promote the knowledge of this essential branch of the military art among the citizens of the country."

One of the most important and responsible duties which have devolved on the Department during the present year is the execution of the works known as the river and harbor improvements.

The number of works for which appropriations were made by the act recently passed is about one hundred, and the sum appropriated about two millions and a quarter. The appropriations, however, will only in a few instances be sufficient to complete the works for which they were made. By far the greater number will require additional, and some of them very large additional, appropriations to complete them. It is to be presumed, that even if Congress should not see fit to continue the system and to provide for other works of a similar character, not included in the present act, they will at least finish the works that have been begun.

I deemed it, therefore, of the utmost importance to make, at the outset, such permanent arrangements for the execution of these works as would, as far as practicable, insure the faithful, judicious, and economical application of the large sums of money that have been and may be appropriated for these works to the important purpose for which they were intended.

Experience has shown that for works of this description, in which large sums are disbursed, and which require for their execution a combination of science and practical skill, it is, as a general rule, safer to rely on officers of the Army (aided when necessary by civil assistants) than on civil agents of whose character and qualifications the Department must often be ignorant. I determined, therefore, to avail myself of all the aid which the Army could afford, and to confide the superintendence of the works to the two corps, of Engineers and Topographical Engineers, both of which are eminently qualified for this duty.

This arrangement not only enabled me to dispense with a number of civil agents whose assistance would otherwise have been necessary, but (a consideration of hardly less importance) to secure the invaluable aid of the distinguished head of the Corps of Engineers.

I at first intended to establish a joint board, composed of the heads and another officer of each of the corps, aided, when circumstances would require it, by an officer of the Navy, to superintend the execution of all the works; but some difficulties having arisen in arranging the details of this plan, I finally determined to divide the works between the two corps, and to establish two boards, one for each corps, composed of its own officers, to aid its head in preparing, supervising, and correcting plans and estimates, &c., the members to act separately as inspectors of the works when in process of construction.

This plan has been carried into effect; and in pursuance of it the works on the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico have been assigned to the Corps of Engineers, and those on the northern lakes and western rivers to the Corps of Topographical Engineers.

It is believed that this arrangement will eminently conduce to the speedy and economical execution of the works.

Owing principally to the advanced season when the appropriations were made, little has been done, in regard to many of the works, beyond making the necessary arrangements to commence them as early as practicable in the spring.

For more detailed information on this subject, and on others connected with their duties, I respectfully refer to the reports of the Colonels of Engineers and of the Topographical Engineers appended to this report.

The estimates for such of the works as require additional appropriations will be submitted as soon as they can be prepared.

The expedition which I mentioned in my last annual report, as having been sent, under the command of Brevet Captain Lorenzo Sitgreaves, to explore the Zuni and Colorado rivers, from the source of the former to the Pacific, has completed the exploration and returned, but the report has not yet been submitted.

Early last spring Captain Marcy was sent with a party to explore the head waters of the Red River. He accomplished the object and has returned, but the report of the expedition has not yet been prepared.

It affords me pleasure to repeat my commendations of the good order and discipline which prevail at the Military Academy, and to express my conviction of the benefits which result to the service from that institution.

The reports of the Chief of the Ordnance Bureau and of the Quartermaster's Department will show the operations of these important branches of the service. Several of the suggestions contained in them are deserving of attention.

The first of these two reports exhibits a very satisfactory view of the operations of the national armories at Springfield and Harper's Ferry; and I concur in the opinion that no benefit would be likely to result from a return to the former mode of governing these establishments.

In my last annual report I called your attention to several points in regard to which legislation appeared to me to be necessary. I will simply renew these suggestions, without repeating the reasons on which they were founded. They were—

First: That the Department be authorized to abolish such arsenals as are no longer needed and are a source of useless expense.

Second: That an additional number of commissaries be authorized.

Third: That a retired list of the Army be established, as a measure of justice both to the officers that are disabled and to those that are not.

Fourth: That the distribution of arms among the militia of the States and Territories, under the act of 1808, be made hereafter on the basis of the free white male inhabitants of age to bear arms, as shown by the latest census, instead of the official returns of the militia, which are frequently not furnished, and when furnished, are often inaccurate.

To these recommendations I beg leave to add a few more that further experience has suggested.

By the fifth section of the act of September 28th, 1850, it is made the duty of the Secretary of War to discharge any soldier who, at the time of his enlistment, was under the age of twenty-one years, unless such enlistment had been made with the consent of the parent or guardian of the soldier.

Young men are frequently enlisted who represent themselves to be of age, but whose discharge is afterwards applied for on the ground of minority. The consequence is, that they are frequently discharged after they have been clothed and fed for months, without rendering any service, or after they have been sent, at great expense, to some remote station. There is reason to believe that in some instances parties have enlisted with a view to defraud the Government.

I recommend that any person being above the age of eighteen years who shall practice such an imposition may be compelled to serve out his term of enlistment.

If further appropriations for fortifications and for river and harbor improvements should be made, the number of officers in the corps of Engineers and Topographical Engineers will be insufficient to supply the necessary details for these works and for the coast and lake surveys added to the other duties they are called upon to perform. I recommend, therefore, that in that event the officers of these corps be increased by an annual addition to each for six years of not more than three second lieutenants, to be taken as heretofore from the graduates of the Military Academy.

In consequence of the great number of remote military posts at which troops are stationed, the number of medical officers has been for some years past entirely inadequate to the wants of the service; the consequence of which is, that a number of private physicians are necessarily employed.

I am satisfied that it would be a measure of economy to authorize an increase of the medical corps.

Besides the above recommendations, there are several contained in the report of the General-in-Chief, hereto appended, which appear to me to deserve attention. I will mention particularly his suggestions that the third section of the act of June 17, 1850, entitled "An act to increase the rank and file of the Army, and to encourage enlistments," be repealed; that measures be taken to distribute, for the use of the militia of the States and Territories, the books of tactical instruction used in the regular service; and that the pension laws be so amended as to place the widows and orphans of officers of the Army on an equal footing with those of naval officers.

Respectfully submitted.

C. M. CONRAD, Secretary of War.

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 4, 1852.

To the President of the United States:

SIR: I have the honor to submit the annual report of this Department, which will make you acquainted with the present condition of the naval service, and bring to your notice the several subjects which I have thought worthy of your consideration and the attention of Congress. I would beg leave also to say, that the many valuable suggestions for the improvement of the service, made by my predecessors in previous reports, which yet remain open to the deliberation and disposal of Congress, have, in my opinion, lost nothing of their interest, and that I refer to them now as most appropriate subjects for commendation to the favor of the National Legislature. If I have presented other views on the same topics, or proposed a different method for improving the organization of any branch of the service, I hope these will be received as contributions to the common effort which this Department has ever felt it a duty to make towards the perfection of our naval system; and that they may be weighed in the deliberations of Congress with a full appreciation of what is deservedly due to the experience of those who have heretofore conducted the affairs of this Department.

DISTRIBUTION OF SQUADRONS.

During the year now about to close the vessels of the Navy in commission have been assigned to the various employment deemed necessary for the protection of our commerce, according to the system of distribution heretofore adopted, and found most convenient to the exigencies of the service.

This distribution has been made in a provision for six squadrons, each of which is required to serve on a cruise of three years, with the exception of that allotted to the coast of Africa, where, from a consideration of the peculiar character of the service, it is limited to two years.

The duration of the cruise is subject only to an occasional prolongation, when the public interest may render it necessary. Suitable provision is made in the enlistments for this incident whenever it may occur.

The six squadrons are assigned to the East Indies, the Pacific ocean, the coast of Africa, the coast of Brazil, the Mediterranean, and the coast of the United States. In addition to these, a steamship is appropriated to the lakes upon our northern border, and a few vessels are kept for detached service.

The East India squadron has continued during the past year under the command of Commodore John H. Aulick, and has consisted of the steam frigate Susquehanna, being the flag-ship of the squadron, the sloops-of-war Portsmouth, Commander Kelly; Saratoga, Commander Walker; and Marion, Commander Glendy. This vessel (the Marion) has recently returned to the United States, and is now assigned to the African squadron, and, being ready for sea, will very soon proceed to her destination.

The squadron has been lately reorganized and placed under the command of Commodore M. C. Perry, and Commodore Aulick only waits the arrival in the East Indies of an officer to command the Susquehanna, to return to the United States, which he will do in advance of his ship. Commodore Perry's command will consist of the line-of-battle ship Vermont, which is now in a course of rapid preparation for service, and it is expected will be ready to sail about the first of March. The Commodore himself has just sailed from the port of Norfolk in his flag-ship, the steam-frigate Mississippi. He will be followed in a few days by the steam-frigate Powhattan, Captain McCluney, which vessel has been recently added to the squadron in place of the steamer Princeton, originally detailed for it, but which, from some imperfection discovered in her machinery, after she had undergone a thorough repair, has been compelled to remain in port. This imperfection, I have reason to hope, will prove to be less serious than was at first apprehended, and that she may soon be in condition for service, when she will be assigned to other employment.

In addition to these two ships, the corvette Macedonian, Captain Abbot; the sloop-of-war Vandalia, Commander Pope; and the steamer Alleghany, Commander Sands, constitute the remaining force assigned to Commodore Perry. The first two of these, the Macedonian and the Vandalia, are now nearly ready for sea, and may be expected to take their departure during the month of December. The Alleghany is waiting only for the completion of her engine, and will be dispatched as soon as it is finished.

The store-ships Supply, Lieutenant Sinclair, and Southampton, Lieutenant Boyle, are also attached to the squadron, and are already on their way to their appointed stations.

The Pacific squadron, under the command of Commodore Charles S. McCauley, has been composed of the frigate Raritan, commanded by Commander McKean, as flag-ship of the squadron; the frigate St. Lawrence, Captain Dulany; the sloops-of-war St. Mary's, Commander Magruder; Portsmouth, Captain Dornin; Falmouth, Commander Petigru; Vandalia, Commander Gardner; and Vincennes, Commander Hudson. The Falmouth, Vandalia, and Vincennes, and the two store-ships Lexington and Southampton, also attached to the squadron, have returned home within the last two or three months. The Raritan, with Commodore McCauley on board, is now also on her homeward voyage, and may be looked for in the course of the month of January.

This squadron has been actively employed in cruising near the Sandwich Islands, from the Straits of Fuca and Puget's Sound, in Oregon, to Panama, on the North American coast, and along the whole line of South America on the Pacific. It has also visited the Gallipagos Islands and the adjacent seas, whilst one or more of its vessels have been kept in constant intercourse with every port familiar to our commerce, from California to Valparaiso.

In the new arrrangement of this squadron it will be put under the command of Captain Dulany; and the razee Independence, the sloops-of-war Falmouth and St. Mary's, will be dispatched with no more delay than may be necessary for their equipment. The store-ship Fredonia, having performed her service in this squadron, has lately been sent on a voyage to California as a transport of troops, and will, when released from that duty, be established at Valparaiso in charge of the public stores at that port.

The African squadron is under the command of Commodore Lavalette, whose flag-ship is the sloop-of-war Germantown, Commander Nicholas. Besides this vessel, it is composed of the sloops-of-war John Adams, Commander Barron, and Dale, Commander Lardner, and the brigs Bainbridge, Lieutenant Manning, and Perry, Lieutenant Page.

Commodore Lavalette, having nearly completed the period of his cruise, will return to the United States in the Germantown as soon as he can be relieved by Commodore Mayo, who will sail in the month of December in the frigate Constitution, with Commander Rudd in command. The Dale will be replaced by the Marion, Commander Howard, which is now ready to sail.

The steamer Vixen will be added to this command for such rapid communication with the coast and the trading points on the rivers as the duties assigned to the squadron constantly require.

The service on this station is arduous, and attended with many incidents to render it far from being acceptable to those employed upon it. Constant vigilance and frequent intercourse with a barbarous people on the coast are the least of its discomforts. To these are added exposure to disease and the irksome seclusion of a long voyage, which finds but small relief in visits to a shore without attraction and always dangerous to the stranger. The health of our ships on that station, I am happy to report, has in general been well guarded by the useful sanitary discipline which the experience of the service has of late years been able to suggest and enforce, and we have now no longer to complain of such ravage by the maladies of the climate as overtook those who were in times past consigned to this service.

The time has come, perhaps, when it may be properly commended to the notice of Congress to inquire into the necessity of further continuing the regular employment of a squadron on this coast. The slave trade may be said to be now driven into a comparatively narrow space on the southern portion of the coast, and confined to North and South Guinea. Whilst the measures recently adopted in Brazil encourage the hope that this infamous traffic will soon be abandoned altogether, a few small vessels added to the Brazilian squadron, and directed to cruise in the track of the slave ships, may be found effectual to suppress the last efforts of that forbidden commerce, against which the abhorrence of all Christian nations is awakened.

The squadron on the coast of Brazil is commanded by Commodore McKeever, and is composed only of his flag-ship, the frigate Congress, Commander Pearson, and the sloop-of-war Jamestown, Captain Downing, with the store-ship Relief, Lieutenant Hitchcock. It has rendered useful service to the public interests in that quarter, and been found adequate to all the demands of our varied and extensive commercial intercourse there.

Commodore McKeever will return in the spring with his ship, and his place will be supplied by Captain Salter, who has received preparatory orders to the frigate Savannah, to be commanded by Commander Mercer.

Commodore Silas H. Stringham has command of the Mediterranean squadron in the frigate Cumberland, Commander Turner. His force consists of the steamer San Jacinto, Captain Crabb, and the sloops-of-war St. Louis, Commander Ingraham, and Levant, Commander Goldsborough. This squadron will probably be reinforced hereafter by the steamer Princeton or the Saranac, if either of these vessels may be spared from the service at home, and the San Jacinto, which is now undergoing repairs at Trieste, in that event may be ordered back to the United States.

This squadron has been conspicuously engaged in various service connected with our important commercial and political relations to the countries bordering on the Mediterranean, and has performed its duties with a commendable zeal and the best results. We have been able, through the exertions of Commodore Stringham, to obtain a permanent arrangement for the accommodation of our ships at Spezzia by the good will of the King of Sardinia, and all that the public interest and convenience require in a safe and commodious naval depôt we may now regard as secured.

The squadron on the coast of the United States, or the Home squadron, under the command of Commodore J. T. Newton, consists at this time of the frigate Columbia, the flag-ship of the commodore, and commanded by Commander Pendergrast, the steamer Saranac, Captain Long, the sloops-of-war Albany, Commander Gerry, and Cyane, Commander Hollins, and the steamer Fulton, Commander Jackson. The steam-frigate Powhattan, Captain Mervine, was a short time ago attached to this squadron, and immediately dispatched, with the Commodore on board, on special service, to the ports of Havana and Vera Cruz. Upon his return from this voyage it was found necessary, in consequence of the disability of the Princeton, to change her station, and place her in the East India squadron.

The steamer Saranac, detailed for duty in the Home squadron, sailed on the 4th of October last for Rio de Janeiro, under the command of Captain Long, giving conveyance to the late Brazilian Chargé d'Affaires, the Chevalier de Sodre, to the seat of his own Government. Captain Long will be back, it is supposed, in a few weeks to reassume his position in the squadron from which he was detached, or for such other service as may await him.

The Cyane has been recently ordered to cruise in the neighborhood of the Island of Cuba, and to visit the port of Havana. The Albany is ordered to the same quarter, and will, for the present, remain at Pensacola.

The steamer Mississippi, having been in condition for her cruise to the East Indies, some time in advance of the rest of the squadron, was employed in the month of August last on a visit to the coast of the British Provinces upon our northern border, in a service connected with the question of the Fisheries. She returned early in the month of September to resume her allotted station, and to await the period of the departure upon the long voyage in which she is now engaged.

EXPLORATIONS AND SURVEYS.

During the past year the attention of this Department, in conjunction with the Department of State, has been directed to the employment of the East India squadron in an enterprise of great moment to the commercial interests of the country—the endeavor to establish relations of amity and commerce with the Empire of Japan.

The long interdict which has denied to strangers access to the ports or territory of that country, and the singularly inhospitable laws which its Government has adopted to secure this exclusion, having been productive, of late years, of gross oppression and cruelty to citizens of the United States, it has been thought expedient to take some effective measure to promote a better understanding with this populous and semi-barbarous empire; to make the effort not only to obtain from them the observance of the rights of humanity to such of our people as may be driven by necessity upon their coasts, but also to promote the higher and more valuable end of persuading them to abandon their unprofitable policy of seclusion, and gradually to take a place in that general association of commerce in which their resources and industry would equally enable them to confer benefits upon others and the fruits of a higher civilization upon themselves.

The extension of the domain of the United States to the shores of the Pacific, the rapid settlement of California and Oregon, the opening of the highway across the Isthmus of Central America, the great addition to our navigation employed in trade with Asiatic nations, and the increased activity of our whaling ships in the vicinity of the northern coasts of Japan, are now pressing upon the consideration of this Government the absolute necessity of reviewing our relations to those Eastern communities which lie contiguous to the path of our trade. The enforcement of a more liberal system of intercourse upon China has met the approval of the civilized world, and its benefits are seen and felt, not less remarkably in the progress of that ancient empire itself, than in the activity which it has already imparted to the pursuit of Eastern commerce. China is awaking from the lethargy of a thousand years to the perception of the spirit of the present era, and is even now furnishing her quota to the adventure which distinguishes and stimulates the settlement of our Western coast.

These events have forced upon the people of America and Europe the consideration of the question, how far it is consistent with the rights of the civilized world to defer to those inconvenient and unsocial customs by which a nation capable of contributing to the relief of the wants of humanity shall be permitted to renounce that duty; whether any nation may claim to be exempt from the admitted Christian obligation of hospitality to those strangers whom the vocations of commerce or the lawful pursuits of industry may have incidentally brought in need of its assistance; and the still stronger case, whether the enlightened world will tolerate the infliction of punishment or contumelious treatment upon the unfortunate voyager whom the casualties of the sea may have compelled to an unwilling infraction of a barbarous law.

These are questions which are every day becoming more significant. That oriental sentiment which, hardened by the usage and habit of centuries, has dictated the inveterate policy of national isolation in Japan, it is very apparent, will not long continue to claim the sanctity of a national right to the detriment of the cause of universal commerce and civilization, at this time so signally active in enlarging the boundaries of human knowledge and the diffusion of comfort over the earth. The day has come when Europe and America have found an urgent inducement to demand of Asia and Africa the rights of hospitality, of aid and comfort, shelter and succor, to the men who pursue the great highroads of trade and exploration over the globe. Christendom is constrained, by the pressure of an increasing necessity, to publish its wants and declare its rights to the heathen, and in making its power felt will bring innumerable blessings to every race which shall acknowledge its mastery.

The Government of the United States has happily placed itself in the front of this movement, and it may be regarded as one of the most encouraging guarantees of its success, that the expedition which has just left our shores takes with it the earnest good wishes, not only of our own country, but of the most enlightened communities of Europe. The opening of Japan has become a necessity which is recognized in the commercial adventure of all Christian nations, and is deeply felt by every owner of an American whaleship and every voyager between California and China.

This important duty has been consigned to the commanding officer of the East India squadron, a gentleman in every respect worthy of the trust reposed in him, and who contributes to its administration the highest energy and ability, improved by long and various services in his profession. Looking to the magnitude of the undertaking, and the great expectations which have been raised both in this country and in Europe in reference to its results, the casualties to which it may be exposed, and the necessity to guard it, by every precaution within the power of the Government, against the possibility of a failure, I have thought it proper, with your approbation, to increase the force destined to this employment, and to put at the disposal of Commodore Perry a squadron of unusual strength and capability. I have, therefore, recently added to the number of vessels appropriated to the command, the line-of-battle-ship Vermont, the corvette Macedonian, and the steamer Alleghany. These ships, together with the sloop-of-war Vandalia, originally intended to be assigned to the squadron, and with the ships now on that station, the steamer Susquehanna, and the sloops-of-war Saratoga and Plymouth—a portion of which are now near to the term of their cruise—will constitute a command adapted, we may suppose, to any emergency which the delicate nature of the trust committed to the Commodore may present. It is probable that the exhibition of the whole force which will be under the command of Commodore Perry during the first year will produce such an impression upon a government and people who are accustomed to measure their respect by the array of power which accompanies the demand of it, as may enable him to dispense with the vessels whose term of service is drawing near to a close, and that they may be returned to the United States without any material prolongation of their cruise.

A liberal allowance has been made to the squadron for all the contingencies which the peculiar nature of the enterprise may create. The commanding officer is furnished with ample means of defense and protection on land as well as sea; with the means, also, of procuring dispatch vessels, when necessary, transports for provision and fuel, and for such other employment as may be required. Special depôts of coal have been established at various points, and abundant supplies provided. He has, in addition to the instructions usually given to the squadron on this station, been directed to avail himself of such opportunities as may fall in his way to make as accurate surveys as his means may allow of the coasts and seas he may visit, and to preserve the results for future publication for the benefit of commerce.

Somewhat allied in character and importance to these projected operations of the Japan squadron, is the expedition now prepared for the exploration and survey of the China Seas, the Northern Pacific, and Behring's Straits. The naval appropriation bill of the last session of Congress put at the disposal of this Department one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, "for the building or purchase of suitable vessels, and for prosecuting a survey and reconnoissance, for naval and commercial purposes, of such parts of Behring's Straits, of the North Pacific ocean, and the China Seas, as are frequented by American whaleships and by trading vessels in their routes between the United States and China."

Very earnestly concurring with Congress in the importance of this exploration and survey, I have lost no time in the arrangement and preparation of what I hope will prove itself to be a most effective and useful expedition. As the act of Congress has confided to the discretion of this Department the selection of the vessels which may be found necessary for the prosecution of this enterprise, the equipment and distribution of the force it may require, and the organization of every matter of detail connected with it, limited only by the amount of the appropriation, I have thought I should best accomplish the object proposed, and gratify the expectation of the country, by giving to the expedition the benefit of such naval resources as the Department could command, rather than confine it to such limited supply as would have resulted from either building or purchasing vessels, and providing for the other details of this service out of the fund intrusted to the Department. With this fund so applied the Department would have been constrained to organize the expedition upon a scale which I conceive to be altogether inadequate to the nature of the labor required, and which, indeed, would have been almost certain to end in the failure to accomplish such results as Congress had contemplated. Looking to the amount which it would have been necessary to reserve in order to provide for the special contingencies of such an expedition, it would have been impracticable to procure, by the application of the remaining portion of the appropriation, more than one steamer, of an inferior class, and perhaps two small brigs, to constitute the force to be used in the undertaking. It is doubtful if even this equipment could have been obtained by such an appropriation of the fund. The absolute necessity of altering, strengthening, and arranging any vessel which might be purchased, so as to adapt it to the character of the service required, and give reasonable assurance of safety and success, would have drawn so largely upon the appropriation as to reduce the outfit to a limit quite incompatible with the object expected to be attained.

This cruise of exploration and survey, destined to equal employment in the tropics and the arctic regions, and required to traverse the broad expanse of the Pacific amongst dangerous and unknown shoals, and in search of islands and rocks misplaced upon our charts, and therefore the more perilous to the navigator, will find enough, and more than enough, of labor to occupy it during the next three years. Its toilsome duties, exacting ceaseless vigilance and all the skill of seamanship, will be inevitably enhanced by the disease incident to varying climates and exposure to the peculiar casualties of boat navigation and contests with the savage islanders of the seas it is destined to explore. I have therefore deemed it indispensable that at least one large vessel should be always at hand to afford a change of quarters to those who may be disabled, and to supply reliefs of fresh men to take the place of those who may be broken down by sickness or accident. It is impossible to maintain the health of the crews of the small vessels in so long a service without the comforts which such a change may afford. These surveys also require an extra supply of men beyond the usual complement destined to our cruising ships, there being constant occasion for detachments in boats to conduct the operation of measuring and determining the position and bearings of the shoals and islands which it is the purpose of the enterprise to ascertain.

In consideration of all these conditions, and many others of a kindred nature, I have determined to give to this little squadron every facility which the resources at my command have enabled me to supply. I have accordingly put the Vincennes, one of our stanchest and best sloops-of-war, in the lead of the expedition. I have added to this the propeller John Hancock, which, being found to have an engine of the strongest construction, needed only some alterations in her size and frame, and the addition of new boilers, to make her in every respect a most efficient contribution to the force required. She has, with this view, been placed in the hands of the naval constructor, who is now assiduously at work, and I am happy to report with all desirable success, in fitting her out with every accommodation which her future operations may demand. Besides these two vessels, the brig Porpoise has been detailed for the expedition, and put in condition for all the exigencies of her employment. A small pilot-boat, adapted to speedy navigation and shallow waters, will be added to the squadron. These vessels, fully manned and equipped, and furnished with all the necessaries appropriate to the hazardous nature of their cruise, constitute the material elements of the expedition.

To promote the scientific objects contemplated by the reconnoissance, I have supplied the squadron with an astronomer and hydrographer of known ability and accomplishment, and also with a naturalist and botanist, who are charged with the duty of collecting and preserving specimens of such natural productions as may be interesting to science and commerce.

The squadron is placed under the command of an officer already distinguished by his participation in a former exploring expedition, and well known for the valuable contributions he has made to the hydrographical survey of our western coasts —Commander Ringgold—whose professional accomplishment and devotion to the service eminently qualify him for the duty committed to him.

He will be able, I hope, to take his departure in a few weeks, and will sail directly to the Pacific, doubling Cape Horn and proceeding by the Sandwich Islands to Behring's Straits, where he may be expected to arrive at the opening of the season for operations in that quarter. It is designed to employ the expedition during each year in the reconnoissance of these high latitudes from June until October, this being the only season in which the surveys may be prosecuted in those regions. The remaining portions of each year will be devoted to the prosecution of survey and exploration in the lower latitudes, along the coast of Japan, the China seas, and the routes of navigation between our ports on the Pacific and the East Indies. Particular attention will be given to the survey of the seas and coasts through and along which our whaling ships pursue their perilous trade, looking carefully to the coast of Japan, the Kurile Islands, the sea of Okhotsk, and the unexplored shores of Northern Asia.

The commander of the expedition is made fully aware of the necessity and value of an accurate survey of the various lines of navigation between California and China, and will bestow upon this undertaking an attention commensurate with its importance. He is directed to make frequent reports of his work, in order that no time may be lost in communicating to the country the results, together with descriptive charts, of his survey, for the benefit of commerce and navigation. These will be duly published as often as they are received by the Department.

Being persuaded that this Department cannot better contribute to the fulfillment of the high expectations which the country has ever entertained as to the value of the Navy, nor perform a more acceptable duty to the Navy itself, than by imparting to this arm of the national power the highest spirit of enterprise, as well as the greatest efficiency of action, I have sought every opportunity to put in requisition for useful service the various talent, skill, and ambition of honorable adventure, which equally distinguish and embellish the professional character of the officers under the control of the Department. Constant employment of ships and men in the promotion of valuable public interests, whether in the defense of the honor of our flag, or in the exploration of the field of discovery and the opening of new channels of trade, or in the enlarging of the boundaries of science, I am convinced will be recognized both by the Government and the people as the true and proper vocation of the Navy, and as the means best calculated to nurse and strengthen that prompt and gallant devotion to duty which is so essential to the character of accomplished officers, and so indispensable to the effectiveness of the naval organization.

Acting in conformity with this opinion, I have availed myself of events that favored the object to set on foot two other expeditions, which may be classed with those which I have just presented to your notice, and from which I have every reason to hope much good is to be derived hereafter. My attention has been invited by the Colonization Society of Pennsylvania to the necessity of prosecuting some researches into the character of the Continent of Africa, and especially that portion of it lying eastward of the settlements of Liberia. It is supposed that an exploration of this region would lead to the discovery of a broad tract of fertile and healthy country, well adapted to the extension of that system of colonization which for some years past has greatly interested the public attention, and more recently attracted the favorable consideration of Congress.

The proposition submitted to my view by the society, and referred to your approval, I regard as one which may be rendered productive of great public advantage, and in regard to which you might confidently bespeak and anticipate the approbation of the country. I have, therefore, not hesitated, with your concurrence, to give it the aid which it was in the power of the Department to bestow. As I could not, however, without some special appropriation to the object, organize a full and effective expedition for the prosecution of this enterprise, I have thought that, by the employment of such means as have been provided for the ordinary exigencies of the service, I might profitably prepare the way for such an expedition as Congress might hereafter think fit to authorize. I have accordingly directed a preliminary investigation to be made by an officer of the navy, whom I have attached to the African squadron, with orders to devote the months of the coming winter to an examination of necessary conditions which this undertaking may require.

In Commander Lynch, to whom the country is already indebted for important service in another field, I have found a prompt and ardent volunteer for this employment. He is now on his way to the African coast. He will land at Liberia, Cape Palmas, and other points, and will pursue his inquiries as far as the river Gaboon, with a view to the ascertainment of such localities on the margin of the African continent as may present the greatest facilities, whether by the river courses or by inland routes, for penetrating, with least hazard, to the interior. He will collect information touching the geographical character of the country, its means of affording the necessary supplies of men and provisions, the temper of the inhabitants, whether hostile or friendly, the proper precautions to be observed to secure the health of the party employed, and all other items of knowledge upon which it may be proper hereafter to prepare and combine the forces essential to the success of a complete and useful exploration of the interior. In the performance of this duty, under the most favorable circumstances, he will encounter the perils of a climate famed for its unwholesome influence upon the white man, and may hardly hope to escape the exhibition of hostility from the natives. The spirit which has prompted him to court this perilous adventure, so honorable to his courage and philanthropy, I trust will enable him to brave every hazard with success, to overcome every obstacle in his progress, and to reserve himself for the accomplishment of the great object to which these preparations are directed. In the mean time, I most earnestly commend the subject of the exploration to the early and favorable attention of Congress, with the expression of my own conviction that there is no enterprise of the present day that deserves a higher degree of favor, or that will more honorably signalize the enlightened policy of this Government in the estimation of the present or of future generations. It will require a liberal appropriation of money, and an enlarged discretion to be confided to the Navy Department for the organization and arrangement of a plan of operations which must embrace the employment of a number of men, the supply of boats, armaments and tools, and the enlistment of such scientific aid as a long and laborious inland exploration, beset with many dangers and difficulties, will suggest.

With a view to the preparatory operations of Commander Lynch, and also in consideration of the need which the African squadron has at all times for such an auxiliary, I have directed the small steamer Vixen to be prepared without delay and sent to that coast, to constitute a part of the force under the command of Commodore Mayo, who is about to take charge of the squadron. He will be instructed to furnish Commander Lynch with every facility which his position may allow. A small sum of money has also been placed at the disposal of Commander Lynch for the contingencies of his present service.

The second expedition to which I have referred has grown out of the recent decree of the Provisional Director of the Argentine Confederation, which has very lately reached this country, and which now throws open to navigation that long-sealed and excluded country lying upon the tributaries of the river La Plata. The Uraguay and the Parana are at last opened by this decree to the access of all nations who may choose to seek the new associations which they offer to the spirit of adventure. A vast territory of boundless resource, proverbial for its treasures of vegetable and mineral wealth, extending, like the Mississippi, from south to north, and reaching through twenty-four parallels of latitude, with every climate between the temperate and torrid zones, and with every variety of product which may be gathered from the alluvial plains of the ocean border to the heights of the Andes—this is the field into which the liberal decree of President Urguiza has invited the enterprise of our country, as well as of other nations, who will be equally prompt to pursue it. We have waited with anxiety for the occasion to add this new resource to the industry of our people; and I am sure it will gratify the commercial pride and please the emulous ambition of the nation, not less than it will secure great and permanent advantages to its trade, to have the American flag and a national vessel the first to receive the greetings of the population who, at the foot of the Andes, and along the navigable waters of inland Brazil, Bolivia, and Paraguay, are ready to welcome the first messenger of commerce and throw their treasures into his hand.

Anticipating the near approach of this opportunity, with your approval I admonished Lieutenant Page, before it arrived, to hold himself in readiness for an exploration of these rivers, and directed the steamer Water Witch to be put in condition for the service. She is now nearly equipped, and Lieutenant Page will be ready to take his departure at the first moment that the steamer may be fit to receive him. He is provided with an able crew, well adapted to the nature of his expedition, and seconded by officers chosen for their efficiency both in the sphere of seamanship and scientific labor. A few boats are provided, adapted to the navigation of the upper streams above their falls; and the equipment, though of simple and unexpensive kind, will be, in all respects, such as may enable Lieutenant Page to accomplish the duty assigned to him.

These four expeditions, each of them of a highly interesting character, and likely to be productive of results which will be beneficially felt and acknowledged long after the men who may procure them shall have passed away, constitute, in great part, the chief and most important topics which have engrossed the care of the Navy Department during the past year.

It gives me pleasure to report, in connection with these, the return of Lieutenant Herndon, to whom was consigned, in conjunction with Passed Midshipman (now Lieutenant) Gibbon, an exploration of the valley of the river Amazon and its tributaries. These officers were directed to cross the Cordilleras in Peru and Bolivia, and by a selection of the most judicious routes of travel, with a small company of men, for the employment of whom means were furnished by this Department, to explore the valley of the Amazon, and to descend that river to the sea. More than a year has been spent in the active prosecution of this duty. Lieutenant Herndon reached the United States in July last, bringing with him a large amount of interesting and useful facts, industriously collected by him in the course of his long and hazardous journey, embracing many valuable statistics of the country, and adding most important contributions to the hitherto unknown geographical character of the country. He is now engaged in preparing a full report of the incidents and discoveries of his travel, which will be communicated to you as soon as it is placed in possession of this Department. I beg to commend Lieutenant Herndon to your special approbation and thanks for the intelligence and ability, and yet more for the high professional zeal he has exhibited in the performance of his difficult and honorable duty.

Lieutenant Gibbon, having taken a different route from that of Lieutenant Herndon, has not yet arrived, but may be expected in the course of the winter. When he returns to this city, the result of his work will be submitted to your notice.

The brig Dolphin, which was employed during the last year, under the command of Lieutenant Lee, in a survey of portions of the Atlantic, for the purpose of ascertaining the position of some dangerous rocks and shoals which were known to exist in the routes of navigation between the United States and Europe, has performed useful service, of which the results will be communicated to Congress. This work being yet incomplete, the Dolphin has again been dispatched on a second cruise of the same character, under the command of Lieutenant Berryman, and may be expected to accomplish a work which will tend, in no small degree, to lessen the hazards which have heretofore embarrassed the voyages of our merchant marine.

Lady Franklin, whose devotion to the cause of her unfortunate husband has excited so large a sympathy in the United States, has been encouraged to make another effort to determine the fate of the gallant navigator of the Arctic sea, and is now intent upon the organization of a new expedition under the auspices of our countryman, Mr. Henry Grinnell, and Mr. George Peabody, of London. Their endeavor will be directed to an exploration of the upper coasts of Greenland, by land as well as sea, and will furnish occasion for valuable scientific observation tending to the ascertainment of the magnetic poles and the intensity and dip of the needle, and interesting also to geological questions connected with the supposed existence of an open polar sea, and other subjects of much importance in the natural history of our globe. Apart, therefore, from its main object, there is much in the projected expedition to excite a high degree of interest in its results, both in Europe and America.

The distinguished lady whose sorrows have inspired this zeal of adventure, and whose energy has given it an intelligent and hopeful direction, has done no more than justice to a meritorious young officer of our Navy, Passed Assistant Surgeon Kane, in asking his coöperation in this hazardous exploit. Dr. Kane has already won a high praise from his countrymen by his intrepid perseverance in facing the extraordinary dangers of the last expedition on the same errand to the Arctic sea, and still more by the diligence which, guided by scientific accomplishment, has enabled him to contribute a valuable fund towards the illustration of a subject that now engrosses an unusual share of learned investigation.

The request of Lady Franklin to enlist Dr. Kane in the new expedition has been communicated to me, and I have not delayed to give him the necessary permission, and to confer upon him all the benefit he may derive from his position in the Navy, by an order which puts him upon special service. If it should become requisite in the field of operations to which he is destined to provide him with means for the prosecution of scientific discovery, beyond those which may be afforded by the Department and the liberality of the distinguished gentlemen who have assumed the charge of this expedition, I would commend it to the enlightened regard of Congress, with the most confident hope that that body will respond to the suggestions of this necessity with a prompt appreciation and generous support of an undertaking so honorable to humanity and so useful to the enlargement of liberal science.

THE NAVAL ACADEMY.

The Naval Academy at Annapolis presents to the regard of Congress an institution worthy of the highest encouragement.

Under a judicious and energetic administration, it has now reached a stage in its progress which may enable the Government to form a satisfactory estimate of its influence in promoting and sustaining the future efficiency of the Navy.

The school has grown up to its present stage in the progressive expansion and improvement of a design which, in its origin, forbade the adoption of a comprehensive and permanent system of naval education. It was at first contrived to supply nothing more than the opportunity of prosecuting a few useful studies to a class of occasional students, who were subject to all the interruptions of details for service at sea, and who were therefore not in a condition to conform to the requirements necessary to a regular course of professional instruction. The obvious insufficiency of this mode of study soon suggested the necessity for a more methodical arrangement. A plan was accordingly devised in 1850, to take effect at the commencement of the next term of October, 1851, by which all the acting midshipmen of the date of that and subsequent years should be inducted into the school in its lowest class, and proceed in due order through a prescribed course of naval education, which is specifically adapted to a term of four years. The series of studies appropriate to each year was defined, the practice of gunnery and seamanship established, and the whole organization, as it now exists, completed. The classes were so contrived also as to receive, according to an appointed succession, the acting midshipmen of dates prior to 1851, who by this provision will, in the space of the next three years, have had the opportunity of graduating in the school.

The admissions of acting midshipmen to the Navy, and consequently to the Academy, have been regulated and limited by several laws, of which the combined import now is to give to each State and Territory its relative proportion of appointments, determined by the ratio of representation in Congress and its relation to the whole number of acting and passed midshipmen allowed to the Navy. To this determination of the quota of appointments appropriated to each State and Territory there has been added an allotment of a fractional share to each Congressional district, and the nomination for each district has been conferred upon the member representing it.

The whole number of midshipmen, including passed midshipmen, allowed to the Navy is four hundred and sixty-four. The number of Representatives and Delegates, according to the last census, is two hundred and thirty-nine. Each Representative, therefore, is entitled by the existing law to the nomination of one candidate and a fraction equal to 225-239.

No provision has been made for the disposition of these fractions, and I have therefore thought myself bound, in the absence of any other regulation, to consult the wishes of at least a majority of the Representatives entitled to the fractional part in receiving a nomination to supply the vacancy.

As the school does not contain more than a fourth of the midshipmen belonging to the Navy, and as the vacancies in the number of students are dependent altogether upon the promotions to the grade of lieutenants and upon the resignations, dismissals, and deaths in each year in the corps of midshipmen, the annual nominations to the school must, when the entire complement of midshipmen is regularly filled, be comparatively but few in number. The present condition of the service supplies but a small ratio of promotions; and if it were not for the operation of the resignations, dismissals, and deaths, it is manifest that the yearly recruits to be added to the school would be so inconsiderable in numbers as to forbid any hope of extensive usefulness; whilst the fluctuating character of these causes which produce the vacancies tends to a result scarcely less injurious.

It is, indeed, the most obvious defect in the present organization of the Academy that its supply of students is liable to these contingencies; for while the classes are advancing by regular steps, through the course of four years' study, to the term at which they must leave the school and enter into the field of active service, the vacancies which they create are dependent upon such a limited fund of supply as must ultimately reduce the number of pupils below the quota which is essential to the administration of the system.

That this defect has not already been visible in the career of the Academy is to be ascribed only to the fact, that up to the present time the members of the institution have been recruited from the grade of midshipmen who have been employed at sea previous to the new arrangements, adopted and commenced with the class of 1851. The classes heretofore have been furnished out of this corps, in addition to the annual nominations. When this resource is exhausted and the school is dependent on the yearly nominations alone, the defect to which I have referred will be fully seen and felt. It will then be manifest that the whole number at the school cannot exceed, at any time, the number of promotions added to the occasional vacancies occurring in the corps of midshipmen and passed midshipmen in four years.

It is to remedy this defect, and to give the school an inherent power necessary to its own perpetuation, and to make it what I am sure the country desires to see it, a vigorous and healthful institution, completely adapted to the useful ends for which it was ordained, that I propose, with your approbation, to submit to Congress the following change in its fundamental structure.

The Academy should be composed exclusively of cadets, or young men who are received as candidates for admission to the Navy. Its design should be that of a preparatory school to qualify these candidates for appointments, and they should only be in condition to be selected for midshipmen when they had successfully passed through this probation.

If this principle be adopted as the ground-work of the plan, then the whole number of cadets to be nominated for the school may be established by law. For the present, I suggest that this number may be fixed at two hundred and forty-eight. It may be altered as future experience may require. Of this number of two hundred and forty-eight who are to be furnished to the Academy every four years, one fourth, or sixty-two, should be nominated for admission at the commencement of each yearly term, to constitute the first or lowest class of the school. Of this whole number of two hundred and forty-eight, two hundred and twenty-eight might be allotted to the nomination of members of Congress, apportioning them to each State according to the ratio of representation and requiring the nomination to the vacancies to be made, not by the representatives singly, but by the united counsel and action of the whole representation of each State, including Senators and Representatives. The remaining twenty of the two hundred and forty-eight may be given with advantage to the President.

By this arrangement Congress would be called on to nominate fifty-seven cadets every year, and the President five.

The classes would thus commence their career with sixty-two members, and this number, or so many of them as are not dropped in the progress of the four years, would represent the annual number of graduates. Provision, of course, should be made for the gradual absorption of all those acting midshipmen who, under the present system, are not yet disposed of. In a few years they must disappear, after which the organization of the cadets would be undisturbed.

In addition to this number of sixty-two nominations to be made in each year, Congress and the President would also have the appointment to such vacancies in the new class as might arise out of the failure of the first candidates to pass the preliminary examinations required at their admission. The vacancies occasioned by subsequent examinations, and by the other causes operating during the progress of the classes through the term of the four years, I propose should not be filled; but the classes, after their commencement, should advance to the end of the term of study, subject to all the incidents of their career which may reduce their numbers. The propriety of this provision will be recognized when it is observed that a vacancy occurring in any class after it has become advanced in its studies could not be supplied, at that advanced stage, by a new appointment to the school. The class would still go on in its reduced state, whilst the supply of a vacancy occurring in it could only operate to the undue increase of the lowest class of beginners, and would thus produce a periodical and inconvenient increase of graduates for whom no allotment could be made in the Navy.

Assuming sixty-two as the number which shall always be supplied to the lowest class or beginners of the school, we have reason to believe, from the data afforded by the experience of West Point, that the annual number of graduates would not exceed some twenty-five or thirty, it being found, in the general operation of the system, that the graduates do not bear a greater average proportion to the admissions than forty per cent. Upon this basis it may be estimated that these twenty-five or thirty may be looked to as the ordinary yearly resource for the supply of young officers to the Navy.

I propose, in the next place, that the law should establish the corps of midshipmen for the service at two hundred and fifty. These should be recognized as midshipmen only, and be subject to all the understood and appropriate duties of that class of officers. They should then be consigned to service on board of ships-of-war, and, after six months' employment at sea, should, upon examination and approval by a competent board, be entitled to the midshipman's warrant, bearing the date of the graduation of the school; and after three years' service at sea and another examination, they should be noted for promotion to a higher grade, which I propose should be created by law and denominated masters. The grade of passed midshipman should be abolished as soon as the gradual promotion of the corps may allow. It is an anomaly in the naval service, presenting a class of officers to whom no duty is specifically assigned, and constantly engendering discontent when the duties of ordinary midshipmen are required of it. This class now perform the duty of masters, and I think it but proper that the duty and the rank should be associated by law. The change would require no increase of pay, and would, I have no doubt, be productive of good effects.

The grade of masters might be established at one hundred, and might at once be filled by appointing to it that number of passed midshipmen. The ultimate result of this plan would give, when all the present passed midshipmen shall have been absorbed in the regular course of promotion, two hundred and fifty midshipmen and one hundred masters to occupy the space now filled by the corps of four hundred and sixty-four officers—a reduction of one hundred and fourteen. This reduction of course would increase the ratio of promotion to the corps of lieutenants, and would leave a sufficient complement for all the demands of the service, estimated by the present size of the Navy. A future increase of the Navy would suggest a proportionate increase of officers of every grade.

The promotions incident to this organization of the corps—that is to say, of two hundred and fifty midshipmen and one hundred masters—would supply about twenty-five vacancies a year. The present number of higher officers furnish something near this yearly average, and there is no reason to suppose that it will be reduced in future; the more active service of the Navy, even on the present establishment, may rather increase it. The school, therefore, may be regarded as subject to an annual demand for this number of its graduates to be advanced into the regular line of service. Estimating the number of graduates at twenty-five, the whole of them would thus find position and employment; an increase to thirty would of course give a remainder of five, which may also be disposed of.

I propose, in further organization of this system, to construct a scientific corps in the Navy, to be established as the hydrographical crops; this corps to be designed, in its first formation, upon a basis which shall provide for thirty masters, thirty lieutenants, fifteen commanders, and five captains, making eighty in all. It should be specially educated for that scientific professional service in which some portion of the Navy is constantly employed. Its chief duties should be connected with hydrographical surveys, astronomical observations, construction of charts, preparation and improvement of ordnance, the supervision of naval architecture and machinery, and the direction of civil engineering in the construction of docks and other structures requiring scientific knowledge and skill.

The corps should be entirely separate from and independent of the regular naval service. Its line of promotion should be confined to its own organization, and its government should be under its own proper officers. In addition to the duties assigned to it on shore and in hydrographical surveys, some portion of it might be appropriated to service at sea, and one or more officers of the corps might be introduced into the complements of squadrons on foreign or home service. An experienced officer of this corps would find useful and active duty upon every cruise. It should be left to the Navy Department to regulate the character and contingencies of this service, and to make all the necessary rules and orders for its application.

This corps should be built up under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy from the material afforded by the Academy, with such additions to it, in its commencement, from the regular line of naval service, as in his judgment the qualifications of the present officers might enable him to make with advantage.

With a view to the supply of this corps from the Academy, I propose that, upon the yearly examination of the graduates, the Board of Examination shall be directed to bestow a close attention upon the class submitted to them, in order to ascertain the particular adaptation of any of the graduates to this species of service, and that they shall report to the Department the names of such as they may find qualified by study, talent, and acquirement for admission to the corps; and if, upon this report, the students so designated shall consent to enter the corps, they, or so many of them as the established complement of the hydrographical corps may require, shall be appropriated to that service; and, upon being so appropriated, they shall be returned to the Academy for an additional course of study of two years, during which they shall be employed in obtaining a thorough knowledge of the higher branches of civil engineering, hydrography, astronomy, mechanism, and gunnery, in conformity with the best system of instruction which the Academy may be able to furnish. At the end of this probation of two years they shall be subjected to a final examination, and, upon a recommendation to that effect, shall be admitted to the rank of masters in the hydrographical corps. Five years' service in this grade should entitle them to be promoted to lieutenants, as vacancies may happen, and the promotions thenceforward should await the ordinary incidents of the corps which may supply the proper occasion.

If the Department should be able to contribute any members to the corps from the present officers of the service, I think such appointments should not exceed twenty to each grade of masters and lieutenants and ten commanders, and, that no captain be appointed until after five years' service in the corps, there may be found the proper officers to occupy the vacancies in this grade. It should also be well understood that the Secretary of the Navy, in assigning present officers to the corps, should be governed alone in his selection by high qualification and accomplishment in the science required, and not by seniority in the service; and that no appointments should be made, unless there be found officers of approved reputation for their acquirements in reference to this service who may be willing to enter the corps.

The yearly graduates of the Academy will, according to this system, be assigned to the two branches of service I have described; that is to say, to the regular naval service and to the hydrographical corps. The graduates required for these two branches should be selected from those who are adjudged by the board of examination to stand highest on the roll of the class; and if at any time it should happen that the requisitions should not embrace the whole number of graduates in each year, then those whose services are not required, being the lowest on the roll, should receive an honorable discharge from the school. These would return to the occupations of private life well educated by the bounty of the Government, and qualified for useful employment in the many important vocations connected with commerce and navigation, and especially in the various service of steamships which create so large a demand for expert and accomplished officers. In whatever situation they may be placed, they will find abundant occasion to rejoice in the advantages they shall have obtained at the school, and, by the proper use of these advantages, indemnify the country for the care and expense it may have bestowed upon their culture. These conditions and incidents of an admission to the Academy being understood in advance, both by the cadet and his friends, it is presumed, will prepare them to regard the discharge in its true point of view, as the necessary contingency of a most important good conferred, and not as a disappointment which should occasion regret. If, on the other hand, it should turn out that the annual number of graduates should not be adequate to the demands of these two branches of service, the basis of sixty-two in the class of beginners may be increased to the number at which experience may show that the desired result may be obtained. It will be easy, after the experiment of a few years, to ascertain this number with sufficient precision; and, as in the mean time the hydrographic corps is to be filled, the extra supply of the classes for the next three years, by the admission of the midshipmen of dates prior to 1851, will very opportunely enlarge the classes to a number which will satisfy that requisition.

In arranging the complement of officers to the hydrographic corps, I have proceeded upon a conjectural estimate of what I suppose may be found necessary to the service required of it. I submit this to the judgment of Congress for such alterations in the grades and numbers as their investigation of the subject may suggest. I have thought it safest to propose a number rather below what I think the service may ultimately demand, as it is easier to increase this complement than to reduce it. It is proper for me to say, also, that, in assigning five captains to this corps, I may have exceeded the number which may be appropriate to the organization. But as no captain, according to this plan, could be appointed before the lapse of five years, the experience which may be gained in the interval may enable Congress, before that period has gone by, to adjust this grade to its proper number, and assign to it its appropriate duties. It may be hereafter looked to for the supply of the head of the engineer department, the superintendents of naval architecture and construction, the general supervision of hydrographical surveys, and the management of the Naval Academy. If these functions may be efficiently discharged by it, the number I have assigned will not be too large.

These are the general views and considerations which have induced me to submit this plan to your approval and to the consideration of Congress.

It will afford the annual appointment of sixty-two candidates for the Navy.

It will give greater permanency and efficiency to the school.

It will quicken promotion in the Navy, and give to the younger officers hope of useful command whilst they yet possess the vigor and ambition of youth.

It will establish a valuable corps of scientific officers, who will bring to the service equal devotion to the prosperity of the Navy and the highest attainments to promote it.

And it may occasionally give to the country men carefully educated in useful knowledge, and bound by the strongest obligation of gratitude and honor to requite this public bounty by laudable service in the employments of civil life.

I think it proper, in presenting this new organization of the school and of the officers which it is intended to supply, to ask of Congress that the grade of master in the service shall be entitled to a commission and recognized in that character by law. The masters are ward-room officers, and should be placed amongst the commissioned officers of the Navy. No change of pay is necessary, and in that respect they may be left upon their present footing.

It must be observed that some years will elapse if this organization be now authorized by law before it can be rendered complete; and the sooner, therefore, that it is adopted the better.

The present class of passed midshipmen numbers two hundred and sixteen. These are to be disposed of. One hundred of them may be commissioned as masters, and the grade may be at once established at that number by law. The remaining hundred and sixteen would be gradually absorbed by the grade of masters in a few years, after which the system will work according to its permanent regulation.

The present number of acting midshipmen is two hundred and six, of which the school contains, by the last report, eighty-one. Five appointments have been made for the next term, and there are yet thirty-seven vacancies. To the nominations already made for the new class of beginners to the next term of October, 1853, may be added at once, with the thirty-seven vacancies, as many as may be necessary to make sixty-two. The classes should then advance regularly to the end of their respective terms, without additions, and the law may provide for the annual supply henceforth of sixty-two, in the manner I have indicated. The grade of midshipmen might be at once declared to be limited to two hundred and fifty, and the filling of that complement should await the supply it may hereafter obtain from the graduates.

If any of the present grade of passed midshipmen and masters should be found qualified for admission to the hydrographic corps, the vacancies which may be made by their appointment to it may be filled by promotion, and so hasten the period at which the new organization may be brought into full operation.

The school has yet to receive some classes of midshipmen of the date previous to 1851. When admitted, they will constitute an extra portion beyond the quota allowed to the Academy, and I would suggest in regard to them that they should be permitted, as heretofore, to constitute a part of any class for which they may be qualified, and upon their graduation to be entitled to their advancement to the proper grade; it being mainly important to provide at present that each yearly class of new admissions should be constituted of the appointed number of sixty-two, and in no event to exceed that number. The future organization of the school will necessarily follow upon the observance of this provision.

In proper connection with this subject of the Academy, it is my duty to apprise you that I have recently adopted regulations for the government of apprentices to be admitted at the several navy-yards and workshops under the control of this Department. The propriety of these regulations has been suggested by the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and I am indebted to the intelligent labors of three distinguished officers of the department, Commodores Morris, Shubrick, and Smith, to whom I referred the subject for a report, which I have received, and which will be found amongst the documents accompanying this communication. The report presents the regulations which I have approved. The number of apprentices as established, for the present, by this system, is eighty-three. They are required to undergo an examination twice in each year, and, after the first year, those most distinguished in the previous trials are to be subjected to another of a still more extensive and rigorous character, upon which such as shall be reported as worthy of the highest approbation and reward, and as demonstrating talent adapted to eminence in the public service, are to be commended to the Secretary of the Navy for such further advantages of instruction as he may have it in his power to confer.

I regard it as a most salutary power to be invested in the Secretary of the Navy, for the beneficial performance of the duty thus assigned to him, that he should have authority to admit into the Naval Academy those apprentices whose good conduct and capabilities shall have earned this distinction; and to provide that they should there be conducted through a course of study appropriate to their intended future vocations, and calculated to advance them in mathematical and mechanical science, under such regulations in regard to the term of their application, their duties and deportment, as the Navy Department might think it expedient to adopt. Having completed this course of study, they should be returned to the yards from which they may have been received, or allotted to suitable employments in the service.

It would be a useful provision in this scheme to give to the young men so educated a preference in the admissions to the corps of engineers for steamships, for which appointments their education would particularly qualify them; their admission into that corps, nevertheless, to be dependent upon successful examination and a favorable certificate to moral and intellectual character.

In the operation of this scheme the Navy would derive the benefit of the best talents and acquirement for the supply of engineers, naval architects, and constructors and superintendents in the various departments of mechanical employment connected with the service.

I take great pleasure in presenting this subject to your approval and to the attention of Congress.

In view of this reorganization of the Academy, I submit, also, as a question worthy of consideration, whether it would not be a salutary provision to require that the officers of the Marine Corps should be prepared for that service by an education at the school? My own opinion is, that it would be attended by manifest advantage, both as respects the necessary accomplishment for naval service in that corps, and the personal character and deportment of the officers belonging to it. It is amongst the incidents of their employment that they are sometimes required to perform important military duties on shore in which a necessity is found for that species of knowledge only to be gained in the military or naval school; and in every service to which they are called it is quite apparent that this knowledge, and the spirit to appreciate the duties of command that is inseparable from it, must increase the efficiency of the officer and elevate the character of the corps to which he is attached. If these considerations should influence the opinion of Congress as they do my own, they will suggest the expediency of making the provision to which I have invited their attention.

In concluding this notice of the Naval Academy, it is due to Commander Stribling, who has charge of the institution, and to the officers, professors, and assistants under his command, to say that the assiduity and intelligence with which they have performed the laborious and complicated duties assigned to them, merit the highest approbation; and that the prosperous condition of the school, and admirable arrangement of its details, particularly manifested in the deportment and proficiency of the young men confided to their care, eminently entitle it to the favorable opinion and encouragement of the Government.

I particularly commend to the notice of Congress the consideration of the appropriations asked for by the Bureau of Ordnance and Hydrography, for the improvements necessary to purchase the grounds and complete the buildings required by the Academy.

ORGANIZATION AND DISCIPLINE OF SEAMEN.

There is no subject connected with the prosperity of the Navy that, in my estimate, better deserves the attention of Congress than that relating to the condition of the corps of mariners, which constitutes the great working force in the navigation and management of the public vessels.

In obedience to a sentiment which is prevalent throughout the country, and which is naturally suggested by those impulses that distinctively characterize the opinions and habits of our people, Congress has been recently led to the consideration of the ordinary mode of punishment, which it had heretofore been supposed was necessary to the preservation of the discipline of the Navy. The result of this consideration has been the passage of a law for the entire abolition of corporal punishment on board of our ships, both public and private. This punishment—which, for a long time, has been practised in the Navy and commercial marine, not only without question as to its efficacy in maintaining the proper observance of duty on ship-board, but which, indeed, had become so incorporated in the sober conviction of both officers and men, as an indispensable necessity of the service, that it had grown to be the most unquestioned usage and generally received incident of naval discipline—many judicious persons believed might be dispensed with, not only most acceptably to the feelings of the nation, but also without disadvantage to the service. The adoption of this opinion by Congress, in the passage of the act of September, 1850, which forbade the accustomed penalty, without providing a substitute for it, has afforded the Navy the opportunity to make the experiment. I very sincerely regret to say that the records of this Department, as well as the almost entire concurrence of facts and opinions, brought to my notice from authentic sources, and vouched by intelligent and experienced observers, all tend to indicate a most unsatisfactory result. The omission of Congress to provide for the punishment of what may be called minor offenses against discipline and good order on ship-board may, perhaps, account in part for the failure; but the fact of the most serious detriment to the efficiency of our service is so unhappily forced upon my attention, as the effect of the recent change, that it becomes the gravest of my duties at this time to lay the subject once more before Congress, and to ask its attention to the consideration of such a corrective to the present condition of the service as I am confident it must find to be indispensable to the proper government of the Navy. We have evidence furnished to this Department, in the history of almost every cruise, of acts of insubordination that not only impair the usefulness of our ships, but which tend also to the gradual development of habits amongst the seamen that threaten to lead to extensive and uncontrollable mutinies. The multiplication of courts-martial, and all the consequences of an increase of disorder and crime, are amongst the least of the apparent and growing evils of the new system. The demoralization of both men and officers is a yet more observable consequence. The absence or prohibition of the usual punishments known to seamen has led to the invention of new penalties of the most revolting kind, in the application of which full scope has been given, and the strongest provocations administered, to that exhibition of temper and passion which, however natural it may be to men of hasty and excitable natures, is seldom indulged without leading to cruelties that must disgrace those who practice them; and, what is more to be feared, raise a sentiment in the public mind hostile to the Navy itself. The seaman, believing himself exempt from the speedy penalty of disobedience or neglect of duty, and looking with indifference to the remote and uncertain proceeding of a court-martial upon his delinquency, grows habitually contumacious to his superiors, and infuses the same sentiment into his comrades; and in the very fact of the diffusion of this spirit of insubordination finds ground to hope for immunity from punishment—naturally enough believing that what has grown to be common and frequent will also come to be more lightly considered when he is summoned to a trial at the end of his cruise. It may excite some surprise in the statement of what I learn to be true, that the most frequent complaints against the abolition of corporal punishment are made, in great part, by the seamen themselves. The difficulties arising out of its abrogation, and the absence of any substitute for it, now constitute the most prominent obstacles to the ready supply of our squadrons with seamen. This Department is familiar with complaints from the recruiting stations of the difficulty of enlisting the better class of seamen. Of that large number of men who have heretofore constituted the pride of our Navy, by their good seamanship and highly respectable personal deportment, comprising, I rejoice to say, the great body of the mariners who have sustained the honor and glory of our flag in its most perilous, as well as in its most useful career—of these men, it is a fact which invites the deepest concern of Congress, we are daily deprived, by their refusal to enter again into the service until, as they ask, they shall have some assurance that a better system of discipline may be restored. They reasonably complain, that whilst the worst portions of the crew are placed under arrest, and are exempt, in consequence, from the severe duties of the deck, they find their toil increased by the constantly-recurring exigencies which compel them, for weeks and months, during a cruise, to perform the extra work which the reduction of the force of the ship inevitably throws upon them. So oppressively is this evil felt, that I have reason to believe, if the best seamen, who have heretofore been accustomed to man our ships, could find an occasion to express their wishes to Congress, a majority of the whole number would be seen to prefer a restoration of that form of punishment which has been forbidden, rather than be subject to the severities imposed upon them by the present condition of disorder in the naval discipline.

Looking at this state of things in the Navy, I think the occasion propitious to the adoption of a new system for the organization and government of the whole material constituting the crews of our ships; and I take advantage of the present time to submit to your consideration the outline of a plan, which I trust will engage your attention, and receive the approbation of Congress.

The supply of our Navy with seamen has heretofore been obtained by a system of enlistment, modeled, in its principal elements, upon the plan adopted in Great Britain, from which nation we have derived, by old habit and national descent, the general features of our marine. Like England, we have looked to our commercial navigation for the reinforcement of the men of the Navy. We enlist the mercantile seamen for the national cruise, discharging and paying them off when it is finished, and returning them to the merchant service. The Navy, in general, has been sufficiently attractive to the sailor to be able to secure his service when needed; and this mode of enlistment being an easy and accessible resource, but little consideration has heretofore been bestowed upon its effect either on the Navy itself or upon the seamen. To the Navy it has given a large and meritorious class of mariners, not unmixed, however, with many of a different character, and from that mixture itself requiring a prompt and effective system of punishment adapted to secure a ready discharge of duty in every emergency. The effect of the system upon the men of the Navy has been overlooked, or, if regarded at all, it has not attracted the attention of the public authorities. The sailor is, in general, upon shore a helpless being. Between himself and all around him there is a palpable incongruity. He has come off a long cruise and has earned some three or four hundred dollars. He has no home; often no friends but his comrades. He knows no thrift, no saving economy: has no adviser. His only outlook is for some pastime, and his idea of that is confined to sensual enjoyment. Every one is familiar with his history in his brief sojourn on shore. He is a victim to that class of persons who pander to his appetites and who plunder him of his earnings. Necessity and inclination very soon drive him back to the sea, where he finds his natural home and the only friends who can understand his character and sympathize with it. It is very apparent that a man so organized and circumstanced stands very much in need of better culture than this course of life affords. A discreet attention to his condition by the Government, with a few salutary regulations that may teach him more thrift and furnish him guidance and encouragement, will make him more useful as a citizen, or at least more self-dependent and respectable in his individual character, and render him at the same time certainly not less useful in his profession.

I propose, for the consideration of Congress, a plan for the reorganization of this portion of the Navy, which, if matured by such experience as the future practice of it may afford, will, I am confident, enhance the respectability and value of our seamen, and secure to the country a most efficient corps of men permanently devoted to the public service.

I think it cannot be doubted that the successful application of the Navy to the purposes for which it is designed would be better assured by the services of a well-disciplined and carefully-maintained body of seamen permanently attached to the public naval establishment and incorporated with it, than it ever has been, or is ever likely to be by the fluctuating and variable resource of frequent enlistment and discharge. The constant changes which this corps undergoes is unfavorable to the growth of that sentiment, so essential to the service, which makes a sailor proud of his flag. It is still more unfavorable to the acquirement of that peculiar adaptation of habit and training to the duties belonging to the employment of a man-of-war, which all officers regard as the test and indispensable element of an efficient seaman in the Navy. In a large Navy like that of England, where all the seamen of the mercantile marine, in a certain sense, belong to the Government, the difference between the man-of-war's man and the seaman of civil employment is not so apparent or significant as it is in our service, in which the seamen bear so small a proportion to the whole body of mariners of the nation. Every English sailor has generally more or less service in the Navy, and passes so frequently from the private to the public employment as to give him to a great degree an actual incorporation in the national marine: the one service is so connected with the other that the seamen of both assimilate more in their training and education than the correspondent classes in this country. Our Navy, for obvious reasons connected with these considerations, is much more dependent upon a body of men nurtured by the Government and attached to the service than that of England. It is, therefore, a fundamental purpose in the plan which I submit to Congress to provide for the ultimate establishment of a permanent and recognized body of seamen, connected with the Navy by the strongest and most durable bonds of attachment and interest

Whilst providing for the gradual and eventual organization of such a body, my attention has been directed also to the procurement of men of the highest character in personal and professional quality, in whose good deportment and faithful service will be found the most satisfactory reasons for protecting by legal enactment their whole class against the form of punishment which has of late so much excited the sensibility of the nation. The successful accomplishment of such an object, I trust, will commend the plan to the regard of all who desire to preserve that exemption, and who have hoped to find it in practice not incompatible with the highest efficiency of service on shipboard.

The general outline of the plan may be exhibited in the following regulations:

With a view to the commencement of this system, and to organize a body of efficient seamen of the most meritorious class, I propose that every commanding officer of a squadron, or of a single ship when not with a squadron, shall, on his return from a regular cruise, report to the Navy Department, in the muster-roll of the men under his command, a statement of the good or bad general deportment of each man, with a special designation of those whose conduct has merited that degree of approbation which shall entitle them to be admitted into the Navy.

That this report be submitted by the Department to the President, who shall thereupon issue a general order to admit into the Navy the seamen who have been distinguished in the report for good conduct. And the President shall transmit with this order to the commanding officer of the squadron or ship a certificate to each seaman, written on parchment and stamped with the signature of the President himself, expressing his approbation of his conduct and his permission to admit the subject of it into the Navy; which certificates shall be delivered by the commanding officer of the squadron or ship to the men entitled to them before they are discharged from the ship. This delivery to be made in the presence of the crews and with suitable formality to attract public notice.

That each seaman to whom this certificate shall be awarded shall, if he accept it, register his name in a book to be provided for that purpose and kept on board of the ship, by which registry he shall become a registered seaman of the Navy of the United States, and be entitled to all the privileges and be bound to all the obligations of that character. This registry book shall be transmitted to the Navy Department, where it shall be preserved; and the entries made in it copied into a general registry, alphabetically arranged, and kept in the Department.

The obligations incurred by every seaman who signs the register shall be those of faithful service and due performance of all seamanlike duty under the flag of the United States, good moral deportment, and prompt obedience to all orders that may be issued by his lawful superiors so long as he shall continue to be a member of the Navy.

The privileges attached to this registry shall be:

1. For every five years of actual duty on board a public vessel an increase of one dollar a month over and above the established rates of ordinary pay; that is to say, for the first five years of such service one dollar per month; for a second term of five years of such service an additional dollar per month; for a third term of five years another dollar; and for a fourth term of five years—making a total of twenty years service—another dollar; amounting in all for such twenty years service to four dollars a month; after which no further increase to be made. This additional monthly pay, so earned by service, to be paid to each man so long as he may continue to be a registered seaman of the Navy; and, after twenty years of service, to be paid whether he continues a registered seaman or not.

The right to this additional pay to be liable to forfeiture at any time within the twenty years actual service by the resignation of any seaman on the registry, or by his being struck off the list of registered seamen; which may be done at any time; and shall only be done by the order of the Secretary of the Navy, or by the sentence of a naval court-martial, upon charges of misconduct; in either of which events—resignation or discharge by sentence of the Secretary of the Navy or of a court-martial—he shall cease to belong to the Navy, and shall lose all the privileges of such a character.

2. Every registered seaman to be entitled to resign his post in the Navy at any time after three years' service, if not engaged on a cruise. When engaged on a cruise and absent from the ports of the United States, he shall not resign without the consent of the commanding officer of his ship. A record of all resignations to be duly kept and reported to the Department.

A registered seaman of more than twenty years' service continuing in the Navy, only to forfeit his additional pay when such forfeiture shall be adjudged by a court-martial as a punishment for grossly immoral or insubordinate conduct. By such sentence also for such offenses, his additional pay may be suspended by a court for such time as they may adjudge.

3. No registered seaman of the Navy to be subject to any corporal or other punishment of a degrading character, and to such only as may be ordered by a court-martial on charges duly preferred and tried. This prohibition not to prevent the punishment without a court-martial of such minor delinquencies in conduct and discipline as may be corrected by withholding the usual indulgences of the service, stopping portions of the ration, or increasing ordinary duty.

4. Every registered seaman to be entitled after any term of three years' service to a furlough of such reasonable length as may enable him to make one or more voyages in the merchant marine, not extending, without special permission, to more than six months; such furlough to be granted by the commanding officer of the squadron, or the commandant of the navy-yard nearest to the port at which his cruise may terminate, and only to be granted in any case with an expressed reservation and notice that the seaman to whom it is given shall report for duty in the Navy when any public emergency shall render it necessary so to order him, the order for his return to duty to be issued by the Navy Department or by such officer as may be authorized by the Department to do so. A failure to report in accordance with this provision to render him liable to be struck off the registry by the Secretary of the Navy. Every registered seaman reporting for duty within three months of his last cruise, and being thereupon ordered to duty, to be entitled to pay from the date of termination of his last cruise.

All furloughs to be regularly reported and noted at the Navy Department.

5. Every registered seaman to be entitled to wear on his dress some appropriate badge by which he may be distinguished and known in the Navy, which badge will be designated and provided by the Navy Department.

6. The petty officers of each ship to be selected, as far as convenient, from the class of registered seamen, and the appointment always to be regarded as dependent upon the merit and good character of the person selected, to be held on good behavior, during the term of a cruise.

7. A record to be kept, under the direction of every commanding officer of a squadron or ship, of the actual amount of sea service performed by each registered seaman whilst under his command. This record to be returned to the Department at the end of every cruise, and to be transferred to the general registry of seamen. Upon the evidence of this general registry the additional pay to be granted.

8. Every seaman to be admonished to give his true name, age, and place of birth, upon signing the registry, and to be required to engage not to ship in merchant or other vessels, whilst on furlough, by any other name. His being convicted of violating this engagement to render him liable to be struck from the list of registered seamen upon the order of the Secretary of the Navy.

9. In every case of dismissal from the service, as a registered seaman, the party so dismissed to receive whatever moneys may be due to him, unless the same shall have been forfeited by the sentence of a court-martial imposed as a punishment for an offense committed by him. A seaman dismissed from the registry not to be entitled to be restored but upon the permission of the head of the Navy Department, granted in consideration of the meritorious character of the applicant.

10. Seamen, ordinary seamen, and landsmen in the service, not belonging to the registry, to be subject to such discipline, duty, and penalties as Congress may provide in a code of regulations adapted to their government, under such restrictions or modifications as the Department may think proper to make.

11. A printed book or circular to be made by the Department, containing all the regulations and conditions relating to the establishment of registered seamen, giving a full description of the obligations to be contracted by them, and of the privileges to which they may be entitled. Copies of this book or circulars to be furnished to every squadron or single vessel in commission, of which copies, one shall be given to every seaman, in order that he may be fully informed of the nature of the engagements to be incurred by him on entering the service of the United States. These regulations to be read and explained to the several crews, and as far as may be necessary to every seaman before he signs the registry.

12. The Department to be authorized to make, alter, and modify all rules and regulations, so far as it may be found expedient for the due establishment and support of this purpose of creating a corps of registered seamen, in accordance with the general objects intended to be promoted in the above plan, and for the supplying of any defect which experience may show to exist in it.

The term seamen, as used throughout this plan, is to be understood to embrace every class of mariners on board a public vessel, whether denominated seamen, ordinary seamen, or landsmen.

13. A limited number of boys to be received into the Navy upon obligations contracted according to law, to serve until they arrive at the age of twenty-one years. Their number, the quota to be allowed to each vessel, and all needful and proper rules for their government and duties to be regulated by the orders of the Navy Department.

This system of providing for a more effective marine I respectfully submit to your consideration. There already exists power in the Executive to adopt nearly the whole of its details. It may be proper, however, to submit it to the approval of Congress, with a view to obtain for it a legislative recognition, and especially to procure such enactments as may be necessary to give the sanction of law to the establishment of the registry, which constitutes the ground-work of the plan.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

In the activity and diversity of enterprise which the busy spirit of this time has exacted from the Navy, it has now become manifest that the increase of the naval establishment of the country is not only recommended by the most urgent public considerations, but is also forced upon the attention of Congress as an absolute necessity. The honor as well as the successful venture of the nation, and I might even say the indispensable obligation of national defense, and the constant'y-recurring need for the exhibition of the national power, all combine to present this question to Congress as one of the first magnitude. During the past year this Department has been impelled, by a due regard for the great public interests committed to its charge, to put in requisition nearly the whole disposable force of the Navy! The details of this report will show that constant and various employment has been demanded of officers, ships, and crews. I trust that Congress will see in these requisitions how much the demands of necessary service engross the means provided to accomplish it, and will deduce from this fact an argument in favor of enlarging the naval resources for still larger naval operations.

Whilst other great maritime Powers are strengthening and extending their capabilities for aggression and defense, and are bestowing a sedulous labor upon the creation of steam navies of singular efficiency, they have imposed upon us a new obligation, if not to track their progress with equal steps, in an effort to bring ourselves abreast with them in their advance, at least to maintain that position of relative strength which it has been our policy heretofore to assume.

The actual exigencies of our own service, so conspicuously multiplied by the rapid extension of our domain and the settlement of new marts of trade, and the establishment of new lines of commerce on the Pacific, cannot but present to every citizen of the United States an altogether irresistible argument to persuade the nation to a much larger provision of ships and men than we have heretofore kept in commission. The Pacific, during the next ten years, is likely to become the theater of the most interesting events of our time. A nation is growing up upon its shores, which will both attract and supply an amount of commercial enterprise in the rapid growth and activity of which the world has yet had no parallel. The discovery of America did not give such an impulse to this spirit as we now witness in the energy and occupations of these recent settlements.

At this moment we are without a public steamship in that ocean. Our various commerce scattered along the whole coast from Oregon to Chili, and our citizens who are found in every port throughout that extended line, are left to the protection of but two frigates and two sloops-of-war, composing a squadron whose utmost activity can but half perform the duty assigned to it. Our new relations with Asia and the intermediate islands, which are constantly multiplying the resources of trade, and with them the hazards of collision, and the consequent increase of numbers drawn from the population of every country to the competitions of this theater, all indicate the commencement of an era of great political significance, which will henceforth exact from the Government more than its accustomed vigilance in noting the progress of events, and more than its usual energy in the duty of guarding our citizens who may be connected with them. It is, therefore, more necessary than ever that we should have a respectable force always accessible to our countrymen in this field of action, and capable of giving them protection against the perils of war and popular outbreak and revolutionary commotion, which in future, even more than in the past, may be expected to characterize many of the States and communities to which their business invites them. A steamer of a large class, adapted to the general duties of a cruise, and a smaller one to be kept at hand at San Francisco, for use in California and Oregon, I regard as almost indispensable additions to the squadron assigned to that service.

Looking to the Atlantic, we find motives equally strong for the increase of our naval armaments, and particularly for the enlargement of the number of our steamships.

Whilst I am fully aware that the power of the United States happily consists more in their ability to provide for the contingencies of invasion than in the actual exhibition of an equipped force, and that we may dispense with much that is deemed requisite in the relations of European Powers, still we cannot fail to recognize the fact, that the respect due to the interests of our people requires the habitual and familiar presence of our flag in every region of commerce, sustained by such an amount of force, and of such a quality, as may give some significant token of the resources we command at home. A salutary conviction on this point is, to a great extent, inspired by the excellence of our armaments when brought into comparison with those of other nations. We cannot afford to lose or impair our reputation for producing the best ships and the best disciplined crews that navigate the ocean, however we may afford to exhibit them in smaller numbers.

The principal maritime nations are now diligently intent upon the effort to build up powerful steam navies. Most of them are already far ahead of us in this species of force; and it is very obvious, from the urgency with which the new marine of Europe is pressed to assume this character, that there is a deep and earnest conviction of an impending necessity in which the improved force will be mainly relied on as the efficient element of war. Are we so far removed from the occasion or the scene of apprehended conflict as to warrant any indifference on our part to the possible issues of a collision? Are our affairs so little exposed abroad, or so concentrated at home, as to exempt us from all necessity to consider the effects which may follow the recent changes in the naval organization of Europe?

These considerations, and others which they suggest, induce me to ask the attention of Congress to the recommendations of the Bureau of Construction accompanying this report, and to invite them, with the most earnest solicitude, to provide for the building of three first-class screw propeller frigates, and the same number of propeller sloops-of-war. To these might be added with advantage a few smaller steamers adapted to quick dispatch and coast navigation.

Our navy-yards are abundantly supplied with large quantities of the best timber, in the best condition, which could not be better appropriated than to this object. There are two frigates, the Santee and the Sabine, which have been housed on the stocks in Portsmouth and New York for the last ten years. These might be launched and fitted for service, and their places might be occupied as well as the sheds now vacant in other yards by the new steamships proposed to be built.

In connection with this subject, I would call the attention of Congress to the necessity of authorizing the establishment of one or more factories for the construction of all the machinery necessary to the complete equipment of the largest class of steamers. The great importance of such establishments to the Government is felt by this Department in the daily conviction that only by the command of such a resource may the Navy be promptly and surely supplied with the best machinery for the public vessels. The inspection and control of the work whilst it is in progress, the assurance of the best material, and the punctual compliance with the demands of the service, are advantages that may only be efficiently secured by having the workshop under the command of the Government. The experience of the past will also fully demonstrate that this mode of supplying the machinery of our public vessels must be, in its general result, more economical than any other, and will certainly secure much the most reliable kind of work. The plans would be more uniform, failure of machinery less frequent, and the improvement of the models of construction more certain.

The mail contract law of 1847 contains a provision which authorizes the Government to appropriate any of the vessels built under it to the naval service. I would recommend that one of these, of the first class, be selected and equipped with the proper armament. I make this suggestion from a persuasion that it is a matter of importance to the Government practically to determine, by experiment, a question upon which much doubt is entertained, and which it is necessary to solve, whether these steamers are really adequate to the demands of the naval service, and may be usefully converted into ships of war. The determination of this question may settle a point of great moment touching the reliance to be placed upon these ships in any sudden emergency—a point much more safely to be settled in a time of peace than in moments of excitement and pressure, when no other resource may be at hand to meet the consequences of a failure.

It is further necessary to make provision for an increase of seamen. The present limit of seven thousand five hundred men is insufficient even for the necessities of the service in its existing condition. If the full complement of men appropriated by the regulations of the Navy were now on board of the vessels in commission, more than the whole number allowed would be required. I think it therefore indispensable to the proper efficiency of the service that an addition of not less than fifteen hundred be authorized to be made to the establishment, and that a correspondent addition be made to the yearly estimates of naval pay. It is equally necessary that provision be made for an increase of wages, either in monthly pay or in the shape of a bounty, to be given after enlistment. The amount of this increase should be regulated by some reference to the wages given in the merchant service, which are now so much higher than the naval pay as to increase the difficulty, to which I have heretofore alluded, in the procurement of the best men.

A reference to the report of the Bureau of Medicine will inform Congress of the condition of the medical service of the Navy and the pressing necessity that exists for an increase of officers in that department. Great relief would be afforded by an authority to appoint a number, not exceeding twenty assistant surgeons, and to make a correspondent promotion of an equal number, or of so many as by proper length of service may be qualified for it, into the upper grades.

I beg leave also to call the attention of Congress to the report of the commanding officer of the Marine Corps, which will show how inadequate is the present limitation of that corps to the ordinary demands of the service. The opinion of General Henderson upon this point, of itself entitled to great weight, is reenforced by that of many of the most experienced officers of the Navy, as will be seen in the correspondence accompanying the report, to which I invite a careful attention. In conformity with these opinions, I respectfully recommend to Congress the passage of a law to authorize the enlargement of the corps by the addition of eighty sergeants, eighty corporals, thirty drummers and fifers, and one thousand privates, and that the four captains, four first and four second-lieutenants, conditionally allowed to the service by the proviso to the naval appropriation bill of March 3, 1849, be retained permanently in the corps.

The same necessity which has led to this representation of the embarrassments of the service in those branches to which I have just alluded, compels me to ask for some addition to the corps of pursers. This important division of the naval organization is found to stand in need of more aid than the present allowance affords. The corps scarcely furnishes that proper rotation in service which the peculiar duties of the purser demands. It is necessary after every cruise to allow this officer a sufficient time on shore to settle his accounts—a period which will not always place him at the disposal of the Department for an early return to sea, if it were even proper to compel these officers to a repetition of duty without some time for such refreshment on shore as every officer requires.

If Congress should think proper, in consideration of this condition of the corps, to sanction an increase of its members, I would earnestly recommend the establishment of a grade of assistant pursers, to which only the new appointments should be made; that these assistants should undergo an examination as to their physical and mental abilities previous to their appointment; that the age of admission should be regulated by the Navy Department; and that no applicant should be nominated for the corps without a satisfactory conformity to the preliminary condition. Promotion and pay should be regulated by law, and no promotion should be made but upon full evidence of the capability of the individual to comply with all the demands of service; this evidence to be obtained by such course of examination as the Department may prescribe. With such conditions, I would recommend that Congress should at present authorize the appointment of twenty assistant pursers to be attached to the corps.

As a subject of great interest to the efficiency of the Navy, I beg leave to renew the recommendations heretofore made by this Department for the gradual reduction of the number of officers who are incapable of useful service, by the adoption of some suitable plan for retiring all of this character from the sphere of ordinary duty. A well-organized naval system requires that the officers charged with its administration should, as far as possible, be maintained in a condition for whatever employment may be demanded of them, and should always exhibit the utmost alacrity in their obedience to orders. There is no better test of the spirit of the corps, nor no more commendable sign of a good officer, than his readiness to accept every call of his profession. This high character can only be maintained in the Navy by exempting from command all who obstruct the path of duty. Those whose disability has been the result of long and faithful toil in the national service should be provided with an honorable retreat, in which old age and infirmity may find repose. They who, without service to plead for their incapacity, only stand in the way of more willing and more capable men, should be consigned to a retirement on smaller pay, by the operation of a law which should render their retirement compulsory.

It may be worth the consideration of Congress to make permanent provision for these two classes of officers. This might be advantageously accomplished, perhaps, by a law which should confer upon the first class a rate of retired pay, graduated from half pay up to that allowed to leave of absence, according to the amount of sea service they may have performed, and adding to this an honorary promotion of one degree in rank, and which should dispose of the second class by retiring them on half of leave of absence pay.

The details necessary to such a system may be easily regulated whenever Congress shall find occasion to take the subject into their deliberations.

I repeat also my concurrence in the views presented by my predecessor in his report of November, 1850, on the propriety of "recognizing by law the office of Commodore, and the creation of at least two officers of the rank of Rear Admiral." I can add nothing to the satisfactory arguments with which that recommendation is enforced, and therefore content myself with a reference to the report, and an earnest invocation to Congress to give it a favorable consideration.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The reports from the chiefs of the several bureaus of this Department will make Congress acquainted with the details of the naval service in each branch of its administration. I respectfully ask their attention to the many valuable suggestions these reports contain for the better government of the Navy. Amongst these, I select for a more special notice the recommendations of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, touching the mode of making contracts, in respect to which it is proposed that some discretion should be lodged in the bureau to authorize its rejection of a contract when offered by a bidder who has on any previous occasion failed to comply with his engagement.

I particularly commend to the notice of Congress the representations of the Bureau of Yards and Docks in reference to the several navy-yards under its care. The yard at New York requires early consideration. A large portion of the land belonging to it has not yet been placed under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and is consequently subjected to onerous assessments for improvements by the city of Brooklyn, and exposed to the very inconvenient demands of that city in the opening of streets leading to the channel of the Wallabout, which, if opened, would seriously affect the security of the yard, and greatly incommode its operations. So important is it to the Government that this difficulty should be removed, that I think it would even be advisable to transfer the works of this yard to some other convenient location, unless the jurisdiction over the land be fully conceded to the United States. Efforts have been made, and are still making, to obtain this cession from the Legislature, and I trust will now be successful. If they should not, there is reason to believe a better site may be obtained for the yard, free from the present inconveniences; and that the expense of the new establishment might be defrayed by the sale of the old.

The floating dry-dock in California, contracted for in obedience to the several acts of Congress heretofore passed, has been completed, and delivered at San Francisco. No appropriation was made for the basin and railway, without which the dock cannot be safely or usefully employed. I submit it to the decision of Congress whether these structures should not be made without delay.

The Naval Asylum at Philadelphia is well conducted, and is found a valuable refuge to the infirm and disabled seamen who have been admitted into it. I concur in the opinion expressed by the head of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, that its position is not the best adapted to its effective usefulness in the Navy; and as the property is believed to be very valuable, it may be worthy of consideration whether it would not be good policy to dispose of it, and reëstablish this institution either at Annapolis or Norfolk, where its inmates would be removed from the temptations to disorder which the proximity to a large city throws in their way.

The Naval Observatory continues to pursue its appropriate labors, with its usual good results, and is found to contribute the most important facilities to the improvement of navigation. I cannot better commend it to the regard of Congress than by a reference to the letter of Lieutenant Maury, which accompanies this report.

The first volume of the Nautical Almanac, in charge of Lieutenant Davis, is now in press, and will be given to the public. His report will explain the progress and condition of his work.

Lieutenant Gilliss, who for more than three years past has been employed, in pursuance of the directions of Congress, in conducting in Chili the observations recommended to be made by the American Philosophical Society and the Academy of Arts and Sciences, has recently returned to the United States, bringing with him a rich contribution to science, in a series of observations amounting to nearly forty thousand, and embracing a most extensive catalogue of stars. He deserves great praise for his assiduity in this labor, which, in conjunction with similar observations in other quarters of the globe, will supply important aid towards the determination of the solar parallax, a problem of great interest to navigation and science. Upon the conclusion of his work at Santiago, he was enabled to make a judicious sale of his observatory and its apparatus to the Chilian Government, which has manifested a most friendly interest in his service, and afforded him much useful assistance.

His full report will be made to this Department, and as soon as received will be transmitted to Congress.

Professor Espy during the past year has been, as in the years before it, busy in the pursuit of his meteorological observations and his theory of storms, prosecuting his researches without abatement of zeal or assiduity. He promises soon to give the world another volume of facts and deductions, by which he hopes to bring the laws of the wind and the tempest into the category of an "exact science." His letter appended to this report will explain his progress, and commend his industry to the friendly recognition of Congress.

By the enactment of the naval appropriation bill of August 31, 1852, this Department was authorized and directed "to select a site for a navy-yard and naval depôt in the bay of San Francisco, in California, or neighboring waters."

The board of officers who were dispatched to make the necessary examinations for the selection of this site have performed the task intrusted to them, and have returned to this city. They have not yet entirely completed their report. It will be put in the possession of this Department in a few days, when I shall make it the subject of a special communication to Congress.

I renew the recommendations heretofore made, and now again referred to in the report of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, in favor of such discretionary change in the Navy ration as recent scientific research has proved to be useful, through the process by which vegetables may be preserved for consumption at sea. And I also adopt, and respectfully beg leave to urge upon the attention of the Legislature, the suggestions of the head of that bureau in reference to a prescribed limit on the commutation for stopped rations in money.

Congress having at its last session made a retrospective provision for an increase of pay to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines of the Navy, and to the officers and men of the revenue service, who served in the Pacific ocean, on the coast of California and Mexico, since the 28th of September, 1850, it would seem to be but an equitable act, and strictly in accordance with the liberal design of this provision, to extend its operations so far back in point of time as to embrace the case of those who served on that coast from the origin of the war. Indeed, every consideration which could recommend the policy of the appropriation that was made will be found to apply with increased cogency to those to whom I have alluded. Their service is more severe, their hazards greater, and the expenses to which they were subject in that quarter, when the country was more unprovided than in the subsequent period, were still more onerous. An appropriation in their behalf of a similar character to that which was made in favor of their successors would be an acceptable and just tribute to a corps which has proved itself worthy of the high appreciation of the Government.

The estimates for the support of the Navy and the Marine Corps for the year ending on the 30th day of June, 1854, and the statement of appropriations required for all objects within the control of this Department, present—

An aggregate of.....	$11,501,593 67
Deduct for special objects.....	4,031,921 98
Leaves for the support of the Navy and Marine Corps	7,469,671 69

It is proper to remark, that the large increase in some of the estimates made for the coming year over the actual amounts appropriated for the service of the last two or three years, which it will be found are required for the improvement of yards and docks, construction, equipment, and repair of vessels, the expenses of ordnance, and the encouragement and support of the mail service, has become necessary by the reduction which Congress has hitherto thought proper to make from the estimates submitted for the expenditures which were thought essential to the public service in most of these branches of the naval administration. The appropriations now asked for may, therefore, be regarded as the necessary consequence of such a subtraction from what was deemed but an adequate annual provision for the completion of works of indispensable use. And being viewed in the light of arrears due to the public wants, they furnish no index of what may be the future necessities of the Department if provided for as they arise.

The estimate for the mail service also, being one with which the naval establishment has no proper connection, should not be brought into the account of the expenditures of the Navy.

The total amount drawn from the Treasury during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1852, as shown by the statement of appropriations for the naval service prepared by the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, is.....$9,726,251 42
Deduct repayments..... 813,132 70

Which shows the sum of.....$8,913,118 72 as the total expenditure on all objects under the control of the Navy Department, but of which amount there was expended for special objects the sum of $2,656,066 84, leaving as the true expenditure for the support of the Navy and Marine Corps $6,257,051 88 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1852.

The unexpended balances of appropriations for the naval service, marine corps, and special objects under the control of the Navy Department was, on the 30th of June, 1852, $3,119,644 50, all of which will be required to meet the outstanding obligations due from the appropriations to complete the objects as provided for by the appropriations for that year, in addition to the estimates for the fiscal years ending 30th June, 1853 and 1854.

Accompanying the reports and documents will be found the abstract or compendium of the reports of the chiefs of the bureaus required by the resolution of the Senate of the 26th August, 1852.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN P. KENNEDY.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
December 4, 1852.

SIR: In anticipation of the approaching session of Congress, I respectfully submit the following report of the operations of the Department of the Interior.

The general nature of the duties of this Department has been fully explained in my former reports, and, without repeating what has been said, I will proceed to exhibit, under appropriate heads, a condensed view of its condition and wants.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATION.

To enable you to make a comparison of the estimates for the next fiscal year with those for the present, I submit the following tabular statement:

	1853.	1854.
Department proper.....	$35,827 50	$35,230 00
Land service.....	1,284,916 47	1,077,060 55
Indian affairs.....	1,343,276 36	1,015,735 50
Pension office.....	1,566,040 00	985,846 68
Expenses of U. States courts...	672,053 00	672,900 00
Public buildings.....	418,504 71	1,107,663 00
Penitentiary of the District of Columbia.....	9,210 00	8,890 00
Agricultural statistics.....	5,500 00	7,700 00
Insane paupers.....	10,000 00	10,000 00
Census.....	150,000 00	.....
Mexican Boundary Survey.....	200,000 00	.....
	$5,695,328 04	$4,921,025 71

It will be seen from the foregoing table that the aggregate for the next year is less by $774,302 33 than that for the present. It is proper to remark, however, that the estimates for the land and Indian service are incomplete, for want of precise information, at the time they were prepared, of the amounts which will be required for those objects in California, Oregon, and other remote parts of the country.

The variations in regard to the Department proper and judicial expenses are too small to require detailed explanations.

Large balances of the appropriations for pensions will remain unexpended at the close of the present fiscal year. The amount estimated for that service during the next year is, therefore, less by $580,193 34 than for the present. The estimate for public buildings exceeds that of the present year $689,158 29. This is caused by the introduction of an item of $600,000 for the extension of the Capitol, for which object no estimate was made for the present year. The residue of the excess is for other new objects in the city of Washington, which will be fully explained in the report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings.

The expenses of the Penitentiary have been again reduced, under the judicious management of the present inspectors and warden.

The estimate for agricultural statistics has been increased $2,200. This consists of two items, viz: for salary of a librarian $1,200, and for the purchase of additional books $1,000. No estimates have been submitted for the Census or Mexican boundary survey, because the sums which may be required will depend upon the action of Congress on the recommendations contained in other parts of this report.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office exhibits much diligence and activity in that branch of the public service, and contains important recommendations suggested by experience, to all of which I invite your attention.

The northern boundary of the State of Iowa has been run and marked with unprecedented dispatch, and a full report of the survey will be submitted at an early period of the session of Congress.

The quantity of land sold during the last fiscal year is 1,553,071 acres, being 293,776 acres less than the preceding year. The quantity located with bounty land warrants is 3,201,314 acres, being an increase on the previous year of 747,314 acres. The quantity reported under the swamp-land grants is 5,219,188, and that selected for railroads, &c., is 3,025,920 acres. The aggregate of all the public lands disposed of during the last fiscal year is 13,115,175 acres, being an increase over the previous year of 3,342,372 acres. In consequence of the more advantageous terms upon which lands can be located with bounty land warrants, the sales for cash have been diminished; the quantity sold during the first quarter of the present fiscal year being but little over one half the quantity sold during the corresponding quarter of the present year.

In the first quarter of the present fiscal year there were sold for cash..... 243,255 acres.
Located with bounty land warrants..... 1,387,116 "
Located with other certificates.... 15,649 "
Reported under swamp-land grants 2,485,233 "
Making the aggregate quantity disposed of during the quarter.... 4,131,253 "

If the appropriations by means of sale, locations of bounty land warrants, and selections of swamp lands, and for railroad purposes, &c., should continue in the same proportion during the remaining three quarters, the aggregate quantity of land disposed of during the present year will be sixteen and a half millions of acres.

The whole number of bounty land warrants issued under the acts of February 11, 1847, September 28, 1850, and 22d March, 1852, is 223,007, and the quantity of land called for by them is 22,428,400 acres. Of these warrants 121,026 have been located, covering 14,802,040 acres, and there are yet outstanding 101,981 warrants, which will cover the further quantity of 7,626,360 acres.

A table accompanying the Commissioner's report presents a comprehensive view of the condition of the public lands in the several States.

It shows the entire area in square miles of each State, the quantity of land surveyed, and the quantity which remains yet to be surveyed; the number of acres which have been offered for sale; the number sold; the quantity embraced in donations; grants for schools, universities, asylums for the deaf and dumb; for internal improvements; to individuals and companies; for seats of government and public buildings; for military services; the quantity reserved for salines; for the benefit of Indians; for individuals, companies, and corporations; the area covered by confirmed private claims; the amount of swamp lands granted to each State; the quantity granted for railroad purposes; and the total area remaining unsold and unappropriated.

The report of Dr. D. D. Owen, on the geology of Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota, is now in press, in accordance with the directions of Congress, and a large number of copies will be delivered early in the session. It is believed that the work itself, and the style of its publication, will be satisfactory to the public.

The final report of Messrs. Foster and Whitney on the geology of the Lake Superior region will probably be submitted to Congress during its session.

No progress has yet been made by the Department in the execution of the act of Congress of the last session providing for the redemption of Virginia land warrants with the United States scrip, receivable in payment for the public lands, the State of Virginia not having yet executed the deed of relinquishment, &c., required by the law. Shortly after the passage of the act I addressed the Governor of Virginia on the subject, and in reply was informed that it would be brought to the attention of the Legislature, which is now in session. As soon as the Department shall have been officially advised that the State of Virginia has complied with the terms of the law, prompt measures will be taken for its execution.

In consequence of the allegations made in the year 1837 of errors and imperfections of the public surveys in the Greenburg district, in the State of Louisiana, the land office for that district has been virtually closed since that period. Many of the resurveys authorized by the act of 29th of August, 1842, having been completed, the necessary steps have been recently taken to bring these lands into market at as early a day as practicable.

Sufficient progress having been made in the public surveys in California and Oregon, I respectfully recommend the extension of the present land system over the agricultural lands, and the establishment of land offices for their disposal. With regard to the mineral lands in California, I beg leave to repeat the recommendations contained in my last annual report, with the modification that the privilege of mining be restricted to citizens of the United States, or those persons who may have declared their intention to become such.

PENSION OFFICE.

The report of the Commissioner of Pensions contains full and exact information in regard to the transactions of that office, with many valuable suggestions of amendments of the laws, which deserve the serious consideration of the Legislative Department of the Government.

This bureau has charge of the bounties conferred by Congress on those who have been engaged in the military service of the country, whether given in land or money.

Pensions or pecuniary bounties have been granted to six classes of persons.

First, to soldiers of the revolutionary war; second, to widows of revolutionary soldiers; third, to invalid soldiers; fourth, to widows and orphans of soldiers in the Mexican war; fifth, to certain classes of persons in the naval service; sixth, Virginia half pay and commutation claimants.

The whole number of pensioners now on the rolls exclusive of Navy pensioners, is 18,868, being 743 less than the number reported in 1851.

The number added to the rolls since the last annual report, is 2,011, of which a large proportion consists of invalid pensioners and the widows and orphans of those who died of wounds or disease contracted in the Mexican war.

The deaths of 823 pensioners of various classes have been reported within the last year.

The expenditure on account of pensions since the last report, as far as it can be ascertained from the Treasury Department, is about $1,500,000, embracing many claims allowed before the close of the last but paid within the present year.

The expense of the system continues nearly the same as in former years, nor is it likely to be diminished until Congress shall by further legislation apply the corrective to many of its abuses.

In my last report I called your attention to the propriety of amending the law so as to confine the benefits of the pension laws to those who rendered the service, and to the widows and minor children of such as were dead; and also to the necessity of adopting more efficient measures to prevent frauds under the various pension laws. As nothing was done by Congress in reference to either of these subjects, I respectfully present them again to your notice.

There certainly can be no sufficient reason for giving to adult children or collateral relatives of a deceased soldier a bounty for his military services. The policy of the law should be to assume, to some extent, the natural obligations of the deceased soldier to support his wife and minor children in the event of his death in the public service; but there can be no valid claim on the justice or bounty of the Government to go further and make provision for those whom he was under no obligation to support.

The enactment of more stringent laws to prevent the perpetration of frauds on the Government also demands the prompt and serious attention of Congress. Scarcely a month elapses without the detection and exposure of the basest attempts at imposition by fraud, perjury, and forgery.

In some parts of the country the business has been reduced to a system, and bodies of men have confederated for the purpose of carrying into effect their nefarious schemes, by means so artful as to render detection almost impossible.

No effort has been spared by the Department and the Pension Office to discover and frustrate the purposes of these miscreants, but in consequence of the defects in the law it is not always possible to bring them to justice.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONERS.

In my last report I stated that the whole number of persons who had been pensioned under the act of 18th March, 1818, was 20,485, of whom 1,383 remained on the rolls. Since that date no new pensioners have been added under that law, and the number now remaining on the list is 1,046, showing a reduction of 337 within the year, and of those whose names still continue on it only 339 have received pensions during the first and second quarters of the current fiscal year.

Under the act of 15th May, 1828, which was passed for the benefit of officers and soldiers of the Continental army who served to the end of the war, only 1,168 were pensioned; of that number 128 are still on the rolls, but 42 only have been paid during the first and second quarters of the present year.

The system of revolutionary pensions was greatly extended by the act of 7th June, 1832. At the date of my last report 32,986 persons had received the benefits of that act, of whom 4,813 then continued on the rolls.

Since that date 80 new pensioners have been added, making the aggregate number of persons who had been pensioned under that law 33,066. Of these 4,328 remain on the rolls, but only 1,495 have received payment in the first and second quarters of the year, from which it may be fairly inferred that a large number have died within the year.

WIDOWS OF REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

Under the law of 4th July, 1836, 5,163 persons have been pensioned, of whom 978 remain on the rolls. The act of 7th July, 1838, extended the pension laws to widows of revolutionay soldiers who were married prior to 1794. Under it 11,400 have from time to time been enrolled, but only 162 have been paid during the 1st and 2d quarters of the year.

The number pensioned under the act of 2d January, 1848, is 6,000; and under the act of 29th July, 1848, which extended the period of marriage to the year 1800, the number pensioned was 975. There are now on the rolls under both these acts 5,280 pensioners, of whom 4,209 were paid during the first and second quarters of the year.

At the date of my last report the number on the rolls was 5,254. If, therefore, we assume the payments during the year as the basis for estimating the number who survive, it has been reduced to the extent of 1,045.

MEXICAN WAR PENSIONS.

The whole number of pensions granted under the various acts for the benefit of the widows and orphans of soldiers who were killed in battle, or died from disease contracted in the Mexican war, is 1,890, and the number now on the rolls is 1,123, being 627 less than at the date of my last report.

NAVY PENSIONS.

A detailed statement of the Navy pensions accompanies the Commissioner's report, from which it will appear that there are now on the rolls 726 invalids, who receive annually $45,049 96.

There are also 514 widows, who annually receive $101,490, and 48 orphans, who receive $6,138.

VIRGINIA HALF-PAY COMMUTATION CLAIMS.

The half-pay claims examined and allowed under the act of 5th July, 1832, since the date of the last report, amount to $15,964 73. It is supposed that few valid claims of this character are now outstanding. Some, however, have been presented, which, for various causes, have been suspended.

All claims for commutation pay continue suspended by my order until the further pleasure of Congress shall be made known on the subject. This order by its terms will remain in force until the close of the next session of Congress. If, in the mean time, no action shall be taken by Congress, it may become the duty of the Department to make such disposition of them as justice may seem to require.

MILITARY LAND BOUNTIES.

During the year ending 25th October, 1852, land warrants have issued on account of revolutionary claims, as follows:

3 for lieutenants, of 200 acres each..	600 acres.
12 for non-commissioned officers and soldiers, of 100 acres each.....	1,200 acres.
135 warrants of 160 acres each, issued under the acts of Congress, of December 24th, 1811, and January, 1812.....	21,600 acres.
And 7 warrants of 320 acres each, issued under act of Congress of December 10, 1814, equal to.....	2,240 acres.

There have been issued in the same period 39 new certificates of right to locate land warrants of 160 acres each, which issued under acts of 24th December, 1811, and 11th January, 1812, but for which no patents have been granted, 6,240 acres.

Also, two new certificates of right to locate land warrants of 320 acres each, under act of December 10, 1814, upon which no patent had issued, 640 acres.

The aggregate of warrants thus issued for revolutionary service, and service in the war of 1812, is 32,520 acres.

MEXICAN WAR BOUNTY LAND ACT.

The claims under the act of 11th February, 1847, known as the Mexican land bounty law, which were filed prior to the 31st October last, amount to.....89,377,
Filed for scrip in lieu of land bounty..... 4,347

Number of land warrants issued...83,088
Issued for money and scrip..... 3,234
	86,322
Leaving suspended, for various reasons..		7,402

The operations during the year under the same act are as follows, viz:

Applications for land.....3,485
For scrip or money..... 90
	3,575
Warrants issued for land.....2,307
Warrants for scrip or money..... 61
Suspended claims.....		1,207

The number of appropriations under the act of 11th February, 1847, has increased in consequence of the repeal of the last proviso of the 9th section, by the passage of the act of 22d March, 1852.

BOUNTY LAND LAWS OF 28TH SEPTEMBER, 1850, AND 22D MARCH, 1852.

The execution of these laws have been steadily progressing. Up to the present time the number of cases received and registered amounts to about 200,000—

Of which there have been admitted....140,058
Now on the files for examination.....4,531
Suspended for future proof.....55,111
	199,700

Warrants are issued daily for all admitted cases. The number of new applications amounts to about one hundred per day.

The quantity of land required to satisfy the warrants issued up to the 1st of November, 1852, amounts to 9,935,320 acres, which, at the minimum price of $1 25 per acre, would be worth $12,419,150.

Under the act of 22d March, 1852, there have been received and registered 7,655 cases, of which there have been admitted 2,341, leaving still to be acted on 5,314. To satisfy the claims issued under this act, 143,600 acres of land will be required.

The report of the Commissioner contains some important suggestions in regard to proposed changes in the laws relating to pensions. In addition to those already alluded to, I would invite your particular attention to the propriety of reënacting a provision requiring biennial examinations, by competent medical officers, of all invalid pensioners, and a report as to the condition of their health. The law of 1819 contained a provision of this kind which was found to work well in practice, but it was incautiously repealed by the act of 4th July, 1832. Some such measure is indispensable to protect the Government against imposition.

No material reduction has been made in the clerical force of the Pension Office since the date of my last report; but as the bounty land cases will soon be disposed of, the services of many of the clerks can be dispensed with at an early day.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

For detailed information in regard to the condition of our Indian relations I respectfully refer to the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

In my last annual communication I explained somewhat at large my views of the policy which should regulate our intercourse with the Indian tribes. It was in substance that our efforts should be directed to their civilization, and the amelioration of their condition, rather than to measures of coercion. It is not only more just and humane, but more economical, to win them by kindness, and to encourage them to engage in pastoral and agricultural pursuits and relinquish their nomadic and predatory life, than to subdue and restrain them by military force. I still adhere to these opinions, and respectfully refer to my last report for a more detailed exposition of them.

The amendments to the treaties with the Sioux Indians in Minnesota, which were proposed by the Senate, have been submitted to the proper authorities of the tribes and acceded to by them, and their title to a valuable district of country has thereby been extinguished.

In consequence of the rejection of all the treaties which had been negotiated with the Indian tribes resident in California and Oregon, our relations with them are of a very unsettled and precarious character. It is believed that those treaties were rejected, not so much on account of objections to their details as to the leading principles embraced in them, which secured particular districts of country for the exclusive occupancy of the Indians. Until the Senate shall have announced some line of policy to be pursued on that subject, it would be worse than useless to attempt further negotiations. If the Indians are to be removed out of California and Oregon, it will be for Congress to say so, and to provide for them some place of refuge. Or if any particular districts of country within their limits, more remote from the settlements of the whites, are to be set apart for them, it is proper that Congress, which is alone invested with the power of disposing of the public domain, should make the necessary provisions on the subject.

The Department has endeavored assiduously to conciliate the Indians by kindness, and to prevent those hostilities which we had just cause to apprehend. So far these efforts have been in a great measure successful. There is reason to fear, however, that if measures are not speedily adopted to declare by law what is to be the extent of the rights of the Indians, and to protect them from aggression, collisions and bloodshed will ensue.

The removal of the remnant of the tribe of the Seminole Indians has long been a cherished object of the Government, and the Department has spared no pains to accomplish it. Admonished by experience of the cost of blood and treasure which must attend the repetition of the attempt to expel them by military force, it was thought to be more consistent with humanity and sound policy to try the effect of peaceful measures. A special agent was therefore employed to go among them and endeavor to induce them to emigrate voluntarily. To give greater force to his representations of the benefits likely to ensue from such a measure, he took with him a delegation of Seminole Indians who had previously removed to the country west of the Mississippi. Their united persuasions have had the effect which was anticipated, and recently several of the principal chiefs of the Florida tribe visited Washington, and while here acknowledged, in writing, their obligation to remove. Late advices from the special agent assures that they still adhere to their engagement; that a meeting of the tribe has been called to make the necessary preparations; and that their removal may be confidently expected at an early day.

Such a result will be a matter of much interest to the people of Florida, as it will not only relieve them from apprehension of danger to their persons and property, but will open an extensive district of country for settlement and cultivation.

CENSUS.

The report of the Superintendent of the Census will show that the greater part of the labor of compiling and classifying the returns has been completed; and the publication can now be commenced, as the residue can be finished and placed in the hands of the publisher from time to time as he may require.

It is estimated that an additional appropriation of fifty thousand dollars will be necessary to prepare the entire work, consisting of two large volumes, for the press.

As some objections have been urged to that part of the plan which contemplates a condensed notice of the geographical features and history of each county, I beg leave to suggest one or two reasons which have led me to believe that it would be eminently useful. In the early settlement of our country, when the population was thinly scattered over a wide extent of territory, but few counties were established.

As population increased, and the public convenience rendered it necessary, these counties were divided and subdivided, until at the present day many of them do not embrace one twentieth part of their original territory. This process must continue to go on for many years to come. When, therefore, an attempt is made to ascertain the progress in wealth and population of any county thus situated, by reference to its condition at each successive decennial census, the inquirer is involved in confusion, and will naturally lose all confidence in the accuracy of the returns, unless he has the means of ascertaining the subdivisions which have taken place, and the counties or parts of counties which have been taken from those which were originally established, and the dates of the successive divisions.

Such a condensed history will also furnish great facilities in tracing the titles to lands. In the State of Virginia, for example, it would be easy to refer to counties, which have been recently formed, whose land titles are to be found scattered through the records of ten or more different counties, of which it has from time to time constituted a part.

The laws of most of the States require conveyances to be recorded in the county in which, for the time being, the land lies. In the various changes which have taken place by the formation of new counties, a tract of land may have been embraced at different times by ten or more different counties.

Every successive conveyance of this land must consequently be recorded in the office of the county in which at that date the land was situated. In seeking, therefore, to investigate the title to a tract of land at the present day, it often becomes necessary not only to ascertain in what county the land was situated at the date of the patent, but to trace all its divisions and subdivisions through a long series of years, step by step, to the present time, in order to ascertain whether the intermediate conveyances have been properly executed and recorded. This information cannot readily be obtained, and the effort to procure it is sometimes attended with great labor and expense. The introductory notices of the counties which it is proposed to prefix to the census will furnish it at a glance; and I am persuaded that there is no portion of the work which will be more acceptable to the public at large.

It will certainly rescue from oblivion, and perpetuate in a convenient and useful form, much valuable information bearing on the history and progress of our country. Great pains have been taken to secure perfect accuracy in this branch of the work.

It is proposed that in every instance the notice of each county shall be transmitted not only to the clerk of the county, with a view to a comparison with his official records, but also that it shall be carefully revised by the proper executive officers of the State.

Objections have also been taken to the publication of the census on the plan proposed, on the score of the large expense which it would involve.

As great misapprehension seems to have prevailed on this subject, I have thought it expedient to institute inquiries to ascertain, first, what would be the actual cost of publishing the entire work in the comprehensive form proposed by the Superintendent, and in a style creditable to the Government; and, second, what would be its cost as compared with the publication in a greatly inferior style of the meager return of the sixth census.

By reference to the Treasury Department, it has been ascertained that the cost of the publication of the sixth census was as follows:

To amount paid Blair & Rives for publishing 10,000 copies of statistical returns of the sixth cencus.....	$137,316 64
To amount paid Blair & Rives, and Allen & Co. for 30,000 copies of Compendium.....	24,773 86
Cost of binding.....	16,712 97
Aggregate cost of publication	$178,803 47

Lippincott & Co. now propose to publish 10,000 copies of the statistics of the seventh census, in two folio volumes of 1,000 pages each, on fine type and paper, well bound with Russia backs, for the aggregate sum of $49,500, being less than one third of the amount paid for the publication of the sixth census. The objection, therefore, on the score of expense is proved to be unfounded.

THE PATENT OFFICE.

The report of the Commissioner of Patents, which is made directly to Congress, will contain full and detailed statements of the operations of that bureau.

The eastern wing of the noble structure, erected and ultimately to be used for purposes connected with the industrial pursuits of our country, will soon be completed and ready for occupation. Some progress has also been made upon the basement of the western wing, and a large quantity of material has been collected with a view to the vigorous prosecution of the work next spring. The basement of the principal building has been greatly improved by dressing the rough stone of which it was built, so as to make it conform in its general appearance to similar portions of the newly-erected building.

There is probably no bureau connected with the Government in whose operations the public at large feel a deeper interest than those of the Patent Office. It is inseparably associated with every interest of our country. The mechanic, the merchant, the manufacturer, and the farmer, are all concerned in everything which diminishes the labor of production in any of the departments of industry. Our people are eminently practical and ingenious. They are constantly employed in the discovery of new means of accomplishing important results at a diminished cost of time, labor, and money. The steam-engine, the cotton-gin, and the magnetic telegraph, are striking and imperishable memorials of the success which has attended their efforts. In the early period of our history, when population was sparse and the prices of agricultural productions high, the labor of the country was directed mainly to the cultivation of the soil. But, as population progressively increases, more attention is devoted to mechanical pursuits and the invention of machinery by which the work of many may be accomplished by a few. Not a day passes without furnishing some evidence of this fact in the form of applications for patents for important inventions and discoveries. The mechanical interest has therefore become one of great magnitude, and it is justly entitled to all the protection and assistance which can be bestowed by Congress consistently with the provisions of the Constitution.

The general principles of our patent system seem to have met with universal approbation, and to have been attended with beneficent results in practice. Since the organization of the office in 1836 it has advanced with rapid strides. At that date one "examining clerk" was enabled to make all the preliminary investigations which were required to ascertain whether the applicant was entitled to a patent; but such has been the increase of the business that six principal examiners and as many assistants are not now able to keep pace with it. The number of models in the office on the 1st day of January, 1836, was 1,069. In the beginning of the year 1851 they had increased to 17,257, and at the close of the present year they will fall but little short of 23,000. If they should continue to increase in this proportion, making no allowance for the augmentation consequent on the increase of population, by the close of the present century they will amount to 150,000, and the whole of the present Patent Office edifice will not be sufficient for their convenient display. To provide against this contingency, as well as to accomplish other important results, I respectfully propose that the Commissioner of Patents be required to have prepared for publication a careful analytical and descriptive index of all discoveries and inventions which have been patented, accompanied by accurate descriptions and drawings which will fully explain the principles and practical operation of the subject of the patent. The advantages of such a publication would be almost incalculable. It would not only perpetuate the invention or discovery by avoiding the casualties by fire and other causes, but it would multiply and diffuse among the people at large the specifications and descriptions, and substantially bring home to every neighborhood to which a copy of the work might be sent the benefits of the Patent Office. In much the larger number of cases the necessity for preserving and displaying the models would be obviated. The pages of the published report would be a safer and more convenient depository for them than the cabinets of the Patent Office, and they would be accessible to everybody. Inventors in remote parts of the country would be placed on an equal footing with those residing near the seat of Government. When their thoughts were turned to a particular class of machinery, instead of being compelled to make a journey to Washington to see what had already been done in that department of the arts, they could at once turn to the analytical index and ascertain what progress had been made by others.

Under the present system it not unfrequently happens that ingenious persons having conceived what they believe to be a new idea, which, when carried into practice, will be of great value, employ much of their time, labor, and money, in perfecting their invention, and when it is finished they come to Washington filled with the hope of those rewards which crown the labors of the successful inventor. Their application for a patent is presented, and submitted to an experienced and skillful examiner, who promptly refers the anxious applicant to a drawing or a model, which shows him that his ideas have been anticipated by another, and reduced to practice many years before. None but those who have taken pains to inquire into the subject can form an adequate idea of the amount of time, money, and labor, which is uselessly expended under circumstances like these, to say nothing of the anxiety of mind and heart, sickening disappointment, all of which might be saved if such a descriptive index as I propose were readily accessible to the public. The publication of it would also tend to stimulate the inventive genius of the country, and lead not only to the development of new agents and processes, but to valuable improvements upon those which have already been brought into practical operation. It is hardly necessary to add that such a work would be of great value in the investigation by courts of justice of legal controversies involving the rights of patentees.

When the index is completed up to the close of the present year, it will be easy, by an annual publication of an appendix to the ordinary report from the Patent Office, to furnish a complete record of the inventions and discoveries of each successive year.

To be of value, such an index should be prepared by a person fully competent to the task, and illustrated and printed, and bound in a style worthy of the subject and of the nation. It would doubtless be attended with a large expense, but it could readily be paid out of the patent fund without encroaching on the national Treasury, and I can conceive of no purpose to which that fund could be applied which would be more acceptable to inventors, and in all respects so appropriate, as in perpetuating and diffusing the knowledge of their labors, and presenting to the public a full description of the existing condition of the mechanic arts and the kindred branches of science in our country.

The report of Mr. Stansbury on the London Industrial Exhibition of 1851, to which allusion was made in my last annual report, has been delayed by causes beyond his control. It will be ready to be laid before Congress in the course of a few weeks, and will doubtless be a valuable and interesting document.

MEXICAN BOUNDARY.

The latest advices from the Commissioner contain the gratifying intelligence that the survey of the river Gila, from its confluence with the Colorado to the point where it strikes the western boundary of New Mexico, has been completed. Much progress has also been made in the survey of the Rio Grande. When last heard from the parties under the immediate command of Major Emory had finished the work, from the point agreed on by the Commissioners as the beginning point on the river, to Eagle Pass; and it is presumed that by this time the survey has been completed at least two thirds of the distance down the course of the river.

I am not aware that any further progress has been made in the survey of those portions of the line which lie between the Rio Grande and the Gila, and which constitute the southern and western boundaries of New Mexico. A party had been organized, however, for that purpose; and it is possible that it may have been employed in that service before the Commissioner was advised of the action of Congress on the subject at its last session, and ordered to discontinue his operations.

If such should prove to be the fact, I will avail myself of the earliest opportunity to communicate to you all that has been done, to enable you to lay it before Congress.

Before proceeding to present more in detail the views of the Department in reference to the various questions arising out of the survey of the boundary, I feel it to be due alike to myself and the public to correct an inaccuracy which accidentally occurred in my last report, in regard to the latitude of certain points referred to, which was occasioned by an error of the clerk who was requested to fill two blanks in the original draft of the report. But, although the error was too palpable to mislead any one, and susceptible of ready correction by reference to the map, I avail myself of the earliest opportunity to put the matter right upon the record.

The mistake occurs in the following paragraph:

"Difficulties also existed in regard to the point where the Rio Grande strikes the southern line of New Mexico. By the map it appears to be at latitude 31° 45′, whereas the true position is latitude 32° 22′."

The facts of the case are as follows: The southern line of New Mexico is laid down on the map of Disturnell, as nearly as can be ascertained by measurement, in latitude north 32° 22½′, and the town of El Paso appears, by similar measurement, to be in latitude north 32° 15½′, and longitude 27° 35′ west of Washington. This would make the line, according to the map, about seven minutes (or seven geographical miles) north of El Paso, or a fraction of a minute north of 32° 22′, as agreed on by the Commissioners.

By actual observation, however, it was ascertained that El Paso is erroneously placed on the map, both in respect to latitude and longitude; its true position being in latitude north 31° 45′, or a fraction more than half a degree south of its position as marked by Disturnell, and in longitude 29° 40′, instead of 27° 35′ west of Washington, or two degrees and five minutes west of its position according to the map.

The law of the last session of Congress, making the appropriation for the continuation of the survey, is in the following words:

"For running and marking the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, one hundred and twenty thousand dollars: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used or expended until it shall be made satisfactorily to appear to the President of the United States that the southern boundary of New Mexico is not established by the Commissioner and Surveyor of the United States further north of the town called Paso than the same is laid down in Disturnell's map, which is added to the treaty."

After mature deliberation, I came to the conclusion that, under the terms of the proviso to this appropriation, no part of the money appropriated could be used or expended; and on the 11th day of October, 1852, I made a report to you to that effect, in which conclusion you expressed your concurrence by an indorsement on the report, dated 13th October, 1852.

A copy of that report and indorsement are appended to this communication.

On the 15th October I addressed a letter to the Commissioner, inclosing a copy of the report and of your indorsement, and informing him that it would not be proper for him to make any further drafts upon the Department, as the available funds had been exhausted. But as I knew that large amounts of provisions had been sent to Presidio del Norte, Eagle Pass, and Fort Brown opposite Matamoros, for the use of the surveying parties along the course of the Rio Grande, and as the Commissioner and Major Emory were in possession of funds raised upon drafts previously drawn upon the Department, I left it to their discretion whether it would be best to disband the Commission at once, or to continue their operations on the river as long as the means at their disposal would enable them to maintain their respective parties in the field.

On this point it was impossible for the Department to form at satisfactory opinion with the limited information in its possession. But, as there could be no controversy in relation to that part of the line, I considered it very desirable not to arrest the survey of it. Peremptory instructions were, however, given to the Commissioner to discontinue all further operations on the southern and western lines of New Mexico, which constitute the disputed portion of the boundary, until further action should be taken by Congress. A copy of that letter also accompanies this report.

As there has been some misunderstanding in regard to the course of the Department on the subject of the initial point on the Rio Grande, and the line thence, westward, which constitutes the southern boundary of New Mexico, I deem it proper to give a full history of all that has been done by the Department in regard to it, and an explanation of the reasons which have controlled its action. The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, provides that—

"The boundary line between the two Republics shall commence in the Gulf of Mexico, three leagues from land, opposite the mouth of the Rio Grande, otherwise called the Rio Bravo del Norte, or opposite the mouth of its deepest branch, if it should have more than one branch, emptying directly into the sea; from thence up the middle of that river, following the deepest channel, where it has more than one, to the point where it strikes the southern boundary of New Mexico; thence westwardly, along the whole southern boundary of New Mexico (which runs north of the town called Paso) to its western termination; thence northward along the western line of New Mexico, until it intersects the first branch of the river Gila; (or, if it should not intersect any branch of that river, then to the point on the said line nearest to such branch, and thence in a direct line to the same;) thence down the middle of the said branch and of the said river, until it empties into the Rio Colorado; thence across the Rio Colorado, following the division line between Upper and Lower California, to the Pacific ocean.

"The southern and western limits of New Mexico mentioned in this article are those laid down in the map entitled 'Map of the United Mexican States, as organized and defined 'by various acts of the Congress of said Republic, and constructed according to the best authorities, revised edition, 'published at New York in 1847, by J. Disturnell;' of which map a copy is added to this treaty, bearing the signatures and seals of the undersigned plenipotentiaries; and, in order to preclude all difficulty in tracing upon the ground the limit separating Upper from Lower California, it is agreed that the said limit shall consist of a straight line drawn from the middle of the Rio Gila, where it unites with the Colorado, to a point on the coast of the Pacific ocean distant one marine league due south of the southernmost point of the port of San Diego, according to the plan of said port made in the year 1782, by Don Juan Pantoga, second sailing master of the Spanish fleet, and published at Madrid in the year 1802, in the atlas to the voyage of the schooners Sutil and Mexicana, of which plan a copy is hereunto added, signed and sealed by the respective plenipotentiaries.

"In order to designate the boundary line with due precision upon authoritative maps, and to establish upon the ground land-marks which shall show the limits of both republics, as described in the present article, the two Governments shall each appoint a Commissioner and a Surveyor, who, before the expiration of one year from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty, shall meet at the port of San Diego, and proceed to run and mark the said boundary in its whole course to the mouth of the Rio Bravo del Norte. They shall keep journals and make out plans of their operations, and the result agreed upon by them shall be deemed a part of this treaty, and shall have the same force as if it were inserted therein. The two Governments will amicably agree regarding what may be necessary to these persons, and also as to their respective escorts, should such be necessary.

"The boundary line established by this article shall be religiously respected by each of the two Republics, and no change shall ever be made therein, except by the express and free consent of both nations, lawfully given by the General Government of each, in conformity with its own Constitution."

In pursuance of these stipulations, after having completed the survey of the line from the Pacific coast to the junction of the Gila and the Colorado rivers, the Joint Commission reassembled at El Paso in December, 1850.

So far as this Department is advised, the southern boundary of New Mexico was, at the date of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, a mere imaginary geographical line, which had never been surveyed or marked under the authority of the Mexican Government. The point where this line strikes the Rio Grande had never been designated with precision, and it could therefore be ascertained only by determining its relative position to other points which were known and determined. Much controversy arose on this subject, and serious apprehensions were at one time entertained whether the Commissioners could come to any satisfactory agreement.

Finally, however, they agreed that it should be established in latitude north 32° 22′, and on the 24th of April, 1851, the Commissioners, and other persons attached to the Commission, assembled on the ground, and it was publicly proclaimed that that should be the initial point of boundary on the Rio Grande, and a monument was erected to mark the spot.

A written convention to that effect was also drawn up and signed by the two Commissioners and by the Surveyor on the part of Mexico, and by Lieutenant A. W. Whipple, the Acting Surveyor on the part of the United States. At the date of this convention, Mr. A. B. Gray, who had been appointed Surveyor on behalf of the United States, had not arrived at El Paso, and, to avoid the delay and inconvenience that would ensue from awaiting his arrival, it was agreed by the two Commissioners that Lieutenant Whipple, who was the Acting Surveyor, should officiate in his place. When Mr. Gray joined the Commissioners, about the 19th of July, 1851, he was requested by Commissioner Bartlett, out of abundant caution, to attach his signature to the convention, so as to remove all possible objection which might be raised to the agreement, on the ground that it had not been authenticated in exact conformity with the words of the treaty. Mr. Gray, however, refused to sign the agreement, and that fact was communicated to this Department by a dispatch from the Commissioner. As I foresaw that any difficulty which might arise on this point would necessarily affect our relations with Mexico, I felt it to be my duty to bring the subject to the attention of the late Secretary of State, (Mr. Webster,) and to ask his advice as to what course it was proper for me to pursue. We examined the provisions of the treaty together, and concurred in the opinion that the Commissioners alone were empowered to decide upon all disputes which might arise in regard to the boundary, and that the Surveyors were mere ministerial agents to carry into effect the decisions of the Commissioners, and to authenticate them by their signatures. We regarded the relative functions of the Commissioners and Surveyors as bearing a strong analogy to the duties of a commissioner and surveyor appointed under an order of court, to make partition of a tract of land between two joint owners. It is the province of the commissioner to decide where the dividing line shall run, and of the surveyor to run and mark it in conformity with his decision.

The signatures of both, however, are very properly required to authenticate the report, and to show that it correctly sets forth the action of both. In conformity with this view of the subject, the Secretary of State advised me to request Mr. Gray to sign the agreement fixing the initial point, and a letter to that effect was accordingly addressed by me to Mr. Gray, on the 31st day of October, 1851.

As the object of this letter seems to have been misunderstood by many persons whose opinions are entitled to respect, I deem the present a suitable occasion to remove all doubts on the subject. In my judgment, neither the Department of the Interior, nor the Executive, nor Congress, have any power to regulate or control the action of the officers designated by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo to perform the duty of ascertaining and marking on the surface of the earth the line between the two countries.

These officers derive their authority from the treaty itself, which is the joint act of the two contracting parties, and not from their respective Governments. Their functions are those of arbitrators, and their decision is in the nature of an award, which neither party can set aside; and accordingly by the terms of the treaty, it is expressly stipulated that "the result agreed on by them shall be deemed a part of this treaty, and shall have the same force as if it were inserted therein."

In view of this clear and distinct provision, for the observance of which the national faith has been solemnly pledged, the Department of the Interior has not claimed or exercised any right to interfere with the action of the Commissioners. It has expressed no official opinion as to the correctness or incorrectness of the point agreed upon by the Commissioners as to the beginning point on the Rio Grande of the southern line of New Mexico; and if I had been satisfied that their decision was clearly erroneous, I did not conceive that it was competent for me to alter or modify, in any particular, what had been done by them. With the distinct declaration of the treaty before me, that "the result agreed upon by them shall be deemed a part of this treaty, and shall have the same force as if it were inserted therein," it would have been strange if I had asserted any such right.

But it has been contended that the letter to Mr. Gray necessarily involves such a pretension. I certainly had no such purpose in writing that letter; on the contrary, my object was clearly to intimate to Mr. Gray that he had neither coequal powers with the Commissioners, nor supervisory control over their action, and that, although his signature might be necessary for the formal authentication of the convention between the two Commissioners, it was not essential to its validity, in like manner as the signature of the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States may be necessary to a formal certificate of a judgment of the court to an inferior tribunal; and yet the absence of that signature does not in anywise affect the validity of the judgment itself.

The objection to the action of the Department proceeds upon the idea that the Commission contemplated by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo consisted of four members, viz: two Commissioners and two Surveyors, all possessing equal powers. If such be the true construction of the treaty, then I acknowledge I have, in common with the late Secretary of State and his predecessor, (Mr. Buchanan,) misunderstood its provisions.

It will be recollected that the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, which was proclaimed on the 4th day of July, 1848, was negotiated and concluded under instructions issued by Mr. Buchanan. The Commission to run and mark the boundary line was organized under his immediate supervision, by the appointment of Mr. Weller as Commissioner, and Mr. Gray as Surveyor.

That Mr. Buchanan did not regard the Surveyor as possessing equal powers with the Commissioner, or as being an associate Commissioner, is obvious from the fact that all his instructions as to the mode of performing that duty were addressed to the Commissioner alone, and not to the Commissioner and Surveyor jointly. The language of the instructions tends also strongly to repel such a presumption. In his letter to the Commissioner, under date of February 13, 1849, he says:

"As you will be held responsible for the able and faithful execution of the important trust confided to you by this article of the treaty, the President deems it proper to leave to you the organization of the Commission."

Again he says, in the same letter:

"In organizing the Commission, you are referred for any information which you may deem necessary to Andrew B. Gray, Esq., who has been appointed Surveyor."

After the transfer of this service from the State Department to the Department of the Interior, my predecessor, Mr. Ewing, following the interpretation which had been given to the treaty by the Department of State, directed all his instructions to the Commissioner alone, and not to the Commissioner and Surveyor jointly, and I have continued to pursue the same course.

The records of the Department contain nothing to show that while Mr. Weller held the office of Commissioner there was any claim set up by the Surveyor to be an associate Commissioner, or to have power to revise and annul the official acts of the Commissioner by withholding his signature from the record of them. The records show that the Surveyors did not participate in the deliberations of the Joint Commission. They performed none of the functions of commissioners, and gave no votes upon any controverted questions. The Commissioners alone decided upon every question involving the exercise of judgment, and the Surveyors were the operative agents to run and mark the line, in conformity with the principles established by the Commissioners.

The Surveyors did not even attend the sessions of the Commission, except when their presence was required to give information to the Commissioners, or to authenticate the necessary records, as required by the treaty.

In confirmation of this view of the relative duties of the Commissioner and Surveyor, it is proper to remark that the clause in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo which provides for a Commission to run and mark the dividing line between the two countries is a literal transcript, except as to names, of the convention for marking the boundary between the United States and Texas, concluded on the 25th of April, 1838. The provisions of that treaty are as follows:

"Art. 1. Each of the contracting parties shall appoint a Commissioner and Surveyor, who shall meet before the termination of twelve months from the exchange of the ratifications of this convention at New Orleans, and proceed to run and mark that portion of the said boundary which extends from the mouth of the Sabine, where that river enters the Gulf of Mexico, to the Red river. They shall make out plans and keep journals of their proceedings, and the result agreed upon by them shall be considered as part of this convention, and shall have the same force as if it were inserted therein.

"The two Governments will amicably agree respecting the necessary articles to be furnished to those persons, and also as to their respective escorts, should such be deemed necessary."

Under this convention John H. Overton was appointed Commissioner, and John K. Conway Surveyor on the part of the United States; and Memucan Hunt Commissioner, and G. W. Smyth (and subsequently Andrew B. Gray) Surveyor on the part of Texas.

The following extracts from the instructions given by Mr. Forsyth, then Secretary of State of the United States, to "John H. Overton, Esq., Commissioner for marking the boundary line between Texas and the United States," will show what the Department then understood to be the nature and extent of the powers of the Commissioner and Surveyor:

"Upon yourself, jointly with the Texan Commissioner, will devolve the duties of conducting the proceedings of the Commission, of instructing the Surveyors on both sides as to their actual operations in the field, and of assigning to the clerks the duties properly appertaining to their offices. If any question should arise from conflicting views between yourself and the Texan Commissioner, the duty will be yours carefully to investigate the grounds of your own opinions, and when fully convinced of their correctness, and of the fairness of the claims which they will induce you to set up on the part of the United States, to advocate their adoption by every proper argument, drawn from the letter and spirit of the provisions of the treaties. As it would not be consistent with the established principles of the Government to advance any pretensions on the part of the United States not founded in strict fairness and justice, it will be equally essential not to admit on the part of Texas any claim not founded in the same principle."

Again:

"The President confidently relies upon your prudence and judgment, as upon the hearty cooperation of the United States Surveyor, whom in turn you are expected personally to attend, direct, and assist in the performance of his duties, for the proper advocacy of the rights and interests of your country as secured by the treaties. He is obliged the more to confide in your discretion, scrutiny, and patriotic zeal, from the impossibility of foreseeing whether any, and if any, what questions may arise, and from the consequent necessity of leaving you, in a great degree, to exercise your judgment in the discussion and solution of them."

From these quotations, it is obvious that the treaty of 1838 was construed by Mr. Forsyth, precisely as its counterpart has been by Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Ewing, and myself.

That the Mexican Government has also understood it in the same way, is manifest from the fact that it has devolved the duties of Commissioner and Surveyor upon the same individual, General Salazar. If Mexico had regarded the Surveyor as an associate Commissioner, it is hardly to be supposed that she would have been willing to dispense with his services, and to confide her interests to a single Commissioner, while the United States had two on the ground.

Understanding the claim set up by Mr. Gray to invalidate the action of the Commissioner by withholding his signature from the agreement entered into between them, as necessarily involving a right on his part to exercise a supervisory and controlling power over the Commissioner, I deemed it my duty, in conformity with what appeared to be the true interpretation of the treaty and the unbroken chain of precedents under various Administrations, to express my dissent from his pretensions.

With regard to the question, whether the point at which the Rio Grande "strikes the southern boundary of New Mexico" has been correctly established or not, I have not felt myself called on to express an opinion. The treaty has conferred upon me no jurisdiction over the subject. If an error has been committed, I have no power to correct it; or if, on the other hand, it has been correctly ascertained, no expression of opinion by me to that effect could add anything to its validity. Having done all that I conceived I had the power to do, officially, on the subject, it must be referred to other departments of the Government to devise and adopt such further measures in regard to it as the interests of the country may require.

I deem it my duty, however, to request you to recommend to Congress a modification of the proviso to the last appropriation at an early day, so as to relieve the persons attached to the Commission from the embarrassment to which they have been subjected by the want of money to pay them, and also to relieve the Government from the discredit which has been brought upon it by the protest of the drafts of its accredited agents. Five months have elapsed since the close of the last fiscal year, during all which time the officers and employés of the Commission have been diligently engaged in the discharge of their respective duties, in the full confidence that Congress would make the necessary appropriations to defray their expenses and compensate them for their services. This just expectation has been disappointed. No part of the appropriation for the current fiscal year can be applied to their payment.

They are left in the wilderness, many of them two thousand miles from home, without any provision having been made by law for their support where they are now stationed, and with no means furnished to enable them to return to their families. They are now subsisting on funds borrowed on their individual credit, or raised on drafts drawn by the Commissioner and Surveyor before notice of the proviso to the appropriation, several of which have been presented to the Department and protested for non-payment. This is a case which calls for prompt action on the part of Congress, and I cannot permit myself to doubt that your recommendation to that effect will be responded to without delay.

It will also be necessary to make further provision by law for running and marking the residue of the line between the two countries, in accordance with the terms of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

THE EXTENSION OF THE CAPITOL AND RECONSTRUCTION OF THE LIBRARY.

The work upon the extension of the Capitol has advanced with as much rapidity as was consistent with its proper execution. The massive foundations have been completed; the arches between the inside walls of the sub-basement have all been turned and the spandrels filled with cement and brick, and the whole overlaid by a pavement upon which the tiling will rest. A large part of the granite work has also been done, and portions of the walls of the principal basement have been built of the beautiful marble which was selected as the material for the exterior surface of the edifice. The arrangements for the new library room are also nearly completed, with the exception of the painting and gilding. The galleries, piers, alcoves, columns, doors, stairways, shelving, ceiling, consoles, and indeed all of the new fixtures, are of iron. The trusses of the roof are also of iron, covered with copper; so that no combustible material is used in any part of it. The plan of this work was designed, and the drawings and specifications in detail were prepared, by Mr. Thomas U. Walter, the architect of the extension of the Capitol, and the execution of them was intrusted to Messrs. Beebe & Co., of New York. When completed, it will present the first specimen of a room constructed entirely of iron, and I think I may add that, for convenience and beauty of arrangement, it will be without a rival. The workmanship is of the most admirable quality; and when we look at it as it now stands, and reflect that it consists of more than ten thousand separate pieces, of an aggregate weight of four hundred tons, and that it was planned in Washington and executed in New York, more than two hundred miles from the hall in which it was to be placed; and when we see that every part of it fits together with the precision of cabinet work, we are at a loss whether to ascribe most honor and praise to the genius and taste of the architect who conceived and marked out the design, or to the skill and fidelity of the contractors who performed the work.

The damage done to the outside of the western front of the Capitol by the fire of December, 1851, which was more extensive than was at first supposed, has been repaired, and the building rendered as permanent and free from blemish as before the accident occurred.

HOUSES FOR THE VICE PRESIDENT AND CABINET.

Before closing this my last annual report, I feel impelled by a sense of public duty to invite your attention to another subject, to which, under different circumstances, I would not have alluded.

I refer to the propriety of an appropriation by Congress of a sum sufficient to erect and furnish suitable houses for the accommodation of the Vice President of the United States and the members of the Cabinet. At the time our Government went into operation and the salaries of those officers were fixed by law, they were adequate for their comfortable support. But in consequence of the great increase of the supply of the precious metals and the expansion of the currency by means of banks, the relative value of money has been so much reduced that six thousand dollars now is not worth much more than three thousand was at that time. The cost of house-rent, provisions, fuel, and indeed of all the necessaries of life in Washington, has risen to such a degree as to require the most rigid economy to enable the members of the Cabinet and the Vice President to live within their incomes. As far as my observation has extended, few, if any of them, have been able to do so. This evil is increasing every year, and if measures are not adopted to arrest it, the day is not far distant when men of moderate means, but in all respects fitted to serve the public in high and responsible places, will be deterred from accepting them by the heavy pecuniary loss to which they must inevitably be subjected. I am far from wishing to see extravagant salaries paid to public officers. But I think the laborer is worthy of his hire; and I am sure the American people would not desire to see the public functionaries impoverished in their service. They are willing that they shall receive such compensation as will enable them to live in a style becoming their position, without invading their private resources. The high offices of the country should be open to the poor as well as the rich; but the practical effect of the present rate of compensation will soon be to exclude from the Executive councils all who have not ample resources independently of their official salaries.

After much reflection, I have come to the conclusion that the best means of remedying the evil will be to erect suitable houses for the Vice President and the members of the Cabinet, and provide them with the necessary furniture, fuel, and lights. There are many reasons which might be urged in favor of this measure; but it will answer my purpose barely to allude to a few of them

Upon every change of Administration, or in cases of the death or resignation of members of the Cabinet, their successors, often from remote parts of the country, find themselves embarrassed in obtaining, even at an exorbitant price, a suitable residence for themselves and their families.

They are then compelled to expend at least one year's salary in furnishing their establishment, and are consequently obliged to draw upon their private resources for the means of subsistence. Much of their time and attention is occupied by these domestic concerns, which might be more profitably devoted to the public interests. At the close of their terms they are forced to dispose of their household effects at a ruinous sacrifice, and return to their homes impoverished in fortune, and with the ungracious reflection that while they have devoted their time and talents to the public service, their country has refused them even the means of support.

It may be said in reply that there is no obligation on any one to accept these positions; and if they do so, they must abide by the consequences of their own acts. In one sense this is true. There is no legal obligation on any one to accept an official position. But there is a high moral and patriotic obligation on every citizen to contribute his service to his country when it may be required, and there is a reciprocal obligation on the country not to allow him to suffer in his private fortune by that service.

By furnishing the heads of Departments and Vice President with houses, their present salaries will be adequate for their support. They will be freed from the cares and cost of fitting up an establishment for a mere temporary use, and be enabled to devote their whole time to the duties of their offices. They will be placed in a condition of comparative independence, by being relieved from the prospect of a heavy sacrifice by the sale of their effects upon the termination of their official connection with the Government. The heads of Department, instead of being scattered over the city, will be brought nearer to each other and to the President, and be enabled to confer together without inconvenience. And at the close of their terms they will leave the seat of Government with the knowledge that if they have not added to, they have at least not been obliged to substract from their private resources.

From estimates which I have caused to be made, I am satisfied that lots could be bought, and eight substantial, plain, and tasteful houses erected, furnished, and fitted up for occupation, for the sum of $300,000. And as the near approach of the close of my own official term relieves me from all suspicion of being influenced by personal or party considerations in presenting the subject to your notice, I earnestly recommend it to your favorable regard.

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

In former reports I have earnestly invited your attention to the interests of the District of Columbia, and endeavored to explain the peculiar claims which it has to the fostering care of Congress. Without repeating the reasons heretofore urged, I beg leave again to present the subject to your favorable notice, and to specify some of the particular objects in regard to which legislation is required.

The introduction of an ample supply of pure water into the city of Washington and Georgetown is a measure of great public interest. At the last session of Congress an appropriation was made to defray the cost of the necessary surveys, &c., to determine the best mode of accomplishing this object. An officer of the Engineer Corps was detailed for this duty, and some progress has already been made in the work, but not enough to enable me to express an opinion as to the plan which should be adopted. A full report will, however, be made and submitted to Congress in time for its action during the approaching session; and I hope the necessary appropriations will be made to commence the work without delay. If additional arguments to those heretofore submitted were deemed necessary, I might refer to the recent conflagration in the Library of the Capitol as an emphatic admonition of the insecurity of the public buildings and archives in the absence of a copious supply of water.

I deem it my duty also to call your attention to the urgent necessity which exists for the erection of suitable bridges across the Potomac to supply the place of those which were destroyed by the floods in the early part of the present year.

The interruption of the travel and commercial intercourse with the opposite side of the river has proved a serious evil to the residents of the District and public generally. And during the winter, when navigation may be obstructed by ice, the inconvenience will be greatly augmented. I therefore recommend that an appropriation be asked for to make the necessary surveys and prepare suitable plans and estimates for the construction of one or more permanent bridges, which may be adapted not only for the accommodation of the ordinary travel and trade, but also for the safe and convenient passage of railway trains. The rapid extension of the system of railways throughout the whole country forbids the idea that the intercourse by mail between the North and the South should continue longer to be delayed and interrupted as it has hitherto been, at particular seasons of the year, by the difficulty of crossing the Potomac.

The Commissioner of Public Lands, in his report, has suggested the propriety of a grant by Congress of a portion of the public lands in aid of public schools in the District of Columbia. This proposition commands my cordial approbation; and I would be happy to see it adopted, with an amendment extending its benefits to the charitable institutions of the District. The population of the District is composed of citizens of every State in this Union. This fact creates a general interest in its prosperity and welfare; and I know of no disposition of a portion of the public domain which would be more strictly in accordance with the spirit of the trusts reposed in Congress, or more useful in itself, than an appropriation of a reasonable portion to instruct the ignorant, reform the vicious, and relieve the distressed inhabitants of the metropolis of the nation.

In former reports I have brought to your notice many other subjects which I regarded as of public interest. Among these were the establishment of an Agricultural and Statistical Bureau; a revision of the laws relating to the fees of marshals, attorneys, and clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States; an increase of the salaries of the judges of the district courts of the United States; the enlargement of the functions of the Attorney General, so as to make him the head of the department of justice; and the transfer to that department of all matters connected with the administration of justice; the construction of a national highway through our own territory to the Pacific; the more precise definition of the duties of the several executive departments; and that provision be made for the appointment of a Solicitor to the Department of the Interior.

On all these subjects my opinions remain unchanged, and, without repeating the reasons by which they were sustained, I beg leave again to commend them to your favorable consideration.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ALEX. H. H. STUART, Secretary.

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Report of the Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
December 4, 1852.

SIR: In discharge of a duty devolving on me, I have the honor to report that the whole number of post offices in the United States, at the close of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1852, was 20,901. The number of postmasters appointed during that year was 6,255. Of these, 3,726 were appointed to fill vacancies occasioned by resignation; 255 to fill vacancies occasioned by death; 246 on changing the sites of offices; 309 on the removal of prior incumbents; and 1,719 on the establishment of new offices. There were 1,719 post offices established, and 614 discontinued during the year.

From the end of the fiscal year to November 1, 1852, 526 post offices have been established, and 236 discontinued, so that the whole number in operation at the latter date was 21,191. At its close there were in operation in the United States 6,711 mail routes; their aggregate length being 214,284 miles, and employing 5,206 contractors. The annual transportation of the mails on these routes was 58,985,728 miles, at an annual cost of $3,939,971, being about 6 7-10 cents per mile. Of these 58,985,728 miles of annual transportation, 11,082,768 miles were required to be performed on railroads, at a cost of $1,275,520, being about 11½ cents per mile; 6,353,409 miles in steamboats, at a cost of $505,815, being about 8 cents per mile; 20,698,930 miles in coaches, at a cost of $1,128,986, being about 5½ cents per mile; and 20,850,621 miles in modes not specified, at a cost of $1,029,650, being about 4 9-10 cents per mile.

The inland service when compared with such service at the close of the preceding year, as stated in the last annual report from this Department, shows an increase of 17,994 miles in the length of mail routes; of 5,713,476 in the miles of annual transportation; and of $518,217 in the annual cost of transportation. Of such increase of transportation the railroad service amounts to 2,514,061 miles, at an increased cost of $290,501 being an increase of about 29 per cent. both in the service and in its aggregate cost; the steamboat service to 898,427 miles, at an increased cost of $50,923, being an increase of about 16½ per cent. in service and 11 per cent. in cost; the coach service to 972,342 miles, at an increased cost of $81,827, being an increase of about 5 per cent. in service and 8 per cent. in the aggregate cost; and in modes of service not specified to 1,328,646 miles, at an increased cost of $94,967, being an increase of about 7 per cent. in service and 10 per cent. in cost.

Compared with the transportation and its cost at the close of the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1842, it shows that the railroad and steamboat service had increased in the ten years 13,011,915 miles, at an increased cost of $1,131,654, being about 294 per cent. increase in service and 174 per cent. on cost; the coach service 1,931,894 miles, at a decreased cost of $571,524, being about 10 per cent. increase in service and 33⅓ per cent. decrease in cost; the service in modes not specified 9,205,928 miles, at an increased cost of $292,045, being about 79 per cent. increase in service and 40 per cent. in cost.

It may be proper in this connection to remark, that the actual increase in coach service performed is greater, and that of service performed on horseback or in other modes not specified is less, than above stated, for the reason that since the act of 1845, much coach service is performed under contracts not specifically requiring that grade of service; but only that the mails be carried with due "celerity, certainty, and security." The service under such contracts is now reported as in modes not specified, although coach service is performed under them for a larger portion of or the entire year.

There were in operation on the 30th day of June last six foreign mail routes, of the estimated aggregate length of 18,349 miles; the number of miles of annual transportation thereon is estimated at 652,406. The service on three of those routes is under contract with this Department; the annual transportation thereon is estimated at 200,592 miles, at a cost of $400,000, being about $1 99 per mile. The service on the other three routes is under contract with the Navy Department; the annual transportation thereon is estimated at 458,934 miles, at an annual cost of $1,496,250 (including the additional compensation voted to the Collins line at the last session of Congress,) being $3 26 per mile.

The annual cost of conveying the mails across the Isthmus of Panama is uncertain, as it depends on their weight; the cost for the last year, at twenty-two cents per pound—the price paid—was $48,039. It is estimated that for a large portion of the contents of these mails (being printed matter) the amount received in postages under the act of August 31st, 1852, does not exceed five cents a pound in payment of the whole transportation from the point of mailing to that of delivery. As that act did not go into effect until the 30th of September last, no reliable estimate can now be made of the increased cost of mail service across the Isthmus under its operation, but there can be no doubt that such increase will be large. The temporary arrangement for this service, which went into effect on the 1st of December last with the Panama Railroad Company, is still in force, and is found to be a great improvement on the previous arrangement, though not yet entirely satisfactory. The completion of the railroad is looked forward to as the remedy for most of the existing delays and defects in the service between New York and San Francisco.

Under the general head of "transportation of the mails" is chargeable the compensation of route and local agents and mail messengers. The amount payable on this account at the close of the last fiscal year was $196,936 per annum.

The extent and annual cost of the entire mail service under the control of this Department at the close of the fiscal year ended on the 30th June last, as well as its division among the States and Territories, and the mode of its performance required by the then existing contracts, will more fully appear by the annexed table, furnished by the Second Assistant Postmaster General, and marked A.

As the railroad service is daily becoming more important and expensive, a table showing the extent and annual cost of that service in each of the States, as in operation on the 30th day of June in each year, from 1848 to 1852, inclusive, has been prepared, and is hereto annexed, marked B.

Our ocean steamer service commenced in June, 1847. Its great and rapid increase is shown by the following tabular statement of its cost for each fiscal year, as follows:

The cost of this service for 1848 was	$100,500
for 1849 was	474,710
for 1850 was	721,570
for 1851 was	1,023,250
for 1852 was	1,896,250

The gross receipts of the Department for the year ending June 30th, 1852, were $6,925,971.28, derived from the following sources, viz:

Letter postage, including foreign postage and stamps sold	$4,226,792 90
Postage on newspapers, periodicals, &c	789,246 36
Fines, other than those imposed on contractors	27 50
Receipts on account of excess of emoluments of postmasters	38,478 24
Damages collected from failing contractors	5,213 30
Receipts on account of dead letters	8,265 12
Receipts from letter-carriers	104,355 92
Stamps in hands of postmasters 30th June, 1851, being such as remained of the old issue, and which were charged to them on that day	8,849 61
Miscellaneous receipts	3,297 89
From appropriation authorized by the twelfth section of the act of 3d March, 1847, viz: from 3d March, 1847, to 30th June, 1852	1,065,555 55
From appropriation authorized by eighth section of the act of March, 1851	663,888 89
From appropriation for census mails authorized by seventeenth section of the act of 23d May, 1850	12,000 00
	$6,925,971 28
From this sum must be deducted the amount payable to the British Post Office under the postal convention of December, 1848, as now estimated from statement of the Auditor	101,988 59

The receipts from postage, American and foreign, for the last fiscal year were less by $1,388,334 43 than for the preceding fiscal year, being a decrease of about 22 per cent. If the estimated balances accruing to the British post office for each year are excluded for the purpose of showing the decrease of our own postages, that decrease will amount to $1,431,696 54, or about 22½ per cent.

This diminution in our postages is attributable to the reduction in the rates of postage made by the act of March 3d, 1851, which reduction took effect at the commencement of the last fiscal year.

This diminution of revenue is somewhat greater than was anticipated in this Department at the time it went into effect, and much greater than was expected by the sanguine advocates of cheap postage, many of whom sought the establishment of still lower rates.

Although the act referred to has not in its operation during the last year fulfilled the predictions of its friends by increasing the correspondence of the country in proportion to its reduction of postage, I should nevertheless question the expediency of a return to higher rates. All experience warrants the expectation that, as the community becomes accustomed to cheap postage, written correspondence will increase. From this cause, and from the rapid growth of the country in population and business, the receipts of the Department must ultimately exceed its expenses, and enable it to refund to the Treasury the sums advanced. In the mean time the appropriations made from the Treasury in aid of the Post Office Establishment may be deemed safe and beneficent investments for the advantage of the whole people, each one of whom, if not engaged in business correspondence, has a deep interest in the diffusion of intelligence and the promotion of social intercourse.

By the 8th section of the act of 31st August, 1852, the Postmaster General is authorized to provide and furnish to all postmasters and other persons applying and paying therefor, letter-envelopes with one or more postage stamps impressed thereon, to be used in the prepayment of postage. These envelopes are now in course of preparation, and will soon be for sale at the principal post offices.

As letters inclosed in them may be legally sent by private express or other private conveyance, there will remain no color of excuse for further violations of the laws in that respect. That the experiment of cheap postage may be fairly tried, it is important that the revenues of the Department be protected against this abuse, not only by the vigilance of its own agents, to whom the law has intrusted the power to search for and seize such letters, but also by public sentiment and by the active exertions of the intelligent and influential portion of the community. It is by thus securing to this Department the receipts which the law has assigned for its support that the period can be hastened when it will again be sustained by its own proper revenues, and the common Treasury of the country relieved from further advances for its service.

The expenditures of the Department during the last fiscal year were as follows:

For the transportation of the mails	$4,225,311 28
Ship, steamboat, and way letters	24,587 94
Compensation to postmasters	1,296,765 50
Extra compensation to do., under act of 3d March, 1851	456,594 84
Wrapping paper	41,046 12
Office furniture	7,890 77
Advertising	63,157 12
Mail-bags	41,946 50
Blanks	53,861 83
Mail locks and keys and stamps	11,984 64
New mail locks and keys	18,756 97
Mail depredations and special agents	35,197 82
Clerks for offices, (offices of postmasters)	548,916 71
Publishing post office laws and regulations	2,900 00
Repayment of money found in dead letters	82 61
Postage stamps	9,920 03
Postage stamps redeemed	3,209 35
Stamps of the old issue returned to the Department	8,229 20
Official letters received by postmasters	582 89
Payments to letter-carriers	104,355 92
Miscellaneous payments	152,561 00
	$7,108,459 04

The new contracts for the middle section, made under the letting in February last, embracing the States of Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, increased the annual transportation in those States, from the first day of July last, 310,959 miles, at an increased annual cost of $148,705 over the transportation and cost under the contracts which expired on the 30th day of June, 1852, being an increase of about 3 per cent. in service and 21½ per cent. in annual cost.

The expenditures for the present fiscal year are estimated as follows:

The annual cost of transportation, (foreign and inland,) as authorized and under contract at the close of the last fiscal year	$4,584,946 00
Additional cost in the middle section, under new contracts which went into effect July 1st, 1852	148,705 00
Increased cost of transportation, under order of the Postmaster General, for the improvement and extension of mail service, and the increased expedition of the mails	93,584 98
Probable cost of putting into operation for the residue of the fiscal year such new routes established during the last session of Congress as should be put in operation before 1st July next	650,000 00
Expenses, under the heads of compensation to postmasters, wrapping paper, office furniture, advertising, mail-bags, blanks, mail locks and keys, stamps, mail depredations and special agents, clerks for offices of postmasters, and miscellaneous items, being the expenses of last year and twelve and a half per cent. added; such expenses necessarily increasing with the extension of mail service, and the increase in the number of post offices, and in the quantity of mail matter transported	3,243,541 20

Probable cost of postage stamps and envelopes	25,000 00
	$8,745,777 20

To meet these expenditures of the Department for the present fiscal year, it has, under existing laws, resources which it is estimated will produce the following sums, to wit:

1st. The available balance at the credit of the revenues of the Department on the 1st day of July last, stated by the Auditor to be	$566,632 57
2d. Receipts from postage, (foreign and inland,) deducting estimated balances due to foreign Governments	5,651,158 26
3d. Annual appropriation made by the 12th section of the act of 3d March, 1847, in compensation for mail service performed for the various departments of the Government	200,000 00
4th. Annual appropriations made by the 8th section of the act of 3d March, 1851, "in further payment and compensation for mail service performed for the two Houses of Congress and other departments and offices of Government in the transportation of free matter"	500,000 00
5th. Contingent appropriation made by the 9th section of the act of the 3d of March, 1851.	500,000 00
	$7,417,790 83

The above aggregate deducted from the estimated amount of expenses for the current year, leaves a deficit of $1,327,986 37 to be provided for by direct appropriation from the Treasury.

A further and larger appropriation will probably be necessary to meet the deficiency in the revenue of the fiscal year commencing on the first of July next. An estimate of this deficiency, and of that of the current fiscal year, as here set forth, will be submitted to Congress.

The negotiations for increased expedition on the great mail line between New York and New Orleans, which were in progress at the date of the last annual report from this Department, were brought to a favorable conclusion in time to commence the improved service on the first of March last. By this arrangement the time required for the regular transportation of the mail from New York to New Orleans was reduced twenty-four hours, and from New Orleans to New York thirty-eight hours. Additional trains were so arranged on different parts of the route as to render failures of connection less frequent, and shorten the delay from twenty-four to twelve hours, in cases where the connection was unavoidably broken. Certainty and celerity on this line cannot be relied on while the service on an important link in the chain of routes composing it is performed in steamers, on the stormy and unsheltered coast between Wilmington and Charleston.

The completion of the Wilmington and Manchester Railroad during the next year will, it is believed, enable the Department to avoid this uncertain portion of the present line.

The service between New York and Washington, though much improved by the arrangements referred to, is still defective and unsatisfactory. The endeavors of this Department to improve this service have been rendered abortive by a want of unity among the railroad companies interested in the line, and a spirit of accommodation on the part of the companies running between Philadelphia and New York.

There being no competing lines or modes of conveyance by which this Department can secure connections and otherwise facilitate the transportation of the mails between Washington and New York, it is compelled to accept such independent service as each company on the line will consent to render, and is thus made powerless to enforce the demands of the public. I would respectfully suggest that if Congress, in the exercise of its power over the establishment of post roads, can remedy this evil, the subject is worthy of the early attention of that body.

A new compilation of laws relating to this Department, and of amended regulations adopted for enforcing them, for the guidance of its officers and the conduct of its business, was in course of preparation at the date of the last annual report from this Department. It has since been perfected, and published by my predecessor, and distributed to the several postmasters, and copies sent to the members of both Houses of Congress.

It appears from the report of the Auditor for this Department, hereto annexed, that the whole amount of postages, inland, sea, and foreign, on letters and other mailable matter received and sent by the several lines of United States steamers, during the last fiscal year, was as follows, viz:

By Collins line, New York and Liverpool	$228,867 61
By New York and Bremen line, touching at Southampton, England	77,219 87
By New York and Havre line, touching at Cowes	80,804 08
By Charleston and Havana line	11,958 99

The postal arrangements with Canada and New Brunswick have been in successful operation during the year, and have been found convenient and useful. The amount of postage on letters sent from the United States to Canada was—

Unpaid	$31,034 66
Paid	24,707 31
		$55,741 97
On letters received—
Unpaid	$25,377 08
Paid	22,144 60
		$47,521 68

The amount of postage on letters sent from the United States to New Brunswick was—

Unpaid	$2,356 38
Paid	2,778 71
		$5,135 09
On letters received—
Unpaid	$1,784 07
Paid	1,893 40

Congress having, by the 2d section of an act approved 21st August, 1852, authorized the Postmaster General, upon certain conditions, to enter into contract for the transportation of the mail by steamers plying between Boston and Halifax, a postal arrangement is now in process of completion with the Province of Nova Scotia, by which the postage on this route will be the same as is now paid by the way of New Brunswick.

In pursuance of the requirements of an act approved August 30, 1852, advertisements have been published for proposals for mail service by ocean steamers between New Orleans and Vera Cruz via Tampico, embracing also (for the purpose of obtaining information) an extension of the service to Acapulco, and thence to San Francisco. These proposals are to be opened, and a decision made on such portions of them as are authorized by said act, (that is, for service from New Orleans to Vera Cruz,) on the 3d of January next. The Department will of course await the directions of Congress after the information is obtained as to the remainder of the route.

By the 11th section of an act approved August 31, 1852, provision is made for daily mail service, by suitable and safe steamers, between Louisville and Cairo, St. Louis and Cairo, Cairo and Memphis, and Memphis and New Orleans.

It is deemed important not only to the cities enumerated, and to the intermediate places on the rivers to be covered by this service, but due also to the great and increasing West that these lines should be so established as fully to secure the object contemplated, to wit, a certain, regular, safe, and reliable daily service on these several routes.

The relative position of the western section of our Union, its present importance, and prospective greatness, alike demand that its people should be provided with the best postal facilities that the Department can supply. To accomplish this, it has sought information from various sources as to the requirements of the service, and will soon advertise for such as will, it is believed, fully carry into effect the intention of the act, and meet the just demands of that interesting section of our country.

With the last annual report from this Department were published interesting tabular statements of the extent and increase of its business at the several periods of five years from 1790 to 1835, inclusive, and for each year from 1840 to 1851, inclusive. The extent and cost of steamboat and railroad service were not separately given in those statements, nor have they been so contained in any published report from the Department prior to 1848. Since that time, however, in the annual exhibit from the Contract Office of the mail service in operation at the close of each fiscal year, the two kinds of service have been separated. As the annual increase of both kinds in extent and cost strikingly illustrates the steady and rapid growth of our country, I submit the following statement of the extent and cost of each at the close of each fiscal year from 1848 to 1852, inclusive:

Miles of steamboat service	4,385,800	4,083,976	4,109,981
Miles of railroad service	4,327,400	4,861,177	6,594,593
Annual cost of steamboat service	$262,019	$278, 650	$313,943
Annual cost railroad service	584,192	635,740	818,227
Total	$846,211	$914,390	$1,132,170

	1851.	1852.
Miles of steamboat service	5,454,982	6,853,409
Miles of railroad service	8,568,707	11,069,768
Annual cost of steamboat service	$454,892	$505,815
Annual cost of railroad service	985,019	1,275,520

By the third section of the act approved August 31, 1852, making appropriations for the service of this Department, it is provided that the salaries of all route-agents be increased to one thousand dollars per annum.

The effect of this provision is to give the same compensation to each one of these agents, without reference to the amount of service rendered by them respectively, and it takes from the Postmaster General the power of adjusting their pay according to the labor and responsibility of the service performed by them. It operates unequally, and, with the present amount of railroad service, has increased the cost of transporting the mails more than $50,000. I respectfully recommend the repeal of this provision, and that the Postmaster General be authorized to graduate these salaries according to the service performed.

The contractor on the route from Salt Lake City to Sacramento, in California, never having performed efficient service on that route, this Department has entered into an arrangement with another contractor, who binds himself not only to perform the service as originally required, but also to establish and maintain a fortified post or station at Carson's Valley, which will, it is expected, increase the security of the mails, and afford protection to the numerous emigrant trains on their journey to California.

Since the last annual report from this Department the Collins line of steamers has continued its service between New York and Liverpool, according to an arrangement then existing, by which weekly trips in American steamers were secured between these two countries. The ships of this line have preserved their early reputation for unrivaled speed and sea-worthiness. Their departures have been punctual, and they have performed their voyages with great regularity. The company has kept a spare ship in port ready to replace any one which might be temporarily disabled or withdrawn for repairs, and has in other respects manifested a disposition to perform the service in a creditable manner.

By the act of August 31, 1852, this Department was authorized to make an arrangement with the Ocean Steam Navigation Company for one additional trip on the Havre line, and one additional trip on the Bremen line, until the expiration of their existing contract, and also in its discretion to negotiate for the change of the Havre line from Havre to Antwerp. Owing, as is stated by the proprietors of those lines, to the inadequacy of the remuneration received for their present service, they are unwilling to extend it, either by increasing the number of their trips, or adding to the length of their voyages. They complain that while the Collins line receives $33,000 a trip, the Havre line receives only $12,500, and the Bremen line only $16,666, for service, in the latter case, more arduous in its nature, and over a longer route. They ask that such remuneration may be given them as will justify their increasing the number of their ships, and thus enable them not only to meet the requirements of the service by changing the terminus of their route from Havre to Antwerp, but also perform such additional trips as may be desired.

As an inducement for this increase of pay, they show that in addition to their having performed their mail service as efficiently as could be expected with the limited means allowed them, the exports from Germany to this country have increased since they commenced running from $3,000,000 to $10,000,000; that the number of emigrants is increasing, and the gross sum which they at present bring to this country amounts to $15,000,000 annually. It was for this object—for the purpose of extending our intercourse and increasing our mercantile relations with Germany—that this line was established. The results have equaled the expectations of its friends, and it now remains for Congress to decide whether the necessary aid shall be extended, or whether we shall abandon to the English the profits of our increasing trade with the advantages that flow from it.

Semi-monthly ocean service, as last reported from this Department, was continued between New York and California and Oregon until July last, when, under authority of a provision contained in the naval appropriation act of March 3d, 1851, the running of the mail steamers on the New York, Havana, New Orleans, and Chagres lines was rearranged, so as to afford a more direct dispatch of the mails to and from the Pacific. This service is now divided into three distinct lines, viz: from New York and New Orleans to Aspinwall, both direct; and from New York by Havana to New Orleans. This change is made with the assent of the Secretary of the Navy, on the application of the contractors, and with the understanding that the Government is not responsible for any additional expense involved in it. The former arrangement may be restored at the desire of either party on one month's notice.

The convention between this Department and the Post Office Department of Prussia, which at the date of the last annual report from the Postmaster General remained unexecuted, has since been concluded, and went into operation in October last. This convention provides for a closed mail to be dispatched in each direction between the United States and Prussia regularly twice a week, via London and Ostend. New York and Boston are the offices of exchange on the part of the United States, and Aix-la-Chapelle is the corresponding office of exchange on the part of Prussia.

By this convention a uniform postage rate of thirty cents—prepayment of which is optional in either country—is established for all letters not exceeding half an ounce in weight between the two countries. Six cents is the rate established for each newspaper, to be prepaid. This convention also provides for the transmission of mails, not only through Germany, but also through the United States to countries beyond, and has induced this Department to discontinue the closed mail to Bremen. It is estimated that the countries (including the German Austrian Postal Union) which are thus brought into postal communication with the United States, embrace a population of seventy millions.

As a necessary consequence of our convention with Prussia, the larger part of the continental correspondence which formerly went by the way of Bremen is now sent via London, Ostend, and Aix-la-Chapelle, the latter being the more expeditious route. The mails for Bremen, however, and such as may be addressed via Bremen to other German States, and countries beyond, will continue to be dispatched monthly by the New York and Bremen line.

A projet of a postal convention between the United States and Belgium has been prepared and submitted by this Department for approval to the Belgian Government, and it is confidently expected that in the course of a few months at furthest an arrangement which shall be mutually advantageous will be duly sanctioned and put in operation.

Our postal convention with Great Britain has not yet been so modified as to admit of the exchange of a closed mail with France via England; the British Government, with reference to such mail, still insisting on a transit postage of twenty-four cents an ounce.

France has manifested a disposition for improved mail facilities with this country, and has made proposals for a postal treaty with the United States, to operate independently of our treaty with Great Britain. How far the negotiations on this subject have progressed I am not at present prepared to state. It is hoped, however, that they may be conducted to a favorable issue at an early day. Connected with this project, France proposes, in conjunction with the United States, to establish a union line of mail steamships direct between New York and Havre.

Under our postal treaty with Great Britain additional articles have been agreed upon, and are ready for signature, providing for a regular mail arrangement between the United States and the West Indies generally, and points on the coast of Mexico and northern coast of South America, at which the British mail packets touch. To the British West Indies the United States single rate of letter postage, which must be prepaid on letters sent from and collected on letters received in the United States, will be ten cents, where the distance from the mailing office is under 2,500 miles, and twenty cents where the distance exceeds 2,500 miles. To the West Indies, (not British,) Mexico and South America, by this channel, the British postage of twenty-four cents the single rate, also required to be prepaid, must be added to the ten or twenty cents United States rate, according to distance as above. This arrangement it is expected will go into effect without delay.

In accordance with the wishes of the Hawaiian Government, arrangements have been made by which letters for the Sandwich Islands are dispatched in sealed packets by each mail steamer from New York, and conveyed through to Honolulu without being opened. On all letters and newspapers for these Islands, however, as well as to China, by this route, it is required that the United States postage to San Francisco be prepaid.

The act of March 3, 1851, "to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States and for other purposes," authorized the Postmaster General to allow increased commissions to postmasters whose labors had been increased and their commissions reduced by the operation of that act. The maximum allowance thus authorized was twenty per cent. added to the amount of commissions received for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1851. In the exercise of the authority thus granted, the late Postmaster General issued an order on the 29th of October, 1851, allowing increased commissions to all postmasters entitled thereto, varying from ten to twenty per cent., according to the gross receipts of their offices. This order applied to the settlement of the accounts for the fiscal year 1852, and reserved the rate of allowance to be made thereafter "for future consideration, after accounts for the first three quarters of that year should have been adjusted by the Auditor." When the result of this adjustment was reported to him, the late Postmaster General issued the following order, which is now in force:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, August 7, 1852.

The Postmaster General being satisfied that the labors of postmasters have been so increased with the increasing business of the country, and by the operations of the act "to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1851, that the highest additional allowance of commissions authorized by the sixth section of that act will not afford them more than a reasonable compensation for such increased labors, it is Ordered, That (with the restrictions and limitations hereinafter mentioned) the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department, in settling the accounts of postmasters for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1853, and for each succeeding year until otherwise ordered, shall, upon satisfactory proof being furnished him by affidavit, or otherwise, that the labors of any postmaster have been increased, and his commissions reduced, as provided for by said act, allow and credit such postmaster the same amount of commissions allowed at his office for the fiscal year ended the 30th of June, 1851, with twenty per cent. thereon added thereto.

Provided, however, That the commissions to be allowed at any post office (other than a distributing office) shall not exceed the postages collected at such office during the period for which such allowance is made: And provided further, That there shall not be allowed at any office where the compensation of the postmaster is by law limited to a fixed annual salary, or compensation, any greater sum than shall be required to pay such salary or compensation, and the actual and necessary expenses of his office.

N. K. HALL, Postmaster General.

It will be perceived that this order makes it necessary, in the settlement of each postmaster's quarterly account, to compare the current business of his office with that of the corresponding quarter of the year 1851, and that his commission account for each quarter must remain unsettled until the end of the year, that the aggregate commissions accruing may be compared with the commissions allowed for that year. The effect of this in delaying and embarrassing the settlement of accounts in the Auditor's office, and increasing the labor of such settlement, is fully shown in the following letter from the Auditor, who recommends a repeal of the provision requiring this mode of settlement, and a return to the old system of uniform rates of commission on the amount of postages collected. I concur in his recommendation, both as to the repeal of the existing law, and the rates of commission to be allowed:

AUDITOR'S OFFICE, P. O. D., November 19, 1852.

SIR: It is found in practice that the acts of Congress respecting the allowance of additional commissions to postmasters are extremely inconvenient and burdensome to this office. The sixth section of the act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage," &c., approved March 3, 1851, provides, "That to any postmaster whose commissions may be reduced below the amount allowed at his office for the year ending the 30th of June, 1851, and whose labors may be increased, the Postmaster General shall be authorized in his discretion to allow such additional commissions as he may deem just and proper; provided that the whole amount of commissions allowed such postmaster during any fiscal year shall not exceed by more than twenty per centum the amount of commissions at such office for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1851."

And the ninth section of the act entitled "An act to establish certain post roads, and for other purposes," approved August 31st, 1852, provides, "that the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department may, under such regulations and restrictions as the Postmaster General may prescribe, allow to every postmaster whose office was not established until after the 1st day of July, 1850, or whose commissions, in consequence of the increase of labor and business of his office, shall have equaled or exceeded the commissions allowed at such office for the year ending on the 30th day of June, 1851, such compensation in addition to his legal commissions as will, in the judgment of such Auditor, make the compensation of such postmaster equal, as near as may be, to the compensation of other postmasters in the same section of the country whose labors are the same as his, and who are entitled to additional allowance under the sixth section of the act entitled 'An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1851, and under orders of the Postmaster General, made in pursuance of the provisions of the said sixth section of the act aforesaid."

To entitle a postmaster to additional commissions under these laws, it must satisfactorily appear, first, that by their enactment and operation the labors of his office have been increased, and that his commissions have been reduced below the amount allowed for the fiscal year that ended on the 30th of June, 1851; or, secondly, that his "office was not established until after the 1st day of July, 1850." &c. If these facts are sufficiently shown, additional commission at different rates is, according to the present practice, allowed as follows:

1. Where the commissions of the postmaster for the year ending June 30, 1851, did not exceed $50, the same amount of commissions which was allowed for that year, with twenty per cent. added thereto, is allowed him.

2. Where they exceeded $50, but did not exceed $100, the same amount with fifteen per cent. added thereto is allowed.

3. Where they exceeded $100, but not $500, the same amount with twelve and a half per cent. added thereto, is allowed.

4. Where they exceeded $500, the same amount, with ten per cent. added thereto, is allowed; but the commissions allowed to any postmaster (other than at a distributing office) are not permitted to exceed the postages collected at his office during the period for which the allowance is made.

5. Where the office was not established until after the 1st day of July, 1850, &c., such compensation, in addition to his legal commissions, is allowed the postmaster as will make his compensation equal, as near as may be, to the compensation of other postmasters in the same section of the country, &c.

These various contingencies and conditions cannot be determined until the accounts for an entire fiscal year are adjusted. Commissions are therefore computed by postmasters, in their quarterly accounts, mainly according to the old rates of allowance. And the adjustment of additional commissions has become, as it were, a separate business, superadded to the adjustment of quarterly accounts, and is devolved exclusively upon this office. First, it audits and adjusts the quarterly accounts of some twenty thousand postmasters, and then, as the additional commissions are dependent for their allowance upon no uniform rule, operating equally and applicable alike to all postmasters, but upon the facts of each particular case; it has, at the end of a fiscal year, to reëxamine those twenty thousand accounts to see which of them are entitled, and in what proportions, to said additional compensation. Postmasters, meanwhile, not knowing what additional allowances may be made them, are unable to determine how much they owe the Department at the end of each quarter and at the close of the year. Their accounts and the post office accounts necessarily disagree; and by consequence some pay too much, others not enough, and others, again, excuse themselves from any payment.

Furthermore, these disagreements produce confusion and perplexity in settlements, retard collections, and require, in explanation and removal of the difficulties they create, a correspondence beyond the ability of this officer to conduct with requisite promptness; and although the most strenuous exertions are made, with an insufficient force, to meet and respond to the additional demands thus made upon the office, postmasters complain, and with apparent reason, that their letters are not duly answered.

Another evil is, that the additional labor thus thrown upon the office has interrupted and retarded its current and general business to a degree that calls for immediate relief, and I have no hesitation in saying that it is impracticable to continue to adjust commissions in the manner at present required to comply with the law. The only effectual remedy for these evils is the adoption of the old system of uniform rates of percentage upon the proceeds of offices, depending on no condition or discretion; and I would respectfully suggest the following as a scale of rates that should be adopted and tried, viz:

Say, for an office collecting postage to the amount of			$3,000 00
Allow on $100, 50 per cent. commission		$50 00
300, 40	do	do 120 00
2,000, 33⅓	do	do 666 66
600, 12½	do	do 75 00
			911 66
The present rates are as follows:
On $100, 40 per cent. commission		$40 00
On 300, 33⅓	do	do 100 00
On 2,000, 30	do	do 600 00
On 600, 12½	do	do 75 00
			815 00
Difference			96 66

I also think that a postmaster should be entitled to a small compensation, say to the amount of 2 mills (or about 2½ cents per quarter for a weekly paper) for delivering from his office to a subscriber each newspaper not now chargeable with postage.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant, J. W. FARRELLY, Auditor.

Hon. S. D. Hubbard, Postmaster General.

The attention of Congress should, I think, be called to the fact, that although the 6th and 7th sections of the act of 3d March, 1851, before referred to, provide that neither the compensation of postmasters nor the ordinary extension of mail service should be diminished in consequence of any diminution of the revenues resulting from that act, no provision was made for the protection of the rights and interests of a large class of persons employed as contractors on special routes, and as mail messengers, whose compensation depends upon the amount received from postages at the offices supplied by them.

There are not less than twenty-five hundred persons employed in carrying the mail for the net proceeds of the offices supplied—limited, however, in every case to a certain sum equal to that paid for similar service on public routes in the same section.

On a few of these special routes the amount collected is more than sufficient to pay the contractor, and considerable balances remain to be applied to the ordinary expenses of the Department, but on a large portion of them the amount received even under the old rates of postage was insufficient to pay the compensation allowable for his service. Upon this class of contractors the reduction of postages operated with great hardship, and every additional allowance to the Postmaster has still further diminished the fund which alone can be applied to the payment of the contractor.

On the 25th of March last, the Senate adopted a resolution, by which the Postmaster General was requested to embody in his next annual report answers to numerous questions embraced in the resolution, relating to the business of this Department, and its receipts and expenditures, under various enumerated heads, for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1852.

Much of the information sought by these questions could not be furnished in the form desired from the accounts ordinarily rendered by postmasters, nor from the books of the Auditor's office, in which the accounts of this Department are kept. Neither could it be furnished with perfect accuracy for the whole year in any other mode than by prescribing to postmasters, before the commencement of the year, a new form of accounts to be kept for this object, in addition to those now required from them; and, as nearly three months of the year had elapsed before the passage of the resolution, it was obviously impossible to overcome this difficulty.

Desirous, however, to comply as far as possible with the request of the Senate, the late Postmaster General referred the resolution to the Auditor for this Department, immediately on its receipt, and desired him to adopt such means as remained in his power for collecting the information called for.

By corresponding with postmasters at the principal offices, and from the accounts returned to his office for settlement, the Auditor has made (in cases where perfect accuracy could not be attained) estimates which are deemed reliable, and has thus been enabled to furnish, in his annexed report, answers to most of the questions referred to.

In his last annual report my predecessor in office suggested that it should be earnestly and urgently recommended to Congress to take immediate and effectual measures for the extension of the west wing of the building occupied by this Department, or for the erection of its north front according to the original plan.

It would seem unnecessary for me to say that the reasons then urged for an enlargement of the building have become more imperative. Important papers are accumulating in the unsafe rooms over the city post office, to which it became necessary to remove a part of the force of the Auditor's office in consequence of the crowded state of the rooms in the main building. More room, too, is required for the accommodation of the city post office, and it can only be provided by the proposed enlargement.

When it is considered that much time must be consumed before the additional structure can be completed, and that in the mean time the existing evil will continue to increase, I cannot doubt that Congress will take immediate action in the matter when the attention of that body shall be directed to it.

I think it proper to state in connection with this subject that, owing to injudicious construction of the chimneys in the Post Office Building, the Department has been subjected to great expense in fruitless attempts to warm the several rooms without the diffusion of gas and smoke. I respectfully suggest that it would not only conduce greatly to the relief and comfort of the officers employed in the building to have it warmed by means of hot water or steam pipes, but that this method would also prove, it is believed, much less expensive than the present one, and that the cost of introducing it would be soon reimbursed by the consequent saving in fuel.

The grand jury of Philadelphia have presented the rooms occupied as a post office in that city, and ascribe the numerous charges which are made against it to the deficiencies of the building, rather than to any want of diligence and attention to their duties on the part of its officers. This Department does not feel itself justified, even if it possessed the power, to erect a new office, but, while it recommends, respectfully, leaves it to Congress to supply the remedy.

At the last session of Congress a resolution was introduced, but not acted on, authorizing the Postmaster General to allow at his discretion a sum not exceeding $20,000 to the contractors for carrying the mail between this city and Richmond, and thus enable them to keep in operation the ice-boats necessary to secure certainty and prevent delay in the transportation of the mails on that route. I respectfully ask that the attention of Congress be called to this resolution, and that its passage be recommended.

This Department has received, through the medium of the Hon. Abbott Lawrence, late Minister to England, the proceeding of an association formed in London for the purpose of promoting a cheap and uniform system of international postage. The object aimed at by this association is very desirable, and well worthy of the attention of this Government; but in the imperfect state of our foreign postal arrangements I deem it inexpedient to enter at present on any new experiment.

In conclusion, I desire to express my obligations to my predecessor, the Hon. N. K. Hall, for the aid he has afforded me in compiling this report. The statistics he had in preparation, and the method he had established in the Department, have materially assisted me in the discharge of my duties.

I would respectfully recommend that a statistical and historical sketch of this Department, which he submitted to the Post Office Committees of Congress, be continued, as a valuable work of reference.

The industry and attention to their laborious duties exhibited by the Assistant Postmaster General, the Chief Clerk, and the other Clerks of this Department, demand my thanks, which are gratefully rendered.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

S. D. HUBBARD,
Postmaster General.

To the President.

MODIFICATION OF THE TARIFF.

SPEECH OF HON. BENJ. STANTON,

OF OHIO,

In the House of Representatives,

December 14, 1852,

On the Tariff question; delivered in the Committee of the Whole, on the motion to refer the President's Annual Message to the several committees.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, said:

Mr. Chairman: So long as this discussion was confined to the revenue aspect of the tariff, I was not disposed to participate in it. But since it has been so extended as to include its effects upon the industrial interests of the country, I feel disposed, as a representative of a grain-growing, agricultural district, to give my views upon it. I feel the more inclined to do this, for the reason that some gentlemen on this side of the House have advanced doctrines against which I wish to enter my protest.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] on the first presentation of this subject, incorporated in his published remarks a project of a bill, indicating the modifications he desired to make in the tariff of 1846. One of these was the admission of wool, costing not more than ten cents per pound, at the place of production, duty free.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Duncan,] in his remarks the other day, proposed to abolish the duty on coarse wool and flax. I do not know that flax is extensively produced in this country. But I do not see why it is not as well adapted to the soil and climate of this country as any other; and I suppose it will be produced whenever the demand will justify.

As to coarse wool, I know it is said that the description of wool sought to be exempted from duty is not produced in this country, and that the wool-growers of this country will not be affected by abolishing the duty. It is impossible to determine with any certainty what quality of wool may be produced at ten cents per pound in the temperate climate, and upon the wild lands of South America, where it costs nothing but the labor of shearing. I can see no reason why fine sheep may not be introduced there, that would produce a fair quality of wool at a low price, for many years, before the climate would deteriorate it to the lowest grade of wool that is in use.

But my information is, that the coarse wool that is now imported is so mixed with dirt when imported that it loses from twenty-five to fifty per cent. in weight in the process of cleansing before it is fit for use. So that while it may in fact not be worth more than ten cents per pound at the place of production, in the condition in which it is imported, yet it may be worth from fifteen to twenty cents when it is cleansed and prepared for the manufacturer.

But aside from these considerations, there is the risk of false invoices and custom-house oaths, under which my friends from New York [Mr. BROOKS] and Massachusetts [Mr. DUNCAN] tell me immense frauds are constantly perpetrated. And this is a difficulty that I see no way of avoiding, as the quality to be imported free of duty must be determined by a foreign valuation, as I do not understand that anybody proposes to substitute a custom-house valuation in this country for the foreign valuation now in use. The wool growing interest is now one of the largest and most important in the country, and cannot be sacrificed or placed in jeopardy for any real or imaginary benefit that is to result to the manufacturer. We will unite with you in imposing any duty on importations of woolen goods that may be necessary to enable you to sustain your manufacturers; but we cannot consent to sustain them by reducing the price of our products. The friends of protection have no more steadfast ally upon this floor than I am; but they cannot expect me to support a measure which strikes at one of the most important interests of the district which I represent.

The proposition before the committee is for an inquiry into the proper mode of reducing the revenue arising from the duties on imports to such an amount as will be only sufficient, with the revenue arising from other sources, to defray the expenses of the Government under an economical administration.

If the existing surplus with that which may hereafter accrue, could be applied to the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country, and to other works of internal improvement, of a national character, I should be opposed to any reduction; or if the national debt was now redeemable, or the stocks of the Government could be purchased at a reasonable rate, or if a sinking fund could be created in such a manner as to be secure, and yield any reasonable profits, I should regard it as preferable to any diminution of the revenue. But assuming that no such disposition can or will be made of it, the question arises, How shall its accumulation be prevented?

Besides the effect which locking up so large a sum in the coffers of the Government may have upon the trade and business of the country, there are other objections to the accumulation of a large surplus, which have a controlling influence on my mind. The natural, necessary, and inevitable tendency of a continued surplus in the Treasury, is to beget profligate and extravagant expenditures. Public functionaries will be pressing for increased compensation; claimants upon the Government will be prompted to enlarge their demands; and new claims, hitherto unheard of, will be gotten up, and pressed upon Congress and the Executive Departments, by all the corrupt and corrupting appliances which avarice and cupidity can devise. Already a proposition is made to build mansion-houses for the Vice President and heads of Departments, and to furnish them, and provide them with lights and fuel, at the public expense.

Propositions are also pending, for additional compensation to some three or four additional lines of ocean mail steamers, based upon the precedent set at the last session, in the appropriation for the Collins line. And from all parts of the country there will come up a deafening horse-leech cry of "Give!" "Give!" If the evil consequences of this state of things did not extend beyond the loss of some twenty or thirty millions, of which the public Treasury will be plundered, it would not be a matter of so much importance.

But the tendency of such a state of things, to beget extravagance and profligacy in public and private expenditures, and to pervert the moral sense of public functionaries, must go far to impair and undermine republican institutions, and bring them into disgrace and contempt.

I have no sympathy with the clamor which I hear, about the sufferings of the office holders, on account of their inability to live upon the compensation now allowed by law. If any of the heads of Departments cannot live on $6,000 a year, it would, to my mind, furnish a very good reason for turning them out of office, but not for increasing their salaries.

The great mass of the people of the country, who pay the revenues from which the compensation of public functionaries is derived, live on a smaller annual income than is paid to the worst paid clerk in the public service. And I can see no reason why the hired servants of the people should be paid better than their masters.

A public functionary acquires no additional dignity or consequence in the estimation of any sensible man, at home or abroad, by clothing himself in "purple and fine linen," or attempting, in any manner, to ape the nobility or aristocracy of the old broken down despotisms of Europe. On the contrary, he brings upon himself and his country the ridicule and contempt of the very men whose footsteps he is so obsequiously following. The consideration and standing of the United States does not depend upon any matter of court etiquette or silly display, but upon the power and resources of the country, and the character of the people for honesty, intelligence, enterprise, and courage; upon their capacity to understand their rights, and upon the spirit and courage with which they are always ready to maintain them. Economy in public expenditures, and plainness and simplicity in public functionaries, is indispensable to the preservation of republican institutions.

For these reasons I am opposed to the accumulation of any considerable surplus in the public Treasury, and am prepared to go into the inquiry as to the best mode of preventing it. Two prominent modes of accomplishing this object are presented.

1st. By making a pro rata reduction of duties upon all imports that now pay duty.

2d. By abolishing entirely the duties upon sundry articles of import that do not come into competition with the productions of this country.

The first I understand to be the one generally advocated on the other side of the Hall, and the second is the one generally favored on this side. I know there are exceptions on both sides, and that there may be many who would make slight modifications in the terms of these propositions. But they define with sufficient certainty for the purpose which I have in view the position of the great body of the members upon this floor. I am ready to unite in such an adjustment of duties as will reduce the revenue arising from duties on imports; provided always that the protection now afforded to the industry of the country shall not be affected by the change. I admit that I am so far behind this progressive age as to be in favor of "protection for the sake of protection." In the adjustment of duties on imports, my primary object is protection; but I am willing to keep the effects of it upon the revenue in view as an incidental and secondary consideration. I speak for no one but myself, and no party nor no individual but myself is responsible for my opinions. I advocate protection to the manufacturer, not for his sake only or mainly, but because I wish to build up a consuming class that will create a market for the agricultural products of the country. I know that in a country of such vast extent, with a soil of such unequaled fertility, and a climate so various, that agriculture must, for generations to come, if not in all future time, be the great, leading, and paramount interest of the country.

In all our legislation, therefore, I look mainly to its effect upon agricultural pursuits. And I know that the farmer can never prosper without an adequate, certain, and uniform market for his products. And my settled conviction is, that a home market is better than a foreign, because it saves the expense of distant transportation for his heavy and bulky commodities, and is not affected by foreign wars, famines, or commercial revulsions.

I cannot perceive the wisdom of importing immense cargoes of railroad iron from Wales and England, and laying it down upon the banks of the Juniata, and the tributaries of the Alleghany, over the richest deposits of iron and coal that can be found in the universe, and sending the wheat raised upon the adjoining farms in New York and Pennsylvania, to Wales and England to pay for it. I think it would be better to bring the operatives from Wales and England to New York and Pennsylvania, where they would make just as much iron, and eat just as much wheat, as they now do, and save the expense of transportation both ways.

In short, I believe that reason and common sense teaches, and that all experience proves, that national and individual prosperity is best promoted and secured, by each nation producing by the labor of its own citizens, every commodity adapted to its soil and climate, which can be produced with as little labor at home as abroad. All history proves that where there is the greatest diversity of pursuits, and the most extensive exchange of commodities amongst the people of any country, there is always the largest accumulation of wealth, and the greatest national and individual prosperity.

On the other hand, where a nation devotes the labor of its entire population to a single pursuit, (and especially to agriculture,) the people are uniformly poor, and the nation feeble and defenseless. The reason is obvious. Raw agricultural products are extremely bulky and heavy in proportion to their value. Many of them will not bear transportation at all.

The timber of Minnesota and Wisconsin would be worth millions in the neighborhood of New York or Cincinnati, but is an incumbrance to the owner of the land, who has to destroy it at great labor and expense to bring his land into cultivation.

A bushel of wheat cannot be transported from the interior of Indiana or Illinois, to Liverpool, for less than sixty cents, and will sell for one dollar and twenty cents when it gets there, leaving the farmer sixty cents.

Thus for the leading staple of the Northwest, the cost of transportation is equal to the cost of production, and equal to fifty per cent. upon the selling price at the place of consumption.

On the other hand, a manufacturer in Manchester sends to Indiana or Illinois an equal weight of silks or other fine fabrics for about the same price, say sixty or seventy-five cents, and sells them for $1,200 or $1,500. The cost of transportation is nothing. And while the British manufacturer can send his fabrics to any part of the commercial world and sell them at five or ten per cent. advance upon the cost of production in Manchester or Leeds, the American farmer is confined to such commodities, and such markets as will pay transportation. No wonder John Bull is willing to pay liberally for teaching Brother Jonathan the mysteries of free trade.

If we were the sole producer of these agricultural products, and could command our own prices in foreign markets, we might, by demanding high prices for them, to some extent indemnify ourselves against the enormous expense of transportation.

But our farmers have to come into competition with the wheat-growers from Russia, Poland, the northern part of Germany, and other countries bordering upon the Baltic and Black seas. They can produce wheat as cheap or cheaper than we can, and are much closer to the market. We are therefore compelled to sell as cheap as they do, or not sell at all.

It must be obvious that such a trade as this is entirely one-sided, and that an agricultural country can stand no chance with a manufacturing country under unrestricted free trade. Hence, you find that the great centers of commerce are always in the manufacturing countries. Why is it that exchange is in favor of London against the whole commercial world? Because England is the great work-shop of the world, and exchanges her light and costly fabrics for the raw and bulky productions of other countries. It is not my intention, however, to discuss in detail, or at any considerable length, this doctrine of protection.

I desire, however, to notice one point made in the very able speech of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. WOODWARD,] the other day.

His proposition is, that a permanent revenue tariff is impossible. That it is the difference between the cost of foreign and domestic production, that enables imports to pay duties. That this difference is constantly diminishing. That American skill is advancing. American profits are lowering. American economy is improving. Machinery—which makes everything now—the hands of man do but little—is as skillful in the United States as in England.

If there could be any doubt about the soundness of the gentleman's logic, his illustrations prove its correctness beyond controversy.

It is undoubtedly true, that the competition between foreign and domestic manufacturers, is constantly stimulating the enterprise and invention of our people, to introduce cheaper modes of production to such an extent, that even ad valorem duties, that are constantly diminishing with the diminished cost of imports, ultimately become prohibitory, and yield no revenue. But does it never occur to the gentleman, that while the revenues of the Government are diminishing, the people are gaining in the diminished cost of the commodities which they consume, and in the diversity of pursuits amongst our people, which makes them purchasers of each other's products, instead of rivals in the sale of the same commodity?

And while I admit that the gentleman's argument is sound, so far as it applies to the effect of the tariff upon the revenue, I think he must also admit that when the friends of protection use the same argument to show that commodities are ultimately reduced in price to the consumer by steady and uniform protection, that they are also correct.

In fact the gentleman's argument is a full and unequivocal admission of the proposition which the advocates of protection have been urging upon the country for thirty or forty years; that the ultimate effect of protection would be, to reduce the price of the protected article. This argument has heretofore been scoffed and jeered at, by the opponents of protection, as ridiculous and absurd. I am much gratified to find that it has secured the powerful support of so distinguished an advocate of free trade as the gentleman from South Carolina. The gentleman is not only right in his facts and conclusions, but he assigned the true reason for the constant depreciation in the price of protected imports.

It is American skill, industry, and interprise, stimulated by both foreign and domestic competition.

When there is no domestic product to come in competition with the dutiable import, this constant reduction does not take place; and if it did, it could not affect the revenue; because the lower the price, the larger will be the amount of the import, when there is no domestic product to come in competition with it, or supply any part of the demand.

But all this diminution in price, resulting from competition between domestic and foreign manufacturers, presupposes the existence of manufacturing establishments in this country. Yet it is very clear, and the history of manufactures in this country proves, that manufactures cannot be established at all, without some protection to counteract the effect of the difference between the wages of labor in this country and in Europe. The improvements in labor-saving machinery, skill, and economy, (which, as the gentleman supposes, will ultimately enable us to overcome entirely the difference in cost of labor, and manufacture as cheap as any other country,) is the result of long, painful, and dear-bought experience. This experience cannot be had until manufactures are established. And when established, they must be sustained long enough to give an opportunity for testing the various experiments and processes which may be necessary to ascertain what are the best and cheapest modes of production. And this is all that the friends of protection have ever asked. If they can have the aid of their Government as long as the inventor is guarantied the exclusive use of his invention, they will then be willing either to set competition at defiance, or abandon their business.

The gentleman from South Carolina says that when the fertile lands of the West are filled up, and the laborer cannot have them to fly to, to escape low wages, that we shall then manufacture the great mass of the productions that are now imported. In this, I have no doubt, he is correct also. And the great question for Congress and the country to decide is, whether we shall postpone the introduction of manufactures until we are driven to it, to find employment for our population at starving wages; or whether we shall encourage their introduction, by protecting them in their infancy, and by diversifying the pursuits of our people now, and by increasing the rewards of labor, postpone to some remote and distant day, if not forever, the time when labor shall be driven by want to seek employment at inadequate wages.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JONES] also anticipates the "good time coming," when ill-paid labor will secure low-priced products, and thereby destroy the revenue arising from duties on imports, and usher in the political millennium of free trade and direct taxation. There is no necessity for that close, intimate, and unrestrained commercial intercourse which carries with it equality in the wages of labor; and every one knows that a free and unrestrained exchange of the products of labor must of necessity ultimately result in an equality in the wages of labor. The reason why the wages of labor in this country have not yet been affected by our commercial relations with Europe is, first, because our immense wild lands furnish a better subsistence to the laborer than starving wages in a manufacturing establishment; and, second, because the American manufacturer has always been protected to some extent by duties on imports, which has enabled him to give better wages than is paid by European manufacturers; and whenever the duties have been so reduced that the manufacturer cannot give remunerating wages, the laborer has sought employment in other pursuits, such as clearing and cultivating the wild lands of the West, or in digging canals and making railroads.

The gentleman from South Carolina is looking forward to the time when the increase of population will be so great, and these sources of employment so far exhausted, that the supply of labor will exceed the demand, and that low wages will enable us to manufacture the great mass of the commodities which we now import.

Now, sir, I regard such a state of things as the greatest calamity that could befal this nation. And I believe it may be prevented for a period beyond which we cannot undertake to provide, if not indefinitely. To do this, we should multiply by proper and judicious laws the sources for the profitable employment of labor. Instead of confining the labor of the country to agriculture and public works, we should direct a portion of it to manufactures, and thereby increase the demand and enhance the price, so that the laborer may always find a liberal reward for his toil, and become a profitable customer both to the farmer and the manufacturer.

If I understood the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MOLONY,] he ridiculed the idea of creating a home market for the agricultural products of the country. He supposes that there cannot be a consuming population in this country that is capable of consuming all of its agricultural products. I am not aware that any advocate of protection has ever proposed to prevent the exportation of agricultural products. And I suppose the foreign demand will not be diminished by building up a home market. Europe buys our productions because she needs them, and not as a mere matter of accommodation. So long as her necessities continue, so long she will continue to buy from us, unless we have a better market at home and refuse to sell to her.

If we do not continue to sell to her it will be our own fault, and because we can do better at home, which I suppose will be no great calamity for us. It is no answer to this argument, to say that if we do not buy her manufactured products, that she cannot pay us for our commodities. Her population must be fed, and therefore must have employment. If we do not buy their iron, and woolen and cotton fabrics, they must sell them elsewhere for silks, tea and coffee, and such commodities as we do buy, or abandon to some extent their present pursuits, and engage in the production of such things as we do want, and exchange these with us for our products. Nor is it any answer to this to say, that if we do not buy their fabrics, that they will buy from other nations who will. They will always buy where they can buy cheapest. And if they can buy a bushel of German wheat now for $1 25, they will not give us $1 26. And so it will continue, whether we buy their fabrics or not. The creation of a home market, therefore, does not deprive us of the foreign, but creates an additional market, that of necessity enhances the price of our products. But I cannot see that there is any impossibility in creating a home market for all our agricultural products.

The farmers of the United States annually exchange their entire products for the productions of the industry of other persons, who are engaged in other pursuits.

I do not mean that they consume or destroy all they earn, but their profits and accumulations are not hoarded away in coin, but are reinvested in some product of the industry of others. Now, if the products for which a farmer exchanges his crops, are all the products of the labor of our own citizens, then it follows of necessity that the home market is sufficient. It is no matter whether the commodities which he buys are manufactured here, or in Europe; they will pay for the same amount of his products in the one case as in the other.

And it has always seemed to me that the farmer and manufacturer are both gainers by living close together, as they thereby save the expense of distant transportation. I presume no one is prepared now to say any thing definite as to the amount, that the duty should be either increased or diminished on any particular commodity.

But with others, I am prepared to state the principles by which I would be governed in adjusting the duties. In the first place, I would put up the duties on such articles as are produced in this country, to the highest revenue point. If that produced revenue enough, I would abolish the duties on everything else

If it raised more than was necessary, I would raise the duties a little higher on protected articles, so as to check imports and diminish the revenue. If it did not produce enough, I would levy the balance upon foreign luxuries, such as imported silks, liquors, and other articles consumed mainly by the rich, and not produced in this country. Further, I agree with the President's message, in substituting specific for ad valorem duties. I am opposed to ad valorem duties, not only on account of the facilities for fraud which they furnish, but because they create a sort of sliding scale against protection.

Thus, when railroad iron was selling at $70 per ton, and no protection was necessary, then your thirty per cent. ad valorem amounted to $21 per ton. But when it went down to $25 per ton, and your manufactures were broken down by foreign competition, your thirty per cent. amounted to only $7 50 per ton. Now, a specific duty of $15 per ton would probably yield more revenue, and afford ample protection, while the average cost of imported railroad iron would probably not exceed what it does under the thirty per cent. ad valorem duty.

But an ad valorem duty lacks uniformity and stability, which is the essential thing for a tariff for protection.

I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JONES] to say, that he, as a representative of the iron manufacturers of that State, prefers ad valorem to specific duties. Well, sir, there is no accounting for tastes; and as I take it for granted that the gentleman from Pennsylvania understands the interest of his immediate constituents better than I do, I shall vote with him for retaining the ad valorem duty upon iron; unless indeed I should find that some of his colleagues who represent the same interests, should differ with him; and then I shall be compelled to exercise my own judgment.

Mr. JONES, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman did not understand me. I did not speak as the representative of the iron interest. I hope I was not so understood. I do not wish to be understood as representing the iron interest or any particular interest, as I am not authorized to speak in that capacity.

Mr. STANTON. Of course I take the disclaimer and explanation. I understood the gentleman to say that he was the representative of a district producing iron, and so far as his knowledge extended, that there were many intelligent Whigs who do not want any change from ad valorem duties.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman misunderstood me. I stated that so far as my information extended, many intelligent Whigs had come to the conclusion that if they could secure stability, they would acquiesce in ad valorem duties—not that they preferred it—and make no further contest for specific.

Mr. STANTON. Just the very point I am making, that of necessity there can be no stability. Now, the gentleman says that if they can get stability they will be satisfied. You cannot get stability from the very nature of things. I understood the gentleman at the last session to propose, that the value of imported iron at the time of the passage of the tariff of 1846 should be ascertained, and we should then levy an ad valorem upon that valuation. That is practically a specific duty. It is not ad valorem at all. You may as well say that there shall be a duty of $20 or $25 per ton upon imported iron when it comes into market. Practically, it will be the same thing.

Mr. JONES. I had not an opportunity of being heard upon that occasion. I will state for the information of the gentleman, what I could not say at that time. I did not mean to say that the valuations should be fixed and stationary. My object was to get a valuation, to be made as nearly stationary as possible, by frequent appraisements, making it stationary for six or twelve months, in order, by taking averages, to get as near as possible to a condition of stability. Appraisements throughout the country should be made in different ports, and the appraisers should meet twice a year or oftener, and ascertain the average valuation, and for the sake of stability let that remain until the next meeting. In that point of view an arrangement of this kind might be satisfactory, though it was a mere suggestion to meet a certain contingency, if that should become necessary.

Mr. STANTON. If I understand the first proposition, it amounts to this: He proposes periodically to fix a specific duty through the instrumentality of appraisers; for this is substantially the gentleman's proposition. After all, it is a confession that your ad valorems are unstable and fluctuating, and cannot be relied upon as protective duties at all; and it is a confession of the soundness of the views of the President's message, that specific duties are preferable.

Mr. Chairman, I know it is claimed with great confidence that public opinion has been repeatedly expressed against protection at the ballot-box. I do not think so.

There are always so many elements entering into a presidential contest, that it is difficult to tell whether any, or if any, what principle or measure of public policy is approved by the election of one candidate, or the defeat of another.

Different issues are made in different sections of the country. In one part of the country a Democrat evades and slides round the tariff issue, and in another, a Whig does the same thing. But one thing I do know, and that is, that the whole Democratic party in this House have never "faced the music" fair and square upon this tariff question. There seems to be a manifest reluctance from some quarters to risk an appeal to the people upon the naked and direct question of protection or free trade. And it is my solemn conviction that if you could take the verdict of the people upon this question alone, upon full and fair discussion, that a majority would be found in favor of the principle of protection I know that it is so connected and identified with party politics, that we can hardly expect any fixed settled policy upon the subject.

What is done by one party when it is in power, is almost certain to be undone by the other so soon as it obtains power. However pernicious and deplorable such a state of things may be, it seems nevertheless to be unavoidable. And the only hope seems to me to be, that the progress and improvement that is making in labor-saving machinery, may enable many branches of manufactures to dispense to so great an extent with manual labor, that they may be able to live and sustain themselves by the aid of such little snatches of incidental protection as they may get under a Democratic tariff, and such honest, old-fashioned protection as they may occasionally get under Whig rule.

MODIFICATION OF THE TARIFF.

SPEECH OF HON. J. GLANCY JONES,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

December 13, 1852,

On the Tariff question; delivered in the Committee of the Whole, on the motion to refer the President's Annual Message to the several committees.

Mr. JONES, of Pennsylvania, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I confess I was somewhat surprised the other day to hear the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.] I had supposed the honorable gentleman to be what is commonly known as a National Whig; and as such, I was under the impression that he was in favor of protection per se. How, therefore, he could offer a resolution at this particular crisis, for such a purpose as that proposed upon the tariff question, was beyond my comprehension. Certainly, if that gentleman is the advocate of protection, he must know that, constituted as this House is at this particular time, nothing could possibly accrue that would not be injurious to that particular interest. He knows that under the operation of the tariff of 1846, at this particular juncture, the duties levied upon imports, particularly upon articles which are manufactured in my own State, are at such high rates as almost, in the language of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. WOODWARD,] to have approached the prohibitory point; and in any possible contingency, viewing it as I suppose he does, I cannot conceive of any adjustment which can be made of the tariff question at this crisis that would not be most unquestionably injurious to these interests.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] stated in his first resolution to this House that the object he had in view was a reduction of the revenue, with a view to prevent the accumulation of a surplus. I wish to know of the honorable gentleman from New York if he has looked abroad and reflected before he made up his mind to take this step? He talks about a surplus revenue. Does that gentleman know that in less than one year from this day you may not have a surplus revenue but in its place you may find a deficiency? I hesitate not one moment to say at this time, as the honest conviction of my mind, that Europe has retrograded fifty years in the last six months. Fifty years ago there was an empire in Europe. That empire, pretending to be republican, was arrayed in active hostility against the despotic powers of Europe. Russia, Austria, and Prussia all combined with England against France. Now, what is the spectacle? A new empire rising in colossal grandeur, not opposed, but backed by all these self-same powers of despotism. With all the diplomatic pretensions of hostility to the empire, made by Russia, Austria, and Prussia, my deliberate conviction is, that there now subsists a secret alliance, formed between them, under which combined power the war of despotism against liberty is soon to be fought. I may be mistaken. I hope that I am; but I see events in Europe which have no analogy in history, and which were never heard or dreamed of before. Why, to use a paradox, there is a Democratic absolutism—the most despotic power on the face of the earth, created by the free suffrages of forty millions of people, and for what purpose? For the purpose, sir, of meeting an issue which we ourselves have already made. Has not this country planted itself upon the Monroe doctrine? What does that doctrine teach? It teaches that while the Powers subsisting at this time upon this continent may hold their position as long as they have the capacity to do so, (our Government not interfering,) that nevertheless this Government never can and never will consent that any foreign Power shall gain a fresh foothold upon American soil. Is not this the principle, the doctrine of the Democratic party of this Union? Now, where is Cuba? Why, precisely in this position. We have declared in all our negotiations with foreign Governments that Spain may hold Cuba so long as she has the power to hold and govern her, but that no Power on earth shall occupy it, saving ourselves, when she ceases to be able to hold it.

Now, this is the doctrine of our foreign policy, or at least will be, I presume; and in this very state of things, one of the morning papers tells us that the French empire has annexed to it a province of Mexico called Sonora. It is a remark long since made by Richelieu, that in State affairs "there are no small steps." Here is an indication; to me it is ominous, and it leads my mind to the conclusion, looking upon the existing state of affairs in Europe, that in less than twelve months from this day you will find the French empire, backed by the despotisms of Russia, Prussia, and Austria, prepared, and well prepared too, to contest the question whether a foreign Government shall or shall not gain a footing upon this continent. Now, the question is not whether we shall go to war with Europe; the question is not whether we shall follow the doctrines of Kossuth, and go abroad as propagandists; but the true question presented to the American people, as the champion of freedom, is, whether, in less than twelve months from this day, you may not be called upon to maintain your position, or abandon it? Not to become the aggressor in propagating this doctrine, but whether you will abandon or defend it with your arms? Mr. Chairman, I allude to this incidentally, because I know that the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] is perfectly conversant with these affairs; and knowing that this is, at least, a possible contingency, it strikes me as the more extraordinary that he, who is a protective tariff man and a National Whig, and looking thus upon the present state of our foreign relations, should move at this day for an immediate reduction of the revenues of the Government.

Now, sir, I am opposed to an alteration of the tariff of 1846 at this time. I am opposed to it because we have no land marks or statistics to guide us. We have not even a message from the President on the subject that gives us statistical details, and we have not access to a single thing at this time which will throw any light upon this perplexed and perplexing question; and yet the gentleman proposes that we should all at once, without hesitation or deliberation, act immediately upon the whole subject of the tariff with reference to its reduction in order to get rid of the surplus revenue. I presume that there are but few members who hold seats in this House, who have derived their power from the people, at least within two years. I know that I do not. It is two years since I was elected a member of this House. The people of this Union have, within two months, elected as their President and standard bearer of Democratic principles Franklin Pierce. Shall he not have a hearing on this great question, in which the Government has so deep an interest? Is it not the will and wish of the Democratic party that the man who is the choice of the American people for the Presidency of the United States shall be heard on this and on all kindred subjects before we act? I, sir, do not believe that the Democratic members of this House will consent to act upon this subject now; but that they will regard it as uncalled for and impolitic in the extreme. Our candidate was nominated by a convention representing every State in this Union. They built a platform, embodying the doctrines of the Democratic party. Franklin Pierce planted himself upon that platform, and the American people, by a majority almost unheard of in the annals of our history, made him the President elect of the United States. As for the Whigs, I have no fault to find with them in this affair, because, if their papers speak truly, they have an object to accomplish, and that object is our division. But knowing this, I am at a loss to understand upon what principle a Democrat can wish to open this question at this time. You have now no statistic details, nor any reliable information upon a subject the most perplexing of all questions; how you can act, then, I confess I cannot comprehend. I have no objection, however, to a full discussion. I am perfectly willing to discuss this question from beginning to end. For one, coming as I do from the State of Pennsylvania, I hold myself in readiness at any time to answer every interrogatory put to me.

Mr. CARTTER inquired if the gentleman now speaking had not moved a modification of the tariff of 1846, at the last session?

Mr. JONES. I will answer the gentleman. I did not ask for a change of the tariff, but only a modification of the mode of appraisement, without changing the ad valorem or revenue standard. I will come to that though in good time, and satisfy the gentleman that I would do it again, and often, upon the position I have taken and now occupy. I will read the gentleman the substance of a resolution presently, drawn by my own hand in 1846, endorsing the principles of the tariff of 1846, with a proviso that we would favor such a modification of its details from time to time as the exigencies of the country might require consistently with those principles; I offered a resolution at the last session of Congress precisely consistent with that, and I am ready to offer one at any future time, when needed, because I do not believe in the permanency of a revenue standard. Sometimes it is too high, sometimes too low.

I have already stated that I am opposed to opening the question at this time, but I shall vote for the amendment of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones,] because ever since the passage of the tariff of 1846, I have always stood by the ad valorem system. I shall vote, however, against the resolution as amended, because I am opposed to the opening of the question at this time.

The tariff of 1846 was passed in the month of July of that year. There was a Democratic convention held in the county of Berks, which is in my district, in the month of September, 1846. At that convention, I drew a resolution which was unanimously adopted by that convention, and I wish to read that resolution in order to show the position we then took, and also to show that all our acts, from that day to this, have been perfectly consistent with that position; and I wish to read it more especially because we are not understood upon this question. I say that the position of the Pennsylvania Democracy on the tariff question is not only founded upon sound Democratic principles, but that it is perfectly consistent with the Baltimore platform and with Democratic doctrine generally, it is the interest perhaps of some to misunderstand us, but it is my duty, to the extent of my ability, to see that we are not misunderstood any longer by the country. The resolution passed in September, 1846, was in substance as follows:

Resolved, That we approve of the principles of the tariff of 1846, with such modifications of its details, consistent with those principles, from time to time, as the exigencies of the country may require.

Now, sir, what is meant by the principles of the tariff of 1846? What I understand to be the principles of the tariff of 1846 are, first, that it shall have a revenue standard, and shall be adjusted with revenue for its primary object. This is one of its principles, and I, for one, have never been willing, and have never proposed, to depart from that standard since its adoption. Another principle of the tariff of 1846 is, that the duties shall be ad valorem. Now, sir, from the day when that tariff passed, in 1846, to this day, I have never seen a resolution passed by the democracy of the State of Pennsylvania, which I have the honor in part to represent, proposing to change either its ad valorem or revenue features. If that be our true position, then I wish to know wherein we are inconsistent? Starting upon this ground and upon these principles, the only open point with us was this: that we would ask for a modification of the details of the tariff whenever the exigencies of the country required it. And in answer to the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Carter] I say, that four months ago there was just such an exigency, in our judgment, and I moved for the modification, not of its principles, but of one of its details. Now there is no such exigency, and I am opposed to all change of its details at this time. That is my position; and it is perfectly plain, at least to me. On making this motion, you will remember, sir, that it was then ruled out of order, and consequently I had no opportunity of being heard. If I had, I should then have taken the same ground I take now. But I was not heard, and, except to the Committee of Ways and Means, of which I have the honor to be a member, my position was not understood. An opportunity is now afforded me to place the Democratic party of my own district, as I understand it, in its true position on this question of the tariff—the position which it has always occupied ever since the passage of the act of 1846; and I proceed to do it.

The exigency that arose at the last session of Congress was just this: the tariff is ad valorem and the price of iron had fallen so low that thirty per cent. was actually far below the revenue standard. I could prove to the satisfaction of any man, that my proposition, made at the last session of Congress, would have increased our revenue considerably. If it could have been shown that my proposition was going to check the revenue, or to go beyond the revenue standard, I would have abandoned it at once. I tell the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] that if he is apprehensive of the accumulation of a surplus revenue, let the tariff remain where it is upon iron at this day; and so far as that article is concerned he will soon find his fears to be groundless. If you look for revenue from the present tariff on iron, it will be like calling spirits from the vasty deep; it will not come. Under the ad valorem system, and the present high prices of iron, if these prices continue the duty will soon reach a prohibitory point, and the iron interests of the country do not want that. All they have ever asked of this Government is to give them a fixed system; stability is all they need now, and they will get along very well. Some of them, it is true, are clamorous for protection; but a majority of them have learned that stability, on almost any tolerable system, is best for their interests, and that too high prices are just as ruinous as too low. The proposition which I submitted four months ago to this House, was based upon the resolution which I have read, that the tariff ought to be modified, from time to time, according to the exigencies of the country, that is, the exigencies of revenue. It was then expedient to offer such a resolution; but now it would be inexpedient, because, at that time the duty was far below the revenue standard, and now it is above it.

This, then, Mr. Chairman, is the position of the Democracy of my district. The iron interests, irrespective of party, are gradually making up their minds to abandon all hope of direct protection. They are coming to the conclusion, especially since the last election, that the Democratic party is the party of the country; that its policy and principles will rule this country; and that, although they may not get what they want according to their own views, they can get something like stability; and a faithful adherence by the Democratic party to their own system will, in my opinion, soon secure their acquiescence. The iron interest is fast coming to the conclusion now, that if it were possible for the Whig party to carry a protective tariff in this Congress, or in any subsequent one, it would not stand. It would be repealed, perhaps, the very next Congress. There is no stability in it. It is founded on the supposition that we must have special legislation for the interests of one State. And who could expect that the legislation of this nation should be adapted to the peculiar interests of one State, at the expense of others? If the Whig party could control this General Government, or had power to adopt this policy and to carry it out, it might answer very well for them. But this is not likely to happen; for the Democratic party can never so far depart from their general principles, as to give protection to the peculiar interests of a single State which may be at war with the interests of other States. Our manufacturing interests must look, therefore, to the policy and principles of the Democratic party, and take their chances on the platform of equality with the other great interests of the country.

In this view their only chance is incidental protection. A good deal has been said about this incidental protection; but it seems to me that so far as the tariff question is concerned, the distinction between incidental and accidental is scarcely perceptible, especially if the fluctuations of trade are called accidents. If I understand incidental protection, it means a contingency dependent upon another contingency; that is to say, that an ad valorem duty tariff, rising and falling, protects the article incidentally to that extent. Revenue is the object, protection the incident.

I will state precisely the ground occupied by the Democratic party of my district on this subject of incidental protection. We take the ground of the revenue standard. Put your revenue standard upon our domestic manufactures at the highest revenue point, and the only incidental protection that is asked is just that accidental protection which may result from that standard. That is what we mean by incidental protection, and that is the only protection for which the Democratic party of my district now contends.

Mr. Chairman, representing in part the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, I say that upon this platform, in my opinion, her Democracy now stand, and, I will add, upon which the iron and manufacturing interests of my State will be compelled to stand. I believe, also, that in order to secure stability, and to give us the greatest amount of incidental protection, consistent with the principles of the Democratic party, the country is disposed to give this system their support, or at least acquiescence. This position, sir, is ad valorem against specific duties; a tariff for revenue against protection. No man pretends to doubt, I presume, now that a tariff strictly construed is a tax. It is nothing but indirect taxation, or taxation upon consumption. I was very glad to hear my honorable friend from South Carolina [Mr. Woodward] state the other day that he regarded a horizontal tariff as a perfect farce.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like any gentleman who undertakes to discuss this tariff question, to tell me how he can adjust a tariff for revenue on a horizontal scale. The gentleman [Mr. Woodward] showed most conclusively, in his speech, that if you adopt a tariff for revenue, you must place the duty on some articles at five, some at ten, and some at twenty or thirty per cent. A horizontal tariff would produce no revenue on some articles.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have further to remark on this subject, that, in my opinion, such a tariff as I have described must end in free trade. I want to be distinctly understood upon this question, because I was pleased the other day to hear the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Woodward] define his idea, or give his definition of free trade. If I understood him correctly, he said the day would come when the imports into this country would not bear any duty at all, because our own manufacturing productions would be furnished so cheap that they could come into competition with any produced in the world. Now, I believe this position to be correct, and I give it my cordial approval. In that view, I am a prospective free-trader, and a progressive one, too, in that ratio. I am willing to be a free-trader out and out, as soon as we arrive at that point. I firmly believe it will be reached. And I will say further, that I not only concur with him in this view, but the Democratic party of Pennsylvania also concur in these views. To illustrate this, I will show, before I conclude, that there has been progress in Pennsylvania on this question, and in that direction. They believe that this matter will end in free trade. They are willing to be free-traders, when we shall have arrived at that point when the imports into this country will not bear duties.

So far, then, we agree upon principle. Where, then, is the difference between what are miscalled tariff Democrats and free-traders? It is a distinction without a difference. Our position is identical, if only properly understood. We agree upon a tariff for revenue, upon the ad valorem principle, and we agree upon the question of progressive free-tradeism. Where, then, is the difference? It does not exist. A tariff Democrat is a misnomer.

The next question is as to the adjustment or discrimination of this tariff. The Baltimore platform has laid down a principle for the Democratic party, that no one interest shall be fostered at the expense of another. I subscribe to that principle. I shall ask for discrimination in any tariff, but I shall not ask for a discrimination in favor of any article beyond the revenue standard, nor shall I ask it at the expense of any other interest. That is what I understand by the Baltimore platform. You must not protect, in any way, or foster, any one interest of the country at the expense of another.

The question now under discussion is, how shall you adjust the duties to reduce the revenue and avoid a surplus? I agree with some of the gentlemen who have preceded me upon this subject, and the very moment there is an accumulation of surplus revenue in the Treasury, and there is no mode of disposing of it in a proper and legitimate manner except by a reduction of the duties, I will go any length to secure that reduction. That is, as I understand it, all that is asked. And while I am opposed at this present time to any reduction of the tariff of 1846, as being fraught, in my opinion, with nothing but mischief, I will say now, that in one year from this time, after we have all the light, all the information, and all the statistics we want—when we have had time to deliberate upon the proper mode of reduction—I will most cheerfully concur in such a reduction.

I have no hesitation now in expressing my own views to the House of the proper mode of reduction. In the first place, the principle I set out with is, that we ought to have an economical administration of the General Government. I subscribe to that principle, and, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, I will vote for a reduction in the next fiscal year of $6,000,000 of the current expenditure. The proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] is to reduce the income or revenue of the Government, with a view of meeting only the expenses of the Government, economically administered. I concur in this, and, as I have just remarked, I will vote in the Committee of Ways and Means, and in the House, to reduce the annual appropriation for defraying the current expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year $6,000,000, which will reduce the whole amount to $40,000,000. I am willing to meet that contingency now by applying this surplus revenue to the cancellation of the national debt, so far as it can be done. This will dispose of a portion of it. In the next place, if, after this, it be found that we have a surplus in the Treasury, and no employment for it, I will agree to a reduction of the tariff of 1846, first by an extension of the free list. In order to understand this, I suppose myself to be two years hence—for that will be soon enough—with the national debt paid as far as it can be done with the surplus revenue now on hand, and such as shall accrue in the mean time, and the administration of the Government of the United States reduced to the most economical point practicable, and that we are starting out now to reduce the revenue of the Government to meet only the actual wants of such economical administration. I repeat, then, that I would first extend the free list; I would, in the next place, levy a duty upon all articles which we manufacture at the revenue, the highest revenue standard. That would make a beginning. I would place a duty on these articles at the highest revenue standard—no higher and no lower. That is Democratic doctrine; that is a revenue tariff—and what next? Why, I would then make all articles of foreign growth or foreign production, which are consumed by the masses, (excluding a certain class of luxuries,) and which we do not manufacture in this country, free of all duty, or, if that would take off too much revenue, I would reduce it down to the lowest compatible point. I believe I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] in regard to extending this free list, or in reducing the duties on this species of productions just to the point required to pay the expenses of the Government, economically administered.

These are precisely my views upon this subject, and I believe they embody the views of most of my Democratic constituents, or those of the Democratic party generally in Pennsylvania. That is the doctrine of the Baltimore platform, and it is the principle embodied in the tariff of 1846. There is where the Democrats of Pennsylvania place themselves; and we are willing to stand upon those principles with you. We only ask that when a modification of the tariff of 1846 shall come, that you will place the highest revenue standard upon such articles as are manufactured in this country.

I agree with the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. WOODWARD] in another point—that no tariff can be made a permanent one. There is no such thing as making it permanent, because the circumstances or causes which regulate it are subject to the laws of trade, and it is not in the power of human legislation to make it permanent unless that legislation can be made to regulate also the laws of supply and demand. Otherwise you cannot make a tariff by any invention of man which can remain permanent. It must change according to the circumstances which may arise, and all you can do is to establish settled principles by which to guide yourselves in running on with this progressive tendency to free trade, and I do solemnly believe that this progression will not only be the highest indication of the success of our manufactures, but of the greatness, the growth, and glory of our country.

I wish, Mr. Chairman, to say, in connection with this subject, that the point of difference between myself and some gentlemen upon this floor is, that I make a discrimination in favor of manufactures; so I do, but I am in favor of our manufactures against that which we do not produce, and which is not indigenous to our soil. Is not this Democratic? I would like any gentleman to tell me where I shall go to find a better Democratic doctrine. Does it make any difference, taking the tariff as a tax, whether a man pays two dollars duty on one article, and nothing on another, or pays one dollar on each? None at all, provided both articles enter alike into general consumption. Does it make any difference whether you lay the burdens of the Government on one article of general consumption, or on two? I can see none. If that position be correct, then it makes no difference whether your tariff is laid upon articles of manufacture or not, provided it is laid upon articles of general consumption entering into all classes of society.

If articles of manufacture are articles of general consumption, and if it is your object by this indirect mode of taxation to distribute the burdens of the Government equally upon all, by laying these duties upon manufactures, you will reach that point as nearly as is practicable. Call it, then, a tax, and that tax it laid upon manufactures at the revenue standard; then make a free list, and what is the effect? Why, sir, do not you reap the benefits on every article that is introduced into the country free—every article, I mean, of raw material? Every such article that is placed upon the free list is manufactured in this country, and enters into the general consumption of the whole country; and is not this fair? Take, for instance, the articles of tea and coffee; they are not produced in this country, but they come here free of duty; they are diffused all over the country, and every man partakes of the benefit of them as free articles. Is not that equal? Is it not just? Why, sir, the only possible discrimination it can make is in favor of the poor and the laboring classes, against the rich and those who are best able to bear the burdens of taxation. But I am talking of this principle as consistent with the principles of the Democratic party—a discrimination in favor of a free list! Why, sir, I would be willing to meet any Democrat upon that argument, because it is as clear to my mind as anything can be. I ask any Democrat to meet me with the Baltimore platform before him, or any position the Democratic party of the country has ever taken, and show me that there is any injustice or inequality, or any taxing of one interest of the country at the expense of another by extending your free list, and placing a tariff at the revenue standard upon your manufactured articles.

Now, sir, taking that position, what next? Why, Mr. Chairman, we shall then begin to reduce the revenue standard, and then according to the position of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. WOODWARD,] we shall, in a period of time, which he perhaps sees in the distance, arrive at free trade.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I wish to see if I understand the gentleman's proposition. His principle, if I apprehend him aright, is, that the duty shall be imposed upon those articles which are manufactured in this country. For example, to illustrate my views, salt is an article of general consumption. If you impose a duty upon salt, it appears that the salt makers of this country would pay no part of that duty, because they would sell and not buy. I would like to know of the gentleman whether, if you impose duties upon articles manufactured in this country alone, you will not thereby relieve the manufacturer from all share in supporting the Government; and I should like to know how he would work out his policy in practice?

Mr. JONES. I did not in this discussion propose to go into all the details of all possible contingencies that might arise out of a modification of the tariff. I have no objection—although I do not understand the gentleman's proposition exactly—to repeat my views in general terms.

Mr. CLINGMAN, (interrupting.) If the gentleman will allow me a single word further. I have no doubt, if there were some one article which everybody consumed, it would make no difference if you put the tax upon that article. But I wish to direct the gentleman's attention to the difficulty in practice in carrying out any such general principle as he lays down. For example, you cannot take any one article, manufactured in this country, that everybody will buy alike. Here will be the difficulty of carrying out his principles. I would like to have the gentleman go a little into detail, and show me how the principle is to be carried out. I can well understand how, if you tax everything, everybody will contribute; but if you select an article manufactured in this country alone, and impose a duty upon that, then, of course, the manufacturers, as they do not buy that article, pay no part of the duty; but upon the other hand they get a benefit in the shape of protection, and a bounty in the high prices. It seems to me that they have no right to ask us to relieve them altogether.

Mr. JONES, (resuming.) I thought I stated distinctly, in my proposition, that I expected nothing perfect in this world—at least, I never found it—and if I intimated that any tariff could be adjusted with equal justice to every man in the Union, I certainly meant no such thing. All that we can do in the adjustment of the details of the tariff is, to get as near the point as we possibly can. That some men will not be equally taxed with others is all very true. In adjusting the tariff upon consumption, he who consumes the most pays the most taxes. That is all I mean to say now, without going into details, because I am not prepared to argue that question at this time, and I may upon another occasion go into the details of it. All that we can do is to aim as near that point as we possibly can, and if the gentleman will suggest something better, I will be willing to join him. I may say, however, that he is mistaken in saying manufacturers are not consumers; but I concede it is not so much a question of principle, as it is one of expediency, consistent with principle.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe I have gone over the points, and I do not wish to occupy any time in repeating them. I have stated them, as a matter of course—as general principles—and I can do nothing else in one hour. When I am called upon to define the position of my party at home, in my district, upon the prospective reduction of the whole tariff system, and occupying one half or two thirds of the time in defending the positions I take, it is utterly impossible for me to go into any argument in exposition of my views upon the details of this tariff. Therefore I pass that by, upon general principles; but I repeat, that when the time comes, we stand ready to adjust the duties of this tariff, upon the revenue standard, on all that we manufacture or produce, and consequently to extend the free list, and reduce the duties upon those articles which we do not produce, to such a point as may come within the requisites of the Government, to meet its economical expenditures; and if that produces a surplus revenue, then we go one step further, and reduce below the revenue point, and so continue from time to time, progressively, until we are brought to entire free trade. That was the position I was endeavoring to explain, so as to be understood.

Now, I have something to say in relation to the position which the State of Pennsylvania has occupied in relation to those views, ever since the tariff of 1846 was passed. I have already stated that the resolution I read was adopted in 1846.

However, before I touch upon that subject, I wish to say one word in relation to the effect this course will produce upon the country. I have already stated that the effect of this will be, in the first instance, to throw the burden upon the richer classes, and to relieve the poorer and laboring classes. But there is one class it will not relieve, and that is the corporations and monopolies of the country, and consequently I cannot satisfy those honorable gentlemen who are in favor of exempting railroad iron, and making it free of duty—for I am at issue with them—or if they cannot agree with me, and go upon principle, convince me I am wrong, and I will abandon the point. I say the Democratic party is against such a course. You cannot discriminate by making railroad iron free of duty, unless you lay down the principle that it is proper and right to discriminate in favor of corporations and monopolies, because that is the tendency of it. I have been astonished to see that gentlemen, who have been talking about the principles of this tariff, and apprehending that I was departing from them, are in favor of making railroad iron free. Now, I want those gentlemen to tell me how they are to resist this issue. If you are in favor of repealing the duties on railroad iron, then you are in favor of discriminating favorably to corporations and monopolies. If, upon the other hand, you argue with me that such a course is for the benefit of the whole country, then you are in favor of aiding internal improvements at the expense of Government. It will not do to say that in taking off thirty per cent. in favor of railroad iron indirectly you are not thereby giving thirty per cent. to corporations out of the funds of the Government. There is no distinction at all that I can see, consequently in voting to discriminate in favor of railroad iron, and making it duty free, the effect of it irresistibly is, that you either discriminate in favor of corporations, or you are in favor of taking the money out of the Treasury for disbursing it in favor of internal improvements. I am opposed to both.

Mr. Chairman, the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, or at least the Democratic party in it, have always advanced on sound principles. We have often been told that we are unsound. I say that we have always shown ourselves willing to advance, and I can prove it by the records. How is it on the bank question? Who created that bank? Was it the Democratic party of Pennsylvania? Sir, it was the creature of this General Government. If it be unconstitutional to have a national bank, you are responsible for it, and not the State of Pennsylvania. Not only that, sir, but it has been our misfortune to have your very erroneous legislation located in our State. When you created a national bank of thirty-six millions of dollars, you planted it in my State, and then turned round and found fault with us because we had it there. Why, sir, it was your error, and not ours; all the political heresies that have ever got into the State of Pennsylvania, have come from this General Government; and that State learned all her heresies in your school. Now, on the bank question we have advanced, and come to occupy a true position upon it. We agree that a national bank is an obsolete idea. Is not that advancing upon sound principles? And I hope, sir, to see that very principle, some day or other, impregnating the Supreme Bench of this Union. I hope to see the constitutionality of the Bank of the United States reversed by the Supreme Court; and I also wish to see the case of Prigg vs. The Commonwealth, reversed too; then I shall be satisfied with the opinions and position of the Supreme Court of the United States.

That is the doctrine of the Supreme Court, and not of Pennsylvania. The dissenting opinion of Chief Justice Taney, according to my judgment, is more in accordance with their public views.

How is it with the question of the constitutional treasury? Is not Pennsylvania sound upon that question? If she be sound, does it not prove that she advances upon principle, and is always right? All that she asks in reference to these great questions of the country is to allow time to deliberate. She does not want to be put under a high pressure all the time by hasty changes, even where error exists and has taken deep root.

I respect the opinions of those gentlemen of the South who differ with me upon the manner of modifying the tariff. We meet you upon the tariff of '46 now, and beg you not to leave its principles until you at least succeed in convincing us it is wrong. When you do that, we will go with you. Allow us to take counsel with you upon these principles, and when the proper time comes, we will always advance upon principle. Only convince us that we are wrong, and Pennsylvania will follow the right.

How is it on the question of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands? Precisely the same. Pennsylvania is sound upon that question—as sound as any portion of the Democracy of the country. How is she upon the execution of the fugitive slave law? When the country was supposed to be in danger, did not Pennsylvania come to the rescue, and sustain, not the South, but the Constitution? She was called, at the North, a dough-face.

She has been called a follower of southern doctrines. Sir, she recognizes the doctrine of No North, no South; but the Constitution and the Union; the Constitution just as our fathers made it, enforced and interpreted by the principles of strict construction. She has always loved and admired southern constitutional doctrines; not because they are southern, but because in general they are sound in her judgment; but she has never lacked the nerve to forbear to follow when she believed them to be wrong.

I well remember when no man within the limits of this broad Union, occupied a larger share of her affections than the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, now gone to his grave. And yet, when he took a position in 1832 which she regarded as dangerous and unwise, she ceased to follow him on that question, although she never ceased to honor, to love, and to admire him.

It is upon the Constitution that she desires to stand, recognizing no higher law in the administration of the Government.

I cannot speak for the whole State, which I have the honor in part only to represent, except so far as my own opinions go of her position; but I think I understand her pretty well, and I can speak with confident assurance, at least for my own district, when I say that they repudiate the doctrine of Prigg vs. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, as well as that other famous decision, in which a United States Bank is declared to be constitutional, or rather perfectly consistent with the spirit of that instrument—falling within the powers not granted expressly, but which in that case were held to be necessary for carrying out those that expressly were granted

The tone of public sentiment in Pennsylvania, in my opinion, is against both of these decisions. They hold them to be wrong, and will hail the day with pleasure when the Supreme Court shall deem it expedient to reverse them; professionally, as a member of that court, I respect the decisions; as a representative, desirous of faithfully expressing the sentiments of my constituents, which, in this particular, are in consonance with my own judgment, I repudiate them as unsound and untenable. It was precisely, then, upon these principles, that in 1851 the Democratic party of Pennsylvania planted itself upon the doctrine that the fugitive slave law should be faithfully executed in Pennsylvania, and that her act of Assembly, refusing our jails to the General Government, should be repealed, because such a position was absolutely required at that crisis from a party which professed to respect the compromises of the Constitution, and also professed to have nerve enough to say and do before the world what it believed to be right. It was in my own district (Berks) that the convention met and adopted this platform, nominating on it the present amiable and distinguished Executive of the State, William Bigler. Eight thousand majority crowned their success, and settled the question, I trust, forever.

I do not, Mr. Chairman, mention these things in a vain spirit of boasting. Other States were just as true; but I deem it due to the State which I in part represent, to refer to it in support of my argument—that Pennsylvania is not stationary, as she is most unjustly represented to be, but has always been true to the Constitution, and is always progressive upon sound principles.

Now, sir, apply this rule to her action on the tariff. The tariff of 1842 was not understood by Pennsylvania herself when Mr. Walker proposed to establish the tariff of 1846. It was working well at that time; and although the Democratic party never endorsed its principles and details, it was averse to change—more from motives of fear of the consequences that might ensue than from an approval of its principles. In 1844 the honorable Mr. McKay, of North Carolina, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, offered to Pennsylvania forty per cent. on iron; she declined it, however, because she feared the change might not work well; she was not then prepared for it. In 1846 a bill was passed establishing ad valorem, and putting the duties on iron at thirty per cent. This was passed without the vote of Pennsylvania, excepting the vote of the Hon. David Wilmot, for precisely the same reasons.

I now again refer to the resolution adopted by the Democratic convention of Berks county, in September, 1846, to show you that, in principle, she was right then, and only wanted time to carry it out. Now, sir, observe her progress: she was silent on the subject, asking no modification for four years. Towards the close of the first session of this Congress, I offered an amendment not to change a single principle of the act; but finding that in consequence of the very cheap rates of iron that the duties had fallen far below the revenue standard, my object was to change the mode of appraisement so as to bring it up to that standard. Could I have obtained a hearing, I would then have stated just what I state to-day, that Pennsylvania will stand by the tariff of 1846, in principle—preserving ad valorem with the revenue standard; but on our own manufactures we ask you to keep the duties up to the revenue standard—not to go beyond it, nor fall behind it. If this produces a surplus revenue, pay off the national debt. If a surplus still remains, extend your free list on articles not produced or manufactured here; and in doing so confine it to articles of general consumption by the masses, (omitting luxuries as falling within the exception to this rule.) If this fails, then reduce below the revenue standard on your manufactures, until, in the process of time, you reach absolute free trade—if you prefer it—and by this gradual, progressive reduction, you will find, when the time comes, your manufacturer will be able to bid defiance to the world; and all this can be secured in the adjustment of a revenue ad valorem tariff.

I should have stated these facts at the last session could I have had a hearing. My views were just the same then as now; accordingly, as I have already answered the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTTER,] I moved to modify then, because the duty had fallen far below the revenue standard. Now, sir, I am opposed to modification at this session, because although the duty is now too high, I have no faith in its staying there. In six months it may be down again; but if it continues up, I would most certainly favor reduction until you come down to the revenue standard. My position then is, that an ad valorem tariff fluctuating with the trade of the country cannot be permanent; and in order to make it effective, you must change from time to time and follow the fluctuating standard up or down the scale, just as the laws of supply and demand may please to send it.

I have said that Pennsylvania progresses on all these questions on sound principles. In 1844, she refused McKay's bill; in 1851, she came here and offered to take it: it was refused; in 1852, she asked a modification of the tariff of 1846 merely to secure the revenue standard. Now she accepts it just as it is. Next year if it be too high, and a surplus accumulates, she will go with you to reduce it, and upon the principles I have laid down, she will go with you till it ends in free trade, if the country so wills it. All she asks is that you will only move cautiously, and gradually give stability to your acts as you advance, and she will go with you to the end. I felt it to be my duty, to the extent of my humble ability, at the earliest opportunity, to try and place her thus fairly before the country. I do not arrogate to myself the right to speak for her by authority. I am but one of her Representatives; and when I have assumed to speak for the State, I wish to be understood as only speaking by authority for my district. All I say of the State is but the result of careful observation and well-settled opinions. I speak only for the Democratic party also, and such interests as I believe concur with it. My colleagues may differ from me on many or all of my positions, and if so their opinions are entitled to as favorable a hearing as mine are.

MODIFICATION OF THE TARIFF.

SPEECH OF HON. R. K. MEADE,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

December 14, 1852,

On the Tariff question; delivered in the Committee of the Whole, on the motion to refer the President's Annual Message to the several committees.

Mr. MEADE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Had not the ground been taken in this debate, that a reduction of the duty on railroad iron would inure only to corporations, I might not have said a word on the subject. My State (now engaged in an extensive system of railroads) feels at this time a peculiar interest in this question, and the same may be said of the whole West and Northwest.

My friend, the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JONES,] would find himself somewhat puzzled in attempting to draw a sensible distinction between manufacturing corporations and railroad corporations, and to demonstrate how the community will be more benefited by extending privileges to the former, and denying them to the latter. Indeed, sir, the reverse is true. For, while the admission into this country, duty free, of dye-stuffs, coarse wool, &c., will enable the manufacturer to make his goods at less cost, it does not follow that the community will buy them cheaper, for after all, the foreign article of the same kind regulates the price, which is always increased (if imported at all) by the duty imposed. The importation of it implies a demand greater than the supply at home, and the price which the foreigner must demand, to realize a profit, will be the price also of the home article, however cheap it may be made. To benefit the community by admitting, free of duty, certain articles necessary to the home manufacture, you must also admit the manufactured article itself, free of duty; otherwise, you only transfer the amount of the duty from the Treasury into the pockets of the manufacturer.

I think I shall be able to show that the admission of railroad iron, either free of duty, or with a light one, will benefit every one. If there were as many lines of railroads, extending from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, as there are States upon its shores from New York to Georgia inclusive, there would not be a man, woman or child, east of the Rocky Mountains, that would not in some degree be benefited. All would either travel upon them, or use something transported by them. The cheaper those roads are made the cheaper would be the travel and transportation. The interest on their cost would be less, and their profits begin proportionably sooner. A railroad costing $2,000,000 must make $120,000 a year clear of expenses, or do a losing business. If the same road cost but $1,000,000, $60,000 per annum would remunerate it, and the other $60,000 would be a saving to the community—that is, it could charge $60,000 less for travel and transportation. Would they charge less on that account? I say they would. There are very few that make more than six per cent. In truth, sir, the railroads of the South are built, not so much with a view to profit as to afford commercial facilities. The farmers and planters make their subscriptions, looking for remuneration to the convenience of traveling, and the cheaper transportation of their produce. Our experience teaches us that, in a distance of fifty miles, twenty cents at least are saved on a bushel of wheat or corn, and three dollars on a hogshead of tobacco. The merchant and mechanic in the city takes the stock to increase the value of his lots and houses, and stimulate his trade. He gets his dividend in increased rents and profits; a dividend in money is regarded as an incidental benefit. Besides, sir, these roads are, either in whole or in part, owned by the State in which they are made. They are built in whole or in part by the money of the State, which is contributed, in the shape of taxes, by all. Hence all are interested in their cheapness. Besides this, they are, for the most part, limited in their profits by law; and the State has, by her officers, an influence and control corresponding in some degree with the contributions she has made. The charges, therefore, on these roads must be less as you diminish their cost.

Justice to the South demands that there should be a reduction of duty on railroad iron.

Railroad iron was exempted from duty for a long period previous to 1842, and during that time a large number of the railroads at the North were built; but few at the South and West. Nor was it so much our fault as the result of circumstances. The density of the northern population enabled them to do what we could not then, or could but slowly do. Let not our inability, then, be charged as a fault.

I believe that a reduction of duty on railroad iron will eventually benefit the iron-master. The market for his iron is principally in the interior of the country. The cheaper he can get it there the greater will be his profits and the more he will sell. The article being very heavy, it is of the last importance to transport it cheap, for it will not bear a heavy transportation duty. A costly railroad is a perpetual tax on transportation. The cheaper the railroads are the cheaper in all time to come will be the transportation-tax on iron. English iron is now only the pioneer that is opening up a perpetual market for American iron. It first makes a cheap road to your mines, which takes your iron to the sea-board, thence by vessels it is distributed into every sea-board town, whence, by railroads, it is taken far into the interior. On every one of these railroads are twenty engines and a thousand cars, all of which are built and renewed from year to year out of iron taken from your mines. Along the lines, bar iron, plows, and machinery of all kinds, are transported, and all made of iron from your mines, deriving an incidental protection from a revenue duty. This state of things will spring up in a few years, if you will just have patience until foreign iron shall pave the way for your own. Our ancestors felled the forest with English axes; but for which it would have been still a forest. I will illustrate by a case in point: The road from Petersburg to Lynchburg, a distance of one hundred and twenty miles, is built by a subscription of individuals, assisted by the State, which, in pursuance of a general policy, takes three fifths of the stock. Had railroad iron been sixty or seventy dollars a ton, instead of forty-two dollars, the road would never have been built, for it was exceedingly difficult to procure the subscription, notwithstanding the comparative cheapness on account of the low price of iron. There are now running on that road engines and cars from Philadelphia. But for English iron at forty-two dollars a ton, many thousand dollars already spent would have been lost to Pennsylvania, and many thousands more in prospect. This road is one link in a chain that will reach from James river to the Mississippi. How much of Pennsylvania iron in various shapes will ultimately travel along this entire line it would be difficult to estimate. To the cheapness of railroad iron this entire line is principally indebted.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JONES] contended that the whole revenue had as well be raised on a few articles, as diffused over many, and contends that a man had as well pay a tax of four dollars on his coat as two on his coat and two on his trowsers. This would be true if the article taxed was universally used, and in proportion to each one's means. But suppose we were to levy the tax on bonnets and silk dresses, and none upon hats and broadcloths, what would the wives and maids of his district say to him? Why, sir, his wife and daughters would scarcely save him from their fury. If the tax was collected altogether on iron, a vast number of people would be exempt, and many but partially affected; such as lawyers, doctors, divines, merchants, many mechanics, and a host of others. The planters and farmers would bear the chief burden. Lay your duties as you may, with a view to incidental protection, and the exporting interest, constituting the largest class, must bear the chief burden. The produce of grain, cotton, and tobacco cannot be incidentally protected, for his market is beyond the reach of your revenue laws. The shoemaker pays a tax to the hatter, but he gets it back when the hatter comes for his shoes. The manufacturer pays a tax to the iron furnace and foundery for his machinery, but he gets it back when the iron master and founder comes for his coat. To all classes, the cultivator of the soil, the merchant, the house-joiner, and many other mechanics, pays a tax, but gets nothing in return. The price of whatever the farmer and planter (who supports all the rest) sends to market, is fixed by the foreign demand, and that again is regulated by the amount of foreign goods they are willing to take in exchange, which are reduced in value to the extent of the duty he pays on them at home.

The low price of iron for a few years back was only the misfortune of the producer, similar to that which often befalls the cultivator of the soil. When cotton, grain, and tobacco, bear a low price, he flies not to the Government for aid; he puts up with it, and works the harder. He waits for a better day. Your system of protection, however, puts upon him the misfortune of others as well as his own. Protection means a premium in the shape of money, and it is paid altogether by the exporting interest; for whatever is paid by one protected class to another is ultimately returned. The farmer only asks the small privilege of being permitted to buy of those who will buy of him, instead of being forced to buy of those who will take only a portion of his products in exchange for theirs, demanding cash for the greater part.

The argument drawn from over-production is a fallacy—there is no such thing as over-production. The ability to buy alone regulates the extent of the sales. Millions of people in Europe were starving when our breadstuffs were cheapest. Would they not buy if they could? And why would they not? They had no employment—there was no market for what they could make, though millions were in want of it. Restrictions, monopolies, high duties, legislative outrages on the laws of nature and of commerce, had made him a beggar with millions of others. Abolish the custom-houses all over the world; let there be free intercourse between its ports, and none would want. This country, from certain natural advantages, produces breadstuffs, provisions, cotton, &c. Other countries, from a like course, produces other things cheaper than we can. These should be mutually exchanged. These should form the basis of a commerce between them enriching all. The grand folly of this country has for twenty years been in trying to force productions which belonged properly to others. Why have we not attempted to force by protection the growth of tea, coffee, and the spices, as well as sugar? We should have done so, had nature been a little less emphatic in her denial. We would have done so, if it had been possible, by only doubling their cost. The folly of the attempt would only have exceeded our other follies in degree. We discovered that we lacked the climate to grow tea, but have not learned we lack the climate for other things that we have attempted. A dense and starving population produces a climate for many productions. We could make silk with such a climate. The delicate fingers of a starving female, who will for three cents a day gather up the threads of the butterfly's shroud, is alone wanting to confer that blessing on us. When we reflect on the causes that prevent us from manufacturing some things, it should be matter for rejoicing, instead of regret.

The cheapness of provisions here gives us many advantages over the European. But it must be remembered that what are necessaries here are luxuries to the laborer of Europe. In place of his potato we must have bread. In place of his bread we must have meat. In place of his one loaf we must have three. A laborer's daily consumption here is three times what it is in Europe. Cheap labor and a dense population alone enable the European to manufacture cheaper. I do not regard either of these things as blessings. The forests of the West and the cotton-fields of the South are standing bidders for the labor of the poor. The former invites the strong and athletic, the latter, the weak and delicate. They are a refuge from the exactions of the capitalists. It would be almost a pity to tell those poor little boys and girls of ten and twelve years of age, who are crawling upon their bellies through the coal seams of England, that for four months in the year, in the cotton-fields of the South, they could make their four shillings sterling a day, and play and gambol for the remaining eight months of the year. The knowledge of so much happiness elsewhere would kill the poor creatures with despair. Take away these bidders for labor, and wages would go down and assume the European standard. Here the capitalist goes in search of labor; there labor seeks the capitalist. There employment is the commodity in demand, and is procured by the lowest bidder; here the employee, and is procured by the highest bidder. There the capitalist dictates to the laborer; here the laborer to the capitalist, who asks protection from him by demanding a contribution from the rest of the community. He artfully puts it on the ground that you are protecting labor. Can it be denied that the thing protected is the article produced, or the bale of goods owned by the capitalist, which he sells without paying a tax, while the foreign owner of a bale just like it has to pay a third of its value for the privilege of selling? But it will be replied, that the bale is the product of labor, and if you protect that, you protect the laborer.

The capitalist when he goes into the market for labor gets it as cheap as he can, and I have shown through what agencies the price is regulated and kept up. But for argument sake, let it be admitted that the laborer is protected to the extent of his agency in producing the bale. What proportion of it did he make, and what the machine owned by the capitalist? In that proportion, whatever it may be, is the premium shared between them. I leave to others better acquainted with the subject to determine the proportions of each. But my own opinion is, for every dollar pocketed by the capitalist about one cent goes into that of the laborer, which is paid away the first time he buys a coat. Sir, the machine and its owner is alone protected. You may as well tell me that the poor of Louisiana are protected by the duty on sugar. The labor which makes it is owned by the capitalists as are the machines of the North. They alone receive the premium. The laborer pays it. The wealthiest class of the North is the protected capitalist. The wealthiest at the South is the protected sugar planter. In each of these classes you find the millionaires of the country. It is idle to tell me that duties were taken off tea and coffee for the sake of the poor. Was ever a cup of either drank without sugar? No, sir; the reason is that there were no wealthy producers of these articles to combine with others to grind, not to protect the laborer.

I have heard it contended that if duties be light, foreigners will combine to overstock the market, and crush home manufacturers, and then demand their own prices. Men are alike governed by their interest all over the world. They will as soon combine at home as abroad. It is certainly more easy and practicable. Can the manufacturers of England, France, Germany, Belgium, and other countries more readily combine than those of Lowell? Is it more probable that the world will combine against us, than a corner to which the trade is secured? The competition of all nations is our best security against combinations.

I was very glad to hear, Mr. Chairman, that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. JONES] had taken the liberal ground he did on protection; the only protection he wants, is that incidental protection which the highest revenue duties could give him. That was the ground assumed by Mr. Polk in his first message after his election, one which had never been officially taken before, and which was supported by nearly the whole Democratic party. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania must remember, that eight years have expired since that time, and the progress we have made since then in sound principles and knowledge of the laws of trade, has been very rapid.

I was pleased when the Democratic party took the ground, that they would be content with such incidental protection as the highest tariff of revenue would give, because I consider that one step towards a more liberal policy.

What does it amount to practically? If we desired to raise a million of dollars upon shoes, supposing that four millions were annually imported, a duty of twenty-five cents would raise it; a higher duty, say of fifty cents, would also do it; and at the same time incidentally encourage the home article, by excluding two millions of the foreign. The fifty cent tax is the highest revenue duty, but still it is protective, for while the same amount is paid into the Treasury upon the two millions of shoes, you are yet paying an equal tax upon the two millions made at home,—the one tax goes into the Treasury, and the other into the pockets of the manufacturers.

It is argued that the encouragement of our manufactures at home, lessens the supply of the productions of the earth, which would be overstocked in case we did not divert labor from the soil. When that time comes, the products of the earth will fall in value to that point which will itself suggest to capitalists other investments. But I never expect to see the day when the earth shall be beaten by any competitor. It has never been yet. A laborer can make more by plowing it, than in any other business.

Mr. Chairman, I listened with pleasure, until I discovered his object, to the remarks of the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] the other day. He seemed to desire to reduce the revenue, and diminish the surplus, by taking off duties. The object of his first resolution, as explained by himself, soon became apparent. In his list of articles to be made duty free, there is not one, I believe, which is manufactured here, and by making them free, we impose the necessity of keeping up the duties on all others.

His free list consists of such things as we must import, and many of them entering into the composition of the manufactured article at home. Now, I think I have shown clearly, that if we were to admit the raw materials free of duty, it would be an indirect protection to the manufacturer, and a tax on the consumer.

But the gentleman desires to reduce the revenue, and to prevent its accumulation in future. He anticipates great inconvenience in the country from hoarding up the specie.

Mr. CLEVELAND. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I desire to know by what process of reasoning he will prove that, by admitting railroad iron duty free, railroad companies would transport cheaper, and at the same time the manufacturers, under similar circumstances, would not sell cheaper?

Mr. MEADE. If the gentleman will read my speech when it is printed, he will find that I have explained that matter fully. I cannot go over the same discussion; it would consume too much time. The gentleman can satisfy himself, if he will do me the honor to read my speech.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the country was in want of a specie circulation, the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] would hold good; but the money hoarded in the Treasury is only a portion of the surplus product of the country. It occupies precisely the same relation to commerce as so much corn in a time of plenty. The gold of California is an article of merchandise; and so long as the currency of the country is sufficient for the purposes of trade, no inconvenience would result from the surplus. Release it to-morrow, and it would be driven away by the paper which, unfortunately, occupies the place of gold. But, Mr. Chairman, I will admit that there exists the other danger, to which the gentleman from New York has alluded. I entirely concur in what he says of the danger of extravagant, and, perhaps, unconstitutional appropriations. For the sake of the purity of the Democratic party, I should like to remove that temptation out of their way. But, sir, for the purpose of depriving the policy of 1846 of the credit due it, he has attributed our enormous revenues to the Treasury circulars issued by Mr. Walker, and which, when afterwards reversed by the decision of the Supreme Court, were made the law of the land by a special act. The construction put upon the law of 1846 by Secretary Walker, was certainly in conformity with the spirit or intention of the Legislature that passed it. If not precisely in conformity with the letter of that act, the design of Congress, as every one knows, was, that the duty should be assessed on the value attached to the foreign article at the time it left the foreign port.

But the gentleman may be reminded of another thing. Our revenues from the tariff of 1846, have been diminished by the construction which one of his own Secretaries put upon the act of 1850. There is not a lawyer in this House that would say the freight is not a part of the costs and charges of goods imported, which the law of 1850 required to be added to them, and included in their value in fixing the duty.

Mr. MILLSON. I regret that my colleague thinks that freight across the Atlantic should, under that law, be considered as entering into the valuation upon the goods on which duty is to be paid. He has just said that it was the object of the special act of 1850—for which I voted with much misgiving—to legalize the Treasury circulars of Mr. Walker. I beg leave to suggest to my colleague, that the Treasury circulars of Mr. Walker, to which he alludes, expressly excluded freight as one of the costs upon which duty was to be calculated.

Mr. MEADE. My colleague has mistaken me in one particular. When I said that was the object of the law, I had reference to the law of 1846, which had for its object the fixing of a valuation at the foreign port, at the time the article was exported to this country. That was the object of that law, and whatever may have been the object of the law of 1850, I say that, sitting as a judge upon the bench, there is not a lawyer in this House who would not decide, that the cost and charges would include freight, whatever may have been the opinion of Mr. Walker, or the intention of Congress. Mr. Walker's views in relation to this matter accorded with my own wishes, for I preferred that all dutiable articles should be estimated as cheaply as possible, with a view to as small a tax as possible. But still, construing the law as a lawyer, I could not exclude freight from the costs and charges any more than I could commissions, insurance, or any other charge.

Now, I do not desire, by any means, to find fault with this construction. I only alluded to it, to prove to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] that so far from being benefited by the construction given these laws, the revenue has been diminished by it. But the remarks of the gentleman from New York carry me back to the first time I took my seat in this Hall in 1848, when I listened to the eloquent remarks of the then chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means from Ohio, [Mr. Vinton.] That committee was then under the control of the Whig party. I was then alarmed, or rather I should have been alarmed, if I had been subject to alarms, by the doleful anticipations which were then indulged in by that gentleman, in respect to what would be the awful condition of the Treasury in time to come. Debt, bankruptcy, and ruin to the country, were the hobgoblins which walked through his speech of that day. The contrast could but strike me most forcibly, when I heard the other day another leader of the Whig party bewailing the condition of the country, in consequence of its immense surplus revenues, and predicting a speedy dissolution from plethora and the wealth of the Treasury. We told the Whigs in 1848 to trust to the Democracy—they would take care that there should be no bankruptcy, no ruin. We tell them now to continue that trust; we will take care that there shall be no death from plethora. We will stop the supply by reducing the tax. That gentleman ought, in the course of his remarks, (if he really designed to act the counsellor,) to have read his friends in the White House a lecture on the subject of their own delinquencies.

Having an overflowing Treasury, and millions upon millions daily accumulating there—owing $6,000,000 to Mexico, all of which was bearing interest—why did they not, as they were urged to do by the Mexican Government, pay that debt, and thus dispose of that amount of surplus, and stop the interest on $6,000,000? Though urged in the strongest terms which necessity could prompt, and even our magnanimity as a nation appealed to, the Administration refused to anticipate that debt, preferring to pay the interest on $6,000,000, and at the same time purchasing at a premium of fourteen per cent. our own bonds having years to run. I did all I could to prevent this; but I was not heeded. And here candor compels me to say that the Democratic party in this House failed to do their duty in this matter, in not coercing the Administration to pay Mexico her debt at the time and in the manner she desired.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am unwilling that this large amount of surplus revenue should remain in the Treasury, or that any more should accumulate; but while I do not believe that this surplus of $14,000,000 will produce any great commercial revulsion, still I object to its remaining there and accumulating. It may lead to improvident legislation, and hence I should be willing to see the Administration purchasing up our bonds at fifteen or even twenty per cent. premium.

MODIFICATION OF THE TARIFF.

SPEECH OF HON. J. S. MILLSON,

OF VIRGINIA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

December 14, 1852,

On the Tariff question; delivered in the Committee of the Whole, on the motion to refer the Annual Message of the President to the several committees.

Mr. MILLSON said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: My friend from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] who has just taken his seat, is a perfect embodiment of the effete protective policy. I shall have something to say presently, in reply to some of the positions he has assumed in this debate. Before I do so, however, I wish to address myself to the subject more immediately before the committee. Just one week ago, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] introduced a resolution providing that so much of the President's message as relates to the tariff and revenue from customs should be referred to a select committee, with power to examine witnesses and collect testimony here and elsewhere, and with instructions to report as soon as possible upon the same, with a bill reducing the duties on imports, to such an amount as may be required for an economical administration of the Government. The introduction of this resolution gave me great satisfaction. I had long desired; I will not say expected, a movement of this sort; but I had not dared to hope that such a resolution would have been first submitted by a gentleman on the other side of the House. I desired it because, as I said a day or two ago, I have thought, from the very moment of the passage of the tariff of 1846, that these duties were, to a great extent, protective, and that they ought to be materially reduced. At a large Democratic meeting held in my own city, a few days after the passage of that act, I had the honor to submit a resolution upon this subject, which was unanimously adopted. It was in these words:

"Resolved, therefore, That this meeting warmly approves the passage of the tariff act of 1846, regarding it as only the first step on the part of the United States towards that more liberal and enlightened system of international intercourse which is about to be established throughout the world, and believing that it will ere long be followed by such further reductions of duties as are imperatively demanded by the spirit of the age."

I confess I felt some surprise that this movement for the reduction of the tariff should have been commenced by the gentleman from New York; but I was not less pleased than surprised. I differ from some of my friends in believing that the present is a very appropriate time for the consideration of this most important subject. It is true, as my friend from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] has intimated, that the Administration is about to retire from power; but if the gentleman from New York is to be regarded as speaking the wishes of the Administration, I am perfectly willing to concede to Mr. Fillmore the honor of effecting the final overthrow of the protective policy. The President elect recently said that the hour of triumph was the hour of magnanimity; and if the present President of the United States desires to prostrate the protective system, why, in the spirit of magnanimity, I am willing to concede that credit to him

Mr. STANLY. I wish to inquire if this movement is by authority of the Administration. I understood it to be an individual movement on the part of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.]

Mr. MILLSON. I was about to consider the subject in both aspects, and on either supposition. If the gentleman from New York did not express the sentiments and wishes of the Administration, if he meant to oppose the views contained in the President's message, then I was willing, as one conscientiously opposed to the whole protective policy, that on the very day after the reception of the President's message here, the House of Representatives should indicate their determination to prostrate this policy forever. But, sir, recent developments lead me to believe that neither the President nor the gentleman himself desired to do any harm to the protective system. For although the language of the resolution was such as I heartily approved, and although the gentleman himself says that he disclosed his hand and told us what he was seeking, yet it seems that his purposes were very different from mine. Since that time he has introduced another resolution differing materially from the first. That resolution does not contain any instruction to reduce the duties, but simply provides "that so much of the President's message as relates to the tariff and customs from revenue shall be referred to a select committee, with power to examine witnesses and collect testimony here and elsewhere, and with instructions to report by bill or otherwise on or before the 25th January next." Now, I am by no means willing to go for the second resolution of the gentleman from New York, unless it shall be amended either by the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LOCKHART,] or that suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.] Without these amendments, I will not vote to create this committee, for the reason that it will be nothing more than such a commission as has been raised in the Senate, and from which no good would be likely to come, at least to those who do not want to confirm and bolster up the protective policy.

The gentleman from New York and I differ widely in regard to the objects to be secured by the adoption even of his first resolution. Looking to the language of the resolution which instructed the committee to report a bill reducing the duties on imports, I gave it my hearty support; and I may be permitted to confess my regret that it was not voted for, more generally, by gentlemen upon this side of the House. I must also express my surprise, that so many of the friends of protection, perhaps unwarily, gave their votes for its adoption. I do not think the course of either party would be precisely the same now as it was last Tuesday. I doubt if gentlemen upon the other side of the House would be so willing to vote for the resolution of the gentleman from New York as they then were; and I do not believe the gentleman from New York would be himself willing to vote for his own resolution if it were before us now, in the precise shape in which he first introduced it. The gentleman's object was to reduce the duties by enlarging the free list, and he said that that was an object common to both sides of the House. He wishes to abolish the duties on the raw materials entering into the composition of manufactured articles. The gentleman says:

"It seems to me that to this proposition there should be no objection. And I hope that there will be no objection on any side of the House to an enlargement of the lists of free articles and a reduction or abolition of duty upon many of the articles which enter into the composition of manufactures; for, in the first place, my Whig friends are aware that that will be a species of incidental, legitimate protection, of which the other side of the House cannot complain."

The gentleman is mistaken; we do complain and will complain of any such protection:

"And my Democratic friends will be aware that whatever contemplates a reduction of the revenue in any form, if it be to reduce the price of the manufactured article consumed, as they contend it does, is a proposition which has already met with favor, and which in its details cannot but be admitted into favor by them again."

Now, I admit that the gentleman from New York is entirely right in supposing that by placing on the free list the various articles which enter into the composition of domestic manufactures, you will probably reduce the prices of the manufactured articles. In that respect the people of the country, as consumers of those articles, will perhaps save something; but they will be losers to a very great extent in a particular to which the gentleman has not referred, if the duty should be abolished upon dye-stuffs, and the raw material entering into the composition of domestic fabrics. Suppose the existing duty of five per cent. on dye-stuffs to amount to five per cent. of the cost of the manufactured article. It is unquestionably true that by the abolition of this duty the price of the article might, and perhaps would, be reduced five per cent. If it sold for one dollar before, it could be sold for ninety-five cents afterwards. But this saving of price to the consumer could not be effected without considerable loss to the people in other respects, which I will proceed to explain.

Let me suppose that our consumption of a particular kind of manufactures amounts to two hundred dollars, one half of them being made in this country, and the other half imported from abroad. Each article sells for one dollar. The price of the American article is composed of two elements; the cost, ninety-five cents, and the duty upon the raw material entering into its composition, amounting to five per cent., together making one dollar. The elements of price in the foreign article are cost, seventy cents, and duty thirty cents. Now, sir, the abolition of the duty of five per cent., by placing the raw material on the free list, will enable the American manufacturer to sell the article at ninety-five cents instead of a dollar, which must continue to be the price of the foreign article, and he thus gets rid of competition from abroad, and monopolizes the market. For the foreign article will not be imported if it cannot be sold without loss; and as the cost and duty together amount to one dollar, it cannot, without loss, be sold for ninety-five cents.

Now, sir, the people, it is true, gain five per cent. on each hundred dollars of value, making on the whole consumption of two hundred dollars a gain of ten dollars. But what do they lose? They lose in their revenue five per cent., or five dollars, from the abolition of the duty which they get from the raw material used in making the domestic manufactures; and they also lose the thirty per cent., or thirty dollars, which they levied upon the hundred dollars worth of foreign articles imported. The gain to the people, as consumers, is ten dollars; the loss to the Treasury of the people, which of course is their own loss, is thirty-five dollars. Now, sir, I am not willing to save to the people ten dollars at the cost of thirty-five dollars. We should reduce the duty upon manufactured fabrics in precisely the same proportion that we reduce it upon the raw material, otherwise there will be no balancing of the loss and gain. If at the same time that you abolish the five per cent. duty on the raw material you reduce the duty correspondingly upon the imported manufactures, then the loss to the revenue will be compensated by the gain to the people in the consumption of the article. To abolish the duty upon the raw material without a corresponding reduction upon imported fabrics, would be precisely equivalent to an appropriation of the amount of the duty out of the Treasury, to be bestowed in bounties to the manufacturers, to sustain them against foreign competition.

This view of the case leads me to notice the argument submitted yesterday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JONES,] who said that it made no difference to the people of the country whether, when money was to be raised, you selected two articles and imposed an equal duty on each, or whether you exempted one altogether, and imposed a double duty upon the other. Sir, in addition to the answers given by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] and my colleague, [Mr. MEADE,] I suggest another, and it is this: That the very object of the imposition of the double duty upon one article is to give protection to similar articles of domestic manufacture, by preventing, or at least diminishing, the importation of those foreign articles that would come into competition with them. If this were not the object, there would be no reason for it at all; and if this object were not to some extent accomplished, it would not be attempted. The result, then, is, that instead of collecting the whole amount of duty as before, you exclude, perhaps, half the articles formerly imported, and, of course, get only half the duty. If, after subjecting an article to a double duty, you continued to import the same quantity as before, you would undoubtedly collect the same revenue by putting the whole burden upon one article and exempting the other, as when you divided it between the two. But, as I have shown, the effect will be to diminish the importation, and, of course, to diminish the revenue; and you will then be subjected to the necessity of imposing new taxes upon some new subject of taxation to make up the deficiency.

Mr. JONES, of Pennsylvania, (interposing.)

I wish to correct the gentleman as to my position. It was this, that it made no difference whether the tax was imposed upon one of two articles, or equally upon both, provided the article upon which it was imposed was an article of general consumption and equally distributed the burden among the masses of the consumers.

Mr. MILLSON. Well, sir, the gentleman surely had an object in urging that argument, and his object undoubtedly was to show that incidental protection might properly be given to particular interests in this country, by the imposition of a larger duty upon competing articles imported from abroad, than upon articles which did not come in competition with those of our own production. That being the case, there would have been no force at all in the argument of the gentleman, unless he meant to contend that the reason for imposing high duties upon some articles and exempting others from all taxes, was to give incidental protection to the manufacturers of the articles thus selected for taxation. And I am now proceeding to show that there must be a loss to the people from such an arrangement of duties, because if it secured the desired protection, as it undoubtedly would, to some extent, it could only be by excluding a portion of the foreign fabrics which come into competition with our own. The revenue would thus be reduced, and we should be compelled to lay new taxes to supply the deficiency. This is not the only loss, and it is by no means the greatest. It is indeed the most inconsiderable. The burden which is most grievous is the increase in the cost of what we have occasion to use, by compelling us to purchase from the domestic manufacturer at prices more than his wares are worth. I say more than his wares are worth, because, but for the pains taken to exclude similar foreign wares by an amount of duty which only a few of them can bear, we should be able to purchase them at far lower rates of price.

I suggest, then, to the gentleman from New York, and to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the people have never complained of those duties which bring money into the Treasury. They complain of those duties which keep money out of the Treasury. They complain of the operation of those duties which, while they are laid seemingly with a view to the collection of revenue, are really imposed for the purpose of giving protection to certain domestic interests by the exclusion of a large amount of foreign importations. Now, we all know that under the operation of the tariff of 1842, and perhaps under the operation of the tariff of 1846, the consuming classes of this country pay a much larger amount for the protection of certain interests, in some of the States, than they contribute to the revenue of the United States. Why, sixteen protected articles alone, under the tariff of 1842, were estimated to impose a tax of upwards of $76,000,000 upon the consumption of the country, in addition to the amount contributed by the people to the revenue. I cannot, then, go with the gentleman from New York in his efforts to enlarge the free lists by abolishing the trifling duties now imposed upon the raw materials used by the manufacturers. This would only aggravate the existing evil. They bring money into the Treasury, and, as I have shown, they serve to protect us from losses to which their abolition would to some extent expose us. No, sir; the duties that I desire to see reduced are those amounting to thirty or forty dollars in the hundred, which are laid not so much for the purpose of raising revenue as of destroying revenue; that add nothing to the common Treasury, which is our common property, but serve only to transfer millions from the possession of the agricultural, mechanical, and commercial classes of our people, into the pockets of other and less numerous classes without a fair equivalent.

But after all, what is meant by this demand for the exemption of the raw material from all duty? What is the raw material? Are we to consider such, whatever requires labor to fit it for its ultimate use? Then, sir, iron is the raw material of the smith; cloth is the raw material of the tailor; silk plush of the modern hatter; sugar of the confectioner. Are we to exempt all these from duty? Perhaps the gentleman from New York would be more unwilling to do so than I should be.

In assuming, Mr. Chairman, that a reduction of five per cent. upon the manufactured article would be necessary to balance the reduction of five per cent. upon the imported materials, which enter into the composition of our domestic fabrics, I merely take those sums for the sake of convenient and simple illustration. The cost of the raw material may not be more than one twentieth of the whole cost of the manufactured article; and of course, the present duty, which is only five per cent., would be only one twentieth of that, or one four-hundredth part of the whole cost. That would be equivalent to a tax of only twenty-five cents on a hundred dollars of value. It is only for the sake of illustration, that I assume a reduction of five per cent. in the duty imposed on the imported fabric, as balancing a reduction of five per cent. on the raw material.

In connection with this subject, I desire to notice the positions taken by the President of the United States in his last annual message.

The President says:

"Without repeating the arguments contained in my former message, in favor of discriminating protective duties, I deem it my duty to call your attention to one or two other considerations affecting this subject. The first is, the effect of large importations of foreign goods upon our currency. Most of the gold of California, as fast as it is coined, finds its way directly to Europe in payment for goods purchased."

It seems to me the President has adopted a somewhat inverted order of explaining his views. He calls our attention to the effect of the large importation of foreign goods upon our currency. He has mistaken the effect for the cause. He might as well have invited our attention to the effect produced by the flowing of a river upon the attraction of gravitation. Why, sir, it is the increase of the currency which has produced these large importations. It is because of the large exportation of gold, taken from the mines of California, that our imports have increased. Yet the President calls our attention to the effect of these large foreign imports upon the currency of the country. He says that the gold from California finds its way out of the country as soon as it is coined. Certainly it does. For what purpose was it taken from the mines, if it was not to be used in the purchase of commodities? Would the President have it kept at home, instead of exchanging it for those articles which are necessary for our comfort and enjoyment? How would that add to our national wealth? Can a nation, any more than an individual, advance its interests or promote its happiness by hoarding up its money, and constantly adding to its store, without applying it to the purchase from others of such things as we may want? In that case we should soon realize the fable of Midas starving on his golden banquet. Were the immense amounts of gold taken from the mines in California retained at home, instead of being diffused throughout the world, the consequences would be most disastrous to us. I fear that even as it is, the large quantities of gold, annually added to our circulation from the mines in California and Australia, must produce much mischief. Sir, when I first heard, some five or six years ago, of the discovery of gold in California, I felt and expressed serious apprehensions as to the results. I feared that the great influx of gold would too much inflate the currency of the country, bloat prices, and unsettle the transactions of life. It is a great error to suppose that it is desirable to increase the quantities of money. This cannot be done without diminishing its value. Sir, what is money? I have not time fully to develop my views upon this subject; it would furnish a theme for a protracted discourse. I will only state that money, in its strict and proper use and office, is but a token or sign of the claim of the holder upon the community for something earned, but not received. Wherever the use of money is known, this claim is acknowledged, and its extent is measured by the quantity or conventional value of these tokens. Upon an universal settlement of accounts, if such a thing were possible, all the money in the world would be in the possession, in greater or less quantities, of those who were found to be creditors upon such a settlement, or of those to whom they might from time to time have assigned it. Vast additions of money, therefore, beyond the amount necessary to repair the annual losses, made to the existing circulation by those who take it with little labor from the mines, and are not in truth the creditors of the community, cannot but be a sort of injustice to the bona fide holders.

But the President seems to fear that there will soon be a commercial revulsion—that another crisis is at hand! Sir, I see nothing to justify such an apprehension, if the official reports are correct, as I presume they are. What does the President tell us in his last message? He says that the imports during the last year amounted to $207,240,101, to which add the specie imported, $5,262,643, and the total imports were $212,502,744. The exports, exclusive of specie, were $149,861,911; foreign merchandise re-exported $17,204,026; specie, $42,507,285; making a total of $209,573,222.

Sir, the returns of the preceding year exhibit a like healthy condition of things. From these returns the excess of the imports seems to be only $2,929,522; from which I infer that we have still a large credit in Europe upon the transactions of the last year, the exports being greatly more than enough to settle the apparent balance against us.

It may be said that although there is an excess of only $2,929,522 of imports over the exports, this is because so large a proportion of the exports has been in specie.

If we turn to the President's message, we will find that the exports of specie have been only $42,000,000, and the imports $5,000,000, showing an excess of exports over imports of $37,000,000, which is an amount greatly below the products of the California gold mines. At this day, according to the official statement of the President of the United States, we have a larger amount of specie in the country, than we had at the commencement of the fiscal year. I have not been able to obtain any accurate statement of the products of the California mines, but I presume they have been at least as large as those of the mines of Australia; and we know that during the last year $50,000,000 have been produced from those mines. I take it for granted, therefore, that $50,000,000 have been produced from the mines of California. What, then, do we see? We have exported only $37,000,000, while we have received from the California mines $50,000,000, leaving a large surplus or balance remaining in the country beyond the quantity we had at the beginning of the year. Now, I say that we should probably have been in a more wholesome condition, if still larger quantities of gold had been sent away. We might not then have had that expansion of prices which has produced such an alteration in the relations between debtor and creditor, and has caused so much inconvenience, and even distress among many of the working classes.

But, sir, as to this excess of imports over exports, appearing in our official returns, it has always been the case. From the foundation of our Government to the present time, our statistics will show that there has been an apparent excess of imports over exports of several hundred millions of dollars. The late returns give us no reason to apprehend that what is called the balance of trade has been against us during the present or the past year. The value of the exports will always, in the official returns, fall below the value of the imports. It has always been so, and will always continue to be so. There are many credits to which we are entitled, that cancel these apparent balances against us, but which never appear in the official returns of our exports. Freight, and commercial profits in themselves, amount to considerable sums. Mr. Walker, in one of his reports to Congress, says that the products of our whale fisheries are even included in the list of imports, to the amount of several millions yearly.

But suppose it were true that our imports did far exceed our exports. It is the fashion of the day to consider this a very disastrous state of things. Even Mr. Walker seems to have fallen into the prevailing error, if it be one—for I speak of so eminent an authority with all possible diffidence—of supposing that if the imports of a nation are greatly above the exports, it would be a very unhappy condition of affairs. Now, I am not treating the subject in its moral relations, and in its connection with good faith and honesty, but as a mere question of political economy. I say, that if for a long series of years, a nation receives more than it returns—if the wealth added to it exceeds that taken from it, our sympathies would be somewhat misapplied if we should bewail her condition. If she should never pay the balance at all, we might be excused perhaps for sympathizing with those unfortunate creditors who hold unsatisfied demands against her. I know that the effort to pay, and the consequent decline of prices, often occasion real distress; but I am speaking of the condition of a country that should always receive more than it gave, if indeed such a state of things was ever known.

But I will go on with the President's message. He says:

"In the second place, as our manufacturing establishments are broken down by competition with foreigners, the capital invested in them is lost; thousands of honest and industrious citizens are thrown out of employment, and the farmer to that extent is deprived of a home market for the sale of his surplus produce."

The President here complains, first, that thousands of citizens are thrown out of employment; and secondly, that the farmer loses the home market—that is to say, he can no longer sell anything to those thousands of citizens who are thrown out of employment.

Now, as to the first head of complaint, the President seems to think that it is the great object of civilized society to give employment to labor, without regard to its productiveness, but merely for the sake of its employment. I might say, in reply, that it is one of the objects of civilization, to throw labor out of employment, at least temporarily, and that this is always done when a new labor-saving machine is invented. The world generally regards him as the greatest benefactor of his species, who, in this way, succeeds in throwing the largest number of men out of employment. Would it be deemed a national calamity, if some person should invent a machine by which one man was enabled to do the work of fifty? We know that every such machine, though its first effect is to deprive men of employment, only adds to the demand for human labor. The great object is to make labor profitable, and to dispense with all that is unprofitable. If it be true, then, that opening our markets to foreign competition, will have the effect of enabling us to dispense with the unprofitable labor of any portion of our own population, it would be no more a subject of regret, than if such labor had been superseded by the invention of some new machine. Sir, if it was the object of society to give employment to labor, however unprofitable it might be, it could be very readily accomplished. You need do nothing more than destroy all your labor-saving machines. But you wish to employ your neighbor in preference to foreigners. And so do I, where his labor is productive. But the world would soon stand still—nay, would speedily retrograde, if you should foster unproductive industry, merely because it was your neighbor's! Would you employ your neighbor to cut down your harvest with knives instead of scythes, for the sake of employing the largest number, and for the longest time? Would you call in your neighbor doctor to prescribe for you when you are not sick, or when a simple root would cure you of your ailment, for the benevolent purpose of giving him something to do? No, sir. It may be true—I hope it is true—that by the abolition of protective duties, you throw out of employment men engaged in the production of articles for which they are not fitted; and if that was not the effect, no good would be done by the abolition of protective duties. That is the end contemplated; that is the end designed. For whenever there are men who, by legislative means, are enabled to compel the people of this country to pay more for any article than it is worth, I desire that the market should be opened to competition, even though they might thus be thrown out of employment. The great object should be to give employment to productive and useful labor. The increasing population of the world demands a corresponding increase in the productiveness of human labor. Destroy your labor-saving machines, abandon the use of horses, mules, and other labor which comes in competition with the labor of man, and the large population now upon the globe would perish miserably. They could not be sustained.

In order to secure employment to unprofitable labor, you must tax the country to an amount greatly exceeding the benefit resulting to the parties protected; and it would be better for those who have to bear the burdens of these taxes, to make up a fund sufficient to support these unprofitable laborers in absolute idleness, provided they were then left at liberty to supply their wants in the cheaper markets of the world. It would be some consolation to us, under the operation of a protective tariff, to know that what was lost by us, was wholly gained by the protected classes; but it is hardly fair to impose a tax upon our people of fifty, or a hundred per cent., to enable the manufacturers to make ten. No, sir, the surest way to protect American labor, is to develop our resources, and cultivate our best talent. We cannot make a better world than the Almighty has made. It is said that Mr. Pope, applying a very exaggerated sort of flattery to Sir Godfrey Kneller, once whispered to him that if he had been consulted at the creation he could have furnished some useful hints. The vain old man replied, "I think I could, Mr. Pope." I do not know whether gentlemen who sustain the protective, or forcing system, are dissatisfied with the existing arrangements of Providence, but let me suggest to them, that we can scarcely improve upon Divine wisdom. Let us apply ourselves to the production of such things as are suited to our soil, climate, and condition. The diversities in each should instruct us that we were intended to hold commerce with our fellowman for the supply of those wants that no one country can fully satisfy, and that in this mode civilization and christianity are to be extended to the remotest borders of the earth.

The President complains of the loss of our home market. My friend from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] too, thinks this home market very important to the farmer. What do they mean by a home market? Of course they only mean that market which is dependent upon the protective system, for none other could be affected by its abolition. They cannot suppose that the whole home market of the country is dependent upon the protective policy, for there have always been other pursuits than that of agriculture, and almost from the beginning of the world men have bought and sold in their own country, and have thus had what we call a home market. What the President means by the home market, which is to be lost to the farmer upon the destruction of the protective policy, is that artificial market which is built up by the tariff. It is the demand of the protected classes for such things as they have occasion to use; or rather, to be more exact, so much of that demand as is stimulated and increased by the law securing employment to them in their new pursuits. This demand of the manufacturers for the commodities which they use, is elegantly termed the home market. Now, sir, I grant that this artificial home market is dependent on protection, and will be destroyed by the prostration of the protective policy. It is a very small market, though gentlemen on the other side attempt to magnify its importance. So far as I am concerned, sir, it shall be as large as they please, and the larger the better for the purposes of my argument. For as this artificial market is created by compelling us to buy from those who sell the protected commodities, for which we are obliged to pay more than they are worth, the more we deal with them, the more must we lose. What they buy from us must depend on what we buy from them, and the greater this home market therefore, the greater is the loss.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] said just now, that he wished to build up a consuming class to create a market for the agricultural products of the country. This is protection with a vengeance! A distinguished Whig statesman from Maine, [Mr. Evans,] said something like this seven or eight years ago. He said that by protection, the manufacturers were lifted up to be consumers. If we have commodities that we wish to sell, it is very easy to create such a market as this. We have only to supply others with the money necessary to purchase them, and then congratulate ourselves that we have met with a sale. Such consumers of our productions may readily be found if we only give notice that we will ourselves furnish the money with which they are to purchase them.

But gentlemen say that we must build up a home market, as foreign nations will not buy our productions. This is a great mistake in fact, but it is a no less serious error of principle. The method adopted for creating the home market, is by excluding their manufactures by a protective tariff, and compelling the people to buy and sell at home. Now, this very necessity for legislative exclusion proves that we could get their manufactures if this means were not resorted to. How could we get them unless we paid for them in our productions, or at least in money? As long as we have either, why shall we be prevented from buying them? If they will not take our productions in exchange, and we have no more money to send them, why, then, they will no longer consent to supply us. If they did, we should get their goods for nothing. Depend upon it, sir, they will not do that. If, then, they will not take our agricultural productions, there is no necessity for our resolving that we will not take their goods, for we could not get them if we would. The prohibition, then, if it has any practical operation, is mischievous; if it has none, it is absurd.

The President says:

"In the third place, the destruction of our manufactures leaves the foreigner without any competition in our market, and he consequently raises the price of the article sent here for sale, as is seen in the increased cost of iron imported from England."

Surely the President cannot suppose that the recent increase in the price of iron is in any way connected with the tariff of 1846. But let me examine his general argument. The position that the destruction of our manufactures—I suppose he means those only that cannot be sustained without the aid of the Government—would leave the foreigner without any competition in our market, and that the price would consequently be raised, is altogether erroneous. There is a very fashionable mode of stating the argument upon this subject, and that is by speaking, not of foreign manufacturers, but of the foreign manufacturer, as if there was but one foreign manufacturer in the world. Though perhaps not designed, the argument is pressed, exactly as if we had but one person competing with our manufacturers abroad, and that, in a certain contingency, he was to have the monopoly of our markets, and to demand such prices as he pleased. The President seems to have adopted this form of expression. He speaks of the foreigner, and of his competition with us, and of our competition with him. He forgets that there are hundreds of thousands of foreigners all competing, not only with us, but with one another.

Suppose it was true, then, that the abolition of the duty would either immediately or remotely raise the price, what would be the result? If these foreign manufacturers, notwithstanding the heavy duty of thirty or forty per cent. which they pay, can compete as they now do with our own, then, if they should raise their prices after the abolition of the duty, or continue to demand and receive the same prices as before, they would add the whole amount of this duty to their former profits. If their present profits excite competition abroad, how much more would that competition be stimulated, when, in addition to the small profits they now get, they secured the larger profit equal to the heavy tax now imposed upon them? No man pretends that the profits of our own manufacturers are equal to the duty upon the foreign article. But, upon the President's supposition of a rise of prices, the profit of the foreign manufacturers would be greater than the duty upon the protected article. If, then, this smaller profit at home excites competition here, how much more would the greater profit abroad stimulate competition there.

No, sir, the result could not be as the President supposes. The abolition of the duty would not be followed by a rise of price. The market would not be secured to the foreigner without competition. You would have a more active competition than before; for the manufacturers of the whole world would compete with one another to supply your wants.

This competition would be much greater than the combined competition of foreigners and our own manufacturers, under the operation of the protective system. The reason is obvious. The high prices occasioned by the heavy duties diminish consumption. There would be a less number of men necessary to supply the smaller demand, than would be employed to supply the larger consumption that would follow the cheapening of the price. There is no force, then, in the argument that you diminish the number of competitors by abolishing protective duties. I had hoped that no one, in this age of the world, would have again urged the argument that the effect of protection was to lower prices. If this were really so, we should still be losers; for no one has ever pretended that the price could be lowered by an amount equal to the duty on foreign goods, which, of course, we lose when our own are consumed in their stead. These arguments of the protectionists imply great disinterestedness on the part of our manufacturers, who contend for the privilege of buying from us in the home market at the high est possible price, and of selling their goods to us at the cheapest possible rate!

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Stanton] said this morning that he desired protection for protection sake. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Jones] says, however, that all he wants is such incidental protection as may be secured by a revenue tariff. But what idea has my friend from Pennsylvania of a revenue tariff? Does he mean such a tax as will produce the highest amount of revenue? Is that what the gentleman means?

Mr. JONES, of Pennsylvania, (interrupting.) What I meant to state, and did state at the time, was this, that I wanted a revenue tariff, that is, a tariff adjusted for revenue, that being its primary object; and in connection with that, and having that always in view, I would put the duties upon that class of articles—looking upon it as a tax-bill—which would impose the burden of taxes as nearly equal as possible upon the mass of consumers.

I would adjust the duty according to a revenue standard; but in so doing I never would lose sight of the consideration that we were imposing a tax on the masses of the people. I said that the article of iron is consumed in the main by railroad and steamship companies and other corporations, and that, in relieving them from the payment of duty, the burdens of the Government will fall on the poorer class—the class least able to bear them.

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman would impose such a duty as would raise revenue and secure incidental protection. Now I say, that the combination of revenue with protection, is a moral and physical impossibility. A tariff to be protective, must be prohibitory to the extent it is protective. A revenue tariff gives no protection, and a protective tariff gives no revenue.

Of course, I speak of the respective operations of the revenue and protective features of a tariff. Both may be found in the same law, and in that way it may at once give protection and raise revenue. But I say that so much of its operation as gives protection, raises no revenue; and so much as raises revenue, gives no protection. You cannot combine revenue with protection. A tariff must always be prohibitory to the extent that it is protective. I do not deny that under the operation of a particular rate of duty, some articles may be excluded from the country, while others may still find their way in, after paying the duty; but I say that every article that is introduced into the country, interferes with the home manufacture, and to that extent deprives it of protection. On the other hand, to the precise extent that the foreign competition is prevented, revenue is destroyed. If the tax imposed on foreign goods be too low to exclude any of them, no protection is given; and the only effect of the tax is to raise revenue. If such a tax is laid as excludes all foreign goods, then you raise no revenue, and the duty has no effect but to give protection. If you impose a tax that will equalize foreign and domestic prices, so that one half the quantity of goods necessary for our consumption shall be furnished by the home manufacturer, and the other half shall continue to come in from abroad, then to the extent that it excludes the moiety of foreign imports, it is protective, prohibitory, and gives no revenue; and to the extent that it admits the other half, and raises revenue upon them, it gives no protection. It gives no protection, because the goods thus admitted come into competition with those of the home manufacturers, and diminish their sales by the amount of the foreign supply.

I think, sir, that duties ought to be imposed with exclusive reference to revenue. But it does not follow that that duty which will yield the largest amount of revenue, ought always to be adopted. The rule should be to fix such a duty as will raise the greatest revenue at the least cost. It may be that a particular rate of duty may raise the largest amount of money, but at the same time, it may so enhance the price of the article taxed as to enable similar articles manufactured at home to be sold at the same high price. Under the operation of such a tax a large revenue might be raised, but heavy burdens would thus be laid upon the people in the amounts paid to the protected interests. This would be as unwise as it would be, in laying direct taxes, to select some subject, which, while it would yield you a larger gross revenue than any other, would involve so great a cost of collection as to bring a smaller amount into the Treasury.

CUBAN ANNEXATION.

SPEECH OF HON. J. R. GIDDINGS,

OF OHIO,

In the House of Representatives,

December 14, 1852,

On the annexation of Cuba; delivered in the Committee of the Whole, on the motion to refer the Annual Message of the President to the several committees.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Mr. Chairman, I have risen with no intention to participate in this discussion of the tariff. I abstain from it for the reason that it has been discussed for more than thirty years, by the ablest men in the nation, and no new theory or thoughts are likely to be elicited at this time. I abstain from it for the reaons that there is now no party which avows the protective policy. I also abstain from its discussion for the reason that the ablest advocates of protection have, since the late presidential election, declared that policy to be dead—that it now sleeps with its great advocate, Henry Clay.

Why, sir, during the recent campaign, a Whig missionary, formerly a member of this body, was sent from New York city to Ohio, to inform us that unless the tariff were increased, the country would be ruined; and here, sir, on the second day of the session, his Whig successor, elected with the aid of his vote and influence, moved a resolution to reduce the tariff. Now, it is quite evident that whether it be increased or diminished, the Whigs of New York are to enjoy the victory, for they are on both sides of the question. But I think there is an intention on the part of the majority of the House, to do neither, and thereby disappoint both factions of the New York Whigs. [Laughter.]

Its discussion at this time, is unseasonable and out of place. The short session will not afford sufficient opportunity to mature a readjustment of the duties on imports; and, sir, we are all conscious that the responsibility rests upon the majority of this body, who are evidently disinclined to enter upon it at present. Our country was never more prosperous; and never did the people feel less desirous of a change of tariff than at this time. That indifference was very apparent during the late political campaign. If our most popular speakers attempted to discuss this subject, their meetings would "grow small by degrees, and beautifully less." So, too, during the three days this body has been occupied by it. Members would not listen to the eloquent speeches presented by their colleagues; and most of that time, our Hall has been nearly deserted.

The discussion has become "flat, stale, and unprofitable." And whatever my feelings may be, I cannot disguise the fact, that the popular tendency in England, throughout Europe, and in this country, is toward free trade. Experience is the only test which can be applied to these theories. The truth of this remark is exemplified in the operation of the present tariff. At the time of its adoption, we were told that it would not produce revenue sufficient to carry on the Government. Yet although our expenditures were nearly doubled by the Mexican war, we have now more revenue than sufficient to meet all demands upon our Treasury. These facts should teach us to be less tenacious of our theories, and more willing to be guided by experience.

We are all conscious that but one great interest in these United States is now protected by a prohibitory tariff; that is, the slave-breeding interest of Virginia and the other northern slave States. We protect the slave grower by visiting the penalty of death upon those who import slaves to the injury of our own citizens, who rear boys and girls for the market. These facts stand prominent upon the history of our times. We have secured to the slave-dealers of this nation a monopoly of the crime of buying and selling human flesh.

Now, sir, with all kindness, I will say to those advocates for protection to northern labor, that while they make merchandise of the southern laborer, of his wife and children, it will be in vain for them to profess humane sympathy for the free and independent laborers of the North. While you profess an anxious solicitude for the pecuniary interest of the laborer in the cotton mill, and at the same time make merchandise of the bone and sinews, the blood and muscle of him who cultivates the raw material, the people will pronounce you hypocrites.

I this morning read in one of our papers an account of a slave mother, having four children whom she tenderly loved. Her soul yearned for their happiness. But her master contracted to deliver them to a slave-dealer. She vainly implored him to desist from his purpose. He persisted; and as she saw her offspring about to be torn from her embrace, she felt unable to meet such separation, and in order to save her loved ones from the suffering and degradation to which your laws consigned them, she mercifully deprived them of life. A few days afterwards, she was herself consigned to the gallows, for this manifestation of her affection; and the whole family of five persons were placed beyond the further cruelty of your laws.

Now, sir, while we continue in force laws which inflict such suffering upon one portion of our fellow-mortals, and at the same time profess an anxiety for the pecuniary interest of another portion, will not all candid men charge us with hypocricy and falsehood?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennesee, said, if he understood the gentleman from Ohio, he was in favor of removing the protection to slave labor by repealing the law which prohibits the importation of slaves.

Mr. GIDDINGS. The gentleman is mistaken; it was the protection of the slave grower to which I referred. It is the law of Congress, which authorizes the domestic slave trade, that I condemn. That traffic is far more barbarous than the foreign slave trade which we very properly characterize as piracy, and punish with death. Dealing in human flesh is, in a moral point of view, a naked, undisguised piracy; it is so regarded by all reflecting men; and those who traffic in human flesh, either here, in Africa, or elsewhere, and all who advise, aid, counsel, or encourage such traffic, are guilty, and deserve death upon the gallows. The manner in which we aid and encourage this crime is immaterial. If we lend that encouragement by passing laws to protect the slave-dealer, or by lending our influence to retain such laws in force, we are as guilty as he who actually buys and sells the victims of this traffic, and we, sir, deserve death as much as he does. I would not hang the ignorant sailor who goes to Africa and purchases men and women there, and spare the member of Congress who exerts his influence to continue the same crimes here. Had I the power to punish these crimes, I would inflict the same penalty upon every man who deals in human flesh, or who authorizes or encourages such traffic.

I observed that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Jones] took occasion, while discussing the tariff, to say that the Democracy of his State were in favor of the fugitive law; but it is somewhat remarkable that the President, in his message, makes no mention of that law. It is said, that during the last three months more fugitives have found their way to Canada than ever previously emigrated to that province in the same space of time. They went singly, in pairs, in companies of five, of ten; and sometimes twenty or more traveled together. Scarcely a slave-catcher interposed to prevent this tide of emigration; and those who made attempts to stop them were unsuccessful. The emigrants were armed and ready for the combat. They laughed at your fugitive law, and ridiculed those who enacted and who advocate its continuance. As the President is about to retire from office, he witnesses the contempt into which this, his favorite measure, has fallen, yet he fails in his last annual message to notice these facts, nor does he make even an effort to modify the popular odium which has pronounced those compromise measures infamous. He sees the country rapidly separating into two parties; the supporters of slavery and the advocates of liberty. He must be conscious that these parties will soon swallow up all other organizations. The free Democracy and the slave Democracy will soon characterize our political distinctions, and the Democratic principle of man's natural right to liberty will be vindicated and sustained; yet he remains silent on the subject.

And here I wish to say to the friends of liberty that our cause is advancing rapidly, and with firmer and surer pace than at any former period. The old political organizations have lost their moral power. The election of the great western statesman, Thomas H. Benton, in opposition to both the Whig and Democratic parties, shows the tendency of men to think and vote agreeably to the dictates of their own judgment, and not according to caucus dictation, or party rule. He, sir, was unconnected with all parties. He was the exponent of his own views: the people approved his sentiments, and, setting party dictation at defiance, they elected him. Nor was the election of the distinguished philanthropist from New York, Gerritt Smith, less a triumph of independent political thought and action. These distinguished gentlemen were connected with no political parties; but each was elected upon his own merits.

I have not time to speak of the election to this body of the free Democratic members, and of Whig and Democratic members elected by aid of the Free Democracy: nor are these elections, triumphant as they are, even an indication of the extent of our progress. Our principles are cherished by hundreds of thousands of the other parties, who have heretofore been unable to separate themselves from their long-cherished political organizations, but who now say they have acted with them for the last time.

Again, sir, we have enlisted the literati of our country on the side of truth, liberty, and justice. To my fair countrywomen I would say, that a lady with her pen, has done more for the cause of freedom, during the last year, than any savant, statesman, or politician of our land. That inimitable work, "Uncle Tom's Cabin," is now carrying truth to the minds of millions, who, to this time, have been deaf to the cries of the downtrodden. It is arousing the sensibilities of this country and of Europe. It goes where no other anti-slavery work ever found its way; and quietly carries conviction to the hearts of its readers. It has been dramatized, and both in this country and in Europe, the play-going public listen with intense interest to the wrongs, the revolting crimes of slavery. Thus, the theater, that "school of vice," has been subsidized to the promulgation of truth, and the hearts of thousands have been reached, who were approachable in no other way.

The clergy of the North are awakening to duty, to the calls of humanity. No longer are we called to listen to "lower law" sermons, nor are the feelings of our Christian communities shocked by reading discourses from Doctors of Divinity, intended to sanctify and encourage the most transcendent crimes which ever disgraced mankind. Churches and ecclesiastical bodies, are beginning to move in behalf of truth, of christian principles. They are purifying themselves from those who deal in God's image; they are withdrawing church fellowship from those pirates who deserve the gallows and halter, rather than a seat at the communion table of Christian churches.

I have glanced at these facts in answer to those who have spoken before me, and for the encouragement of our friends, in order to assure them, that while Whigs and Democrats in this Hall are discussing the propriety of protecting "cotton cloth" and "cut nails," the advocates of freedom have not forgotten the duty of protecting the rights of our common humanity.

But, Mr. Chairman, my principal object in rising, was to call the attention of this body and of the country, to the first in the series of resolutions presented by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. HOUSTON.] It refers to our "foreign relations." The position we hold towards the Governments of Spain, Great Britain, and France, is unusually important at this time. The recent publication of the correspondence between our Executive and the Spanish Ministry has excited a deep and pervading interest throughout the country.

And, sir, I here take pleasure in vindicating the President against the assaults made upon him by some presses of the South for publishing this correspondence. With its publication he had no concern whatever. We, sir, by resolution, called for the correspondence. As the representatives of the sovereign people, we had a right to it. He had no right to withhold it. As he was bound by his oath and by the Constitution, he sent it to us. We ordered it printed. The people had a right to see and understand what their servants were doing on this as well as on all other subjects.

This correspondence is highly important. It shows to the country and to the civilized world, that for thirty years the Executive has exerted our national influence to maintain slavery in Cuba, in order that the institution may be rendered more secure in the United States. This policy stands out in bold relief; it pervades the whole correspondence, and was also incorporated into the instructions of our Commissioners to the Congress of Panama, although those instructions are not embraced in the communication now before us.

Both Whig and Democratic Administrations have adopted this policy; and although I have but little time to read extracts from this correspondence, I will give one from the letter of Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, marked "Private and Confidential," to our Consul at Havana, dated January 14, 1843, in which the author refers to reported intentions of British abolitionists and the British Ministry to aid in the abolition of slavery and in the establishment of an independent government in Cuba: he says: "If this scheme should succeed, the influence of 'Britain in this quarter, it is remarked, will be un-'limited. With six hundred thousand blacks in 'Cuba, and eight hundred thousand in her West 'India islands, she will (it is said) strike a blow at 'the existence of slavery in the United States." These, sir, are the words of a man who opposed all expression, by this Government, of sympathy with oppressed Hungary; who was so strongly opposed to all intervention with the affairs of other Governments in favor of liberty.

We, sir, hold our own institutions by the right of revolution, which he so severely condemned. He appears to have been shocked at the idea that liberty should be enjoyed in Cuba, and avowed himself willing to prostitute the naval and military power of the United States to uphold a system of oppression in that Island which consigns to premature graves one tenth part of its whole slave population annually—a system by which eighty thousand human victims are said to be sacrificed every year to Spanish barbarity and Spanish cupidity. Sir, at this moment the Senate are engaged in eulogizing the statesman who has himself erected this monument to perpetuate his own disgrace. They, sir, are endeavoring to falsify the truth of history; to cover up those stains upon his character which no time can erase, and no effort of friends can purify. They can never separate his memory from the great errors of his life. Sir, it is right and proper that the evil deeds of public men should be remembered, that posterity may avoid their crimes, and duly estimate their moral and political worth. Yet, sir, we were told during the recent canvass, that unless we voted for the Whig candidate, if we permitted the Democratic candidate to be elected, Cuba would be annexed and slavery extended and strengthened in the United States. Plausibility was given to this argument by a certain distinguished Senator from the West, who traveled somewhat extensively, making speeches in favor of Cuban annexation and fillibustering expeditions to that Island. I desire to say, very distinctly, that in my opinion, that gentleman "ran before he was sent." He appeared anxious to obtain southern favor by making himself the advocate of what he deemed southern measures. I think if he had waited a few months, and consulted the sober reflecting statesmen of the South, they would have told him to remain quiet. But he hastened to acquire southern favor, and, like some who have gone before him, he will find hereafter that he has run his bark upon the same rock on which so many northern statesmen have made shipwreck of their political hopes. Other Democratic candidates of the North have pursued the same policy, and some Whigs have striven to keep pace in this race of servility. Among others, I notice a Whig paper in New York, of somewhat extensive circulation, avowing the policy of annexing Cuba. Others have taunted the Free Democracy with having lent our influence to that policy, by refusing to vote for the Whig candidate.

Now, sir, I would say to them, that the Free Democracy is not altogether composed of boys and unfledged politicians; nor is it guided by men destitute of experience and forethought. We, sir, look not to the other parties for guidance: we do our own thinking, and our own voting. We have our own views upon this question as well as on all others.

Gentlemen of the Democratic party who have spoken here, have alluded directly to this policy, but have carefully withheld all expression of their own views, or the views of their party, in reference to it. I had hoped to hear from gentlemen the designs of the incoming President. At least I hoped to hear what they themselves think of this policy. Are they, individually, in favor of it or against it? No one has presumed to avow his own thoughts. Now, I would say to those members, you were sent here to represent the people. Franklin Pierce was elected to carry out and execute the laws which we enact—not to represent the voice of the people in enacting laws. God has given to you the powers of thought and reflection. He has given to you judgment and conscience. It is your duty to exercise those judgments and obey your own consciences—not to wait for General Pierce to tell you how to act and what to do, nor to obtain instructions on these subjects from the incoming President, or from the members of his Cabinet. If you do this, you are not representatives of the people, but of General Pierce, who will take care to represent himself. If you do this, you will not deserve the name of freemen. No, gentlemen, you and I were commissioned to avow the popular will of the nation; and God forbid that we should wait to receive instructions from any other human being.

But, as I have remarked, no Democrat has as yet intimated the policy of the incoming Administration in regard to Cuba; and as the country is desirous of understanding what that policy will be, I will volunteer to speak for the President elect. [Laughter.] As my colleague in the Senate yesterday remarked, "I am a Democrat, by the grace of God, free and independent;" and as I have no doubt as to the policy of General Pierce, I will give my opinion as to his course on this subject. If he be the man—the statesman—that I take him to be, he will neither say nor do anything about it. He will leave it in silence. He will not follow the example of one of his predecessors, who, in his inaugural address, declared our title to the whole of Oregon to be clear and unquestionable, and when the British lion began to growl and show his teeth, our President backed out of his position, and surrendered one half to British rule. No; General Pierce will not be likely to follow such an example. He will look thoroughly into this subject before he commits himself in regard to it.

It is certain that former Administrations and a portion of the people of the United States have long coveted Cuba, and would gladly now wrest it from the control of Spain, if they could do so with safety. The objects for which they would do it, I have already adverted to. But an omniscient, all-wise Providence has thrown around the consummation of that great national crime such difficulties, and embarrassments, and positive dangers, that in my opinion it will never be perpetrated.

The first and only mode in which we can hope to obtain Cuba is by peaceful, quiet purchase. Suppose the Spanish Crown should consent to take $100,000,000, as proposed by Mr. Buchanan, for the transfer of Cuba to this Government, and our President should stipulate to pay it; I would yet say to the Spanish Cortes, and to British and to French statesmen, that not one dollar of that amount can go to the possession of Spain until this House shall make the appropriation. I wish them to understand that the people here are the source of all political power, and their representatives control the Treasury of the country.

Now, sir, what benefit will the people of Ohio, or of any free State, receive by the annexation of Cuba, for which they are to be taxed to such a large amount? The first effect would be to bring to this Hall eleven Spanish members to enact laws to govern our people. Those Spaniards will be ignorant of our language, bred and educated under Spanish despotism, unacquainted with our institutions; men who never exercised the right of suffrage, and who have no just views of free governments. I do not think the influence of such men in this Hall would be worth $100,000,000. But the Spanish population of Cuba would not only be brought into full political association with our people, but they would come into the Union with greater advantages, influence, and power over our rights and interests than we ourselves possess. Their influence under our Constitution will be proportioned to the number of their slaves, counting five of those newly-imported Cuban negroes, fresh from the African coast, equal in moral and political influence to three of our free citizens of the North; so that the holder of five of those slaves will wield the same influence in the Federal Government which four of our northern men exercise. Now, let those representatives who really think their constituents to be worthy of only one fourth part of the moral and political influence to which those Cuban slaveholders are entitled, vote to give the $100,000,000 to degrade their constituents and posterity to the level of those Cuban slaves. Sir, I deny the right and the constitutional power of this Government thus to degrade and disgrace the freemen of Ohio. Will my Democratic colleagues, or my Whig colleagues take issue with me on this point? Will either of those parties inscribe Cuban annexation upon their banner at the next election? Yet, sir, until the people consent thus to disgrace themselves and their children in coming time, this insult to our dignity cannot be consummated. Will not such a proposition stir up agitation? But, sir, we have merely commenced upon the difficulties which surround and embarrass the purchase of Cuba. The eight hundred thousand slaves of Cuba were mostly born in Africa, and imported to that Island. They are desperate and have little regard for human life. For many years past the military force required to hold them in subjection has been estimated at twenty thousand men, or twice the military force now maintained by this Government. The annual cost of maintaining such an army in that Island would not probably fall short of $20,000,000; and the expense of civil government, including light-houses, local legislation, pay of members of Congress, &c., would not be less than $3,000,000. While the revenue, under our laws being assessed only upon imports, would not exceed $2,500,000. Thus there would be a net annual expenditure of more than $20,000,000 over the revenues of the Island to hold their slaves in subjection. That amount would be drawn mostly from our laboring men of the free States. And now I ask, in all kindness, how long do you believe the laboring people of Ohio would consent to pay troops at that rate to stand sentinel over the slave drivers of Cuba while they lash these degraded minions into submission?

But a standing army of twenty thousand men will not be sufficient to maintain this system of oppression. That Island now imports some thirty thousand African slaves annually. They are ignorant and stupid; they have no common language, and are incapable of any concerted movement for freedom. By annexing Cuba to the United States, this foreign slave trade will be cut off, and the supply of victims will then be drawn from our slave-trading States. This, sir, is the great object for which annexation is sought. It will enhance the price of human chattels in our northern slave States. But here again, God has thrown around this gigantic crime, dangers which cannot be avoided. These slaves will be more enlightened; they will speak the English language, which is spoken in all the British Islands. They will have some knowledge of their rights, and of the means of obtaining them. Nor will they want for leaders to guide them in the work of achieving their liberty. The whole eight hundred thousand free colored people in the neighboring islands will sympathize with them. Some Douglass, some Redmond, some Ward, or other hero, will be found to plan and conduct insurrections; some Toussaint to lead them in battle. Your troops will find active employment. Fire and sword will be called into service; devastation, rapine, and slaughter will be carried by the infuriated slaves over the plantations and villages. Two hundred thousand colored men rendered desperate by barbarous oppression, will constitute no mean force when fighting for life and liberty. In that struggle Mr. Jefferson has assured us the Almighty possesses no attribute which will permit him to take sides with the oppressors. No, sir, our consciences and our sympathies must be with the oppressed. Our prayers will be that justice shall take place; and if the oppressors be laid low in death, we shall view it with christian submission. Then, sir, this Government will possess the constitutional power to conclude a peace by the total abolition of this accursed system of oppression. And do you think that Congress will long continue such a war? Will they shoot down those who thus strike for liberty? Or will they not rather consent to return to them their God-given rights?

And, sir, I would say to our southern friends, that when this spirit of liberty shall once be aroused among the blacks of Cuba, they will be very likely to bring the war into Florida, Alabama, and other southern States. Mr. Chairman, annex Cuba now, with its present slave population, and you and I may live to see our slave States devastated by a servile war. Indeed, I am surprised that the colored population there have remained supinely inactive so long. These States are at this time suppressed volcanoes, ready to burst forth whenever the elements shall become agitated. The annexation of Cuba will rock this Union to its center, and the hidden flames will find vent, and the fire will extend until slavery be consumed. When that day of retributive justice shall overtake our southern friends, we, sir, will interpose, not by shooting down the victims of oppression, by murdering those who have been oppressed, wronged and outraged, but by making peace with them upon terms of justice, and admitting them to the enjoyment of their liberty.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have spoken only of the peaceful purchase of Cuba and its consequences. It is the only mode in which we can obtain it. We can get it in no other mode. Slavery sits like an incubus upon our nation, paralyzing all our energies, and rendering a war with any powerful nation impolitic and dangerous. We cannot go to war for the conquest of Cuba. And, sir, from what we learn by the correspondence before us, as well as from other sources, Spain will not be likely to sell it to us. She has taken her position on this point, and has long maintained it. She will continue to maintain it. The old Castilian determination of purpose will guide her councils in future. I am, therefore, very clearly of opinion, that we shall not have Cuba so long as the friends of liberty continue to call public attention to the wrongs and crimes of slavery.

The policy of the Spanish Government to set the slaves of Cuba free in case of formidable invasion, forbids all hope of obtaining it by conquest. It is now well known that prior to the Lopez expedition, the Governor-General had express orders, if he found it necessary to defend the Island, to abolish slavery and put arms into the hands of the emancipated slaves. Now, sir, our fillibustering politicians will have no object in obtaining Cuba, unless they can thereby obtain it with slavery. They fight for oppression, not for freedom. With these facts before the country, we shall have no more fillibustering expeditions. Our political fillibusters will now disappear. They will escape the garrote, but will be reserved for political suffocation.

Mr. Chairman, I speak my own opinions. No other man is responsible for what I say. I have given some attention to this subject, and have satisfied my own mind, that while the advocates of liberty shall continue their efforts for freedom, their struggles for justice to all men, Cuba will not be annexed. I congratulate the friends of liberty and of humanity upon the important position they have attained. The very efforts which our opponents said would secure the annexation of Cuba have, under the circumstances to which I have referred, prevented the perpetration of that outrage. It is the bold, unflinching agitation and maintenance of truth, by political, moral, and religious efforts, that has saved us from that degradation. Had we, sir, united with the other political parties at the late election; had we then disbanded, there would have been danger of the annexation of Cuba, even at the price of war and bloodshed. But we have attained the position which enables us by our efforts to command the respect of our opponents; and, more especially, has our course commanded the respect of ourselves—of good men—of the lovers of liberty in this country and in Europe, and, as I humbly trust, the approval of God himself. Slavery can only flourish, it can only exist, in the quiet repose of peace. It cannot continue amid the storm of war or the rage of moral elements. All history shows us that slavery cannot exist amidst the agitation of truth. Justice is the great moral antagonism of oppression. They cannot exist together. I indulge the hope that slavery has reached its limits; that it cannot pass beyond its present boundaries, if we remain true to our purpose and our principles. Its proud waves are already stayed. Cuba must remain attached to the crown of Spain. Yet I would say to British and to French statesmen, that if they wish to obtain it for the purpose of establishing liberty there, of giving freedom to its down-trodden people, let them satisfy Spain and take the Island. We shall submit, for the very obvious reason, that while we hold our own slave population in subjection, we cannot enter into a war with either of those Powers in order to maintain that institution in Cuba. We, sir, would rather see Cuba free, under British or French rule, than see our fellow-men oppressed, degraded, and ruthlessly murdered under either Spanish or American authority. But if it remains subject to Spanish laws, its final redemption is not so far distant as we have been accustomed to think. The employment of Chinese laborers in that Island has proved far more profitable than of slaves. Indeed, it is said the expense of carrying on their plantations by the labor of these free people from China is less than half that of slave labor. At this time there are said to be six thousand Chinamen on their passage to Cuba, for the purpose of engaging in the cultivation of the soil. The laws of Cuba are also more favorable to emancipation than those of our slave States. These circumstances, under the guidance of Providence, amid the lights and intelligence of the present age, are slowly but surely working out the redemption of Cuba, even under Spanish rule. Yet its annexation to this Union would, in my opinion, hasten the overthrow of slavery, both there and in our slave States.

The world is moving in favor of liberty. Redemption to the African race upon this continent must soon come. I trust it will come in peace; but I will add, in the language of our departed coadjutor, John Quincy Adams, "Let it come; if it must come in blood, yet I say LET IT COME."

BARQUE GEORGIANA, &c.

*REMARKS OF HON. E. K. SMART,

OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

December 27, 1852,

In reference to the seizure and confiscation, by the Spanish authorities, of the barque Georgiana of Maine, and brig Susan Loud of Mass.

Mr. SMART said:

Mr. Speaker: A number of my constituents, as well as interested citizens of Massachusetts, having made application to the State Department, to obtain relief, without success, I deem it now due to those I represent, to make a public statement of their claim upon the Spanish Government for indemnity. The Georgiana cleared from the port of New Orleans and left for Chagres on the 25th of April, 1850, with provisions and passengers, agreeably to her charter. After being at sea about seven days, she was compelled, by head winds and a strong current against her, to stop at

*These remarks were written out and handed to the Reporter for publication in the Daily Globe, as I could get no opportunity to deliver them in the House. I gave the House notice that I would send them to the Reporter for publication, my object being to get the facts before the country.

E. K. S.

the Island of Contoy. She remained at that Island two days, waiting for a change of wind, after which she got under way for the Island of Mugures. Attempting for three days to reach Mugures, she was finally compelled, by head winds and adverse currents, to return to Contoy.

The Susan Loud cleared at the custom-house in New Orleans on or about the first day of May, A. D. 1850, for Chagres, the place to which she was bound according to her charter. She left New Orleans on the second day of May, 1850, having on board passengers and provisions. After she had left the Mississippi river, C. R. Wheat, who had chartered the Susan Loud, to transport passengers and provisions from New Orleans to Chagres, being on board, directed the master to proceed to latitude 26° north, in longitude 87° west. The Susan Loud proceeded to this point, at which the steamer Creole came up, taking the passengers and her captain from the Susan Loud, and commanding the captain to act as pilot to the steamer to Mugures and thence to Cardenas, which command he obeyed. The Susan Loud in charge of her mate, Mr. Hale, now went to Contoy.

The Georgiana and Susan Loud lay at anchor at Contoy harbor, on the 18th of May, when the Spanish war-steamer Pizarro, and brig-of-war Habanero, hove in sight, and immediately captured the American vessels, with all their officers, seamen, and passengers.

These vessels were taken into Havana, by the General of Marine, on the 5th of June, 1850, and confiscated to the use of the Spanish Government on the 9th of July following. These facts I believe are substantially agreed to on both sides. But the Spanish authorities rely on certain other circumstantial evidence as a justification of their seizure and confiscation of the American vessels. It is stated in the report of the Auditor of War and Marine, at Havana, in the proceedings carried on consequent to the detention, at Contoy, of the Georgiana and Susan Loud, that the Georgiana, two days after she left New Orleans, took in cases at the Balise, which were said to contain machinery, but turned out to contain arms.

It seems that these cases were said to contain machinery, at the time they were taken on board the Georgiana. Should we not fairly infer that they were so considered by the captain and crew of the Georgiana? If, however, they were then found to contain arms, &c., the captain was without the necessary power to break up the voyage, or prevent the shipment of these cases.

It is further stated in that report, that the Creole communicated with the Susan Loud at sea. The Creole did communicate with the Susan Loud at sea, and it was unquestionably by a previous arrangement with Wheat, the supercargo, and not with the captain. Wheat states in his deposition, communicated with the papers furnished by the President, that after they got to sea he directed the captain of the Susan Loud to sail to a point 26° north latitude, 87° west longitude. There the Creole came up, as I have already stated. The captain was then taken on board the Creole, and detained, against his will, as appears by Wheat's deposition.

It is further alleged that the Creole communicated with both vessels at Contoy; but this is no proof of combination on the part of their officers and crews with the Creole. They were evidently, after they got to sea, under the control of persons whom they had no power to resist. Many of the men on board the Georgiana and Susan Loud may have been connected with the expedition; but the officers and crews of the vessels at the time of their departure, it certainly appears, regarded their destination as Chagres. The clearance of these vessels for Chagres is prima facie proof that their officers regarded Chagres, and not Cuba, as their destination, and there is no evidence to show that they had any knowledge, prior to their departure, of any combination of those on board their vessels with the invaders of Cuba. After the officers of the vessels were at sea, they found themselves compelled to obey those persons on board, who turned out to be connected with the expedition, and who had the physical power and determination to command them. Such are the facts, and upon these facts and some few others less important, the Spanish authorities appear to have acted.

The value of the barque Georgiana and losses sustained by her crew amounted to...$17,313 50
That of the Susan Loud to.....12,787 37

Total.....$30,100 87

On the 15th of December, 1851, I submitted a resolution to the House of Representatives, requesting information concerning the seizure and confiscation of these vessels. The resolution was adopted, and answered by the Secretary of State on the 27th of January, 1852. From the papers communicated by the Secretary of State, I obtain the facts I have now stated. The Georgiana was the property of citizens residing in the district I have the honor to represent, and the Susan Loud was owned by citizens of Massachusetts. The owners of these vessels are honest, industrious, worthy men, and they are entitled to the protection of the Government, against the spoliation of their property by a foreign nation. Other citizens, indeed, can but regard their cause with solicitude. Every one engaged in commerce has an especial interest in the protection of our flag, and in defending all our just rights upon the high seas; and every patriotic man must feel that the laws of nations should not be violated and American citizens thereby injured.

With this view of the subject, the seizure of these American vessels becomes a matter of general interest. If we suffer two vessels to be wrongfully seized and confiscated, what safety is there for any portion of our commercial marine? If we permit the clearest principles of international law to be violated in the confiscation of our property, we shall nowhere be safe from insult and injury.

I do not wish to complain, but I think our Government has been tardy, if not negligent in this matter. The Georgiana and Susan Loud were confiscated by the Spanish authorities in July, 1850, and up to this time no indemnification has been obtained by our Government. The American Government, strange as it may seem, has been more prompt to indemnify Spanish subjects for the destruction of Spanish property.

About the time of the seizure of these vessels, the populace of New Orleans destroyed some property belonging to the Spanish Consul, and other subjects of Spain. Immediately after, upon the meeting of Congress, the President promptly recommended an appropriation to indemnify these Spanish subjects. In accordance with this recommendation, Congress at its late session appropriated $25,000 for that purpose.

While such peculiar care has been taken of the interests of Spanish subjects, no mention has been made by Mr. Fillmore in his message of the indemnity due to American citizens, and I do not learn that the American Government has made any progress in procuring indemnity from Spain for the outrage now under our notice. From an examination of the papers, I do not believe the Spanish Government had evidence sufficient to justify it in affirming that these vessels were bound for the Island of Cuba; and so far as I can learn, the testimony obtained by the Spanish Court of Admiralty affords no proof that the officers and crews of these vessels intended to invade the Island of Cuba, or even knew at the time of their departure of any connection of their vessels or passengers with such invasion. Be that as it may, they did not in fact invade that Island, nor did the vessels go into Spanish waters or within Spanish jurisdiction. They committed no offense against the laws of Spain, because they did not go within the limits of Spanish territory.

The only justification of the seizure of these vessels, seriously advanced by the Spanish Government, is that they were pirates on a desert Island, (at Contoy,) and that the Island was the same as the open sea. They therefore seized them as "pirates upon the high seas."

But they were not pirates even if they intended invading Cuba. The American Government took this position and demanded the immediate release of the vessels and passengers, and insisted that they should never be tried by Spain. This was patriotic. The position of the Government was taken under General Taylor, but it was not insisted on so far as the subsequent acts of the two Governments were concerned.

Our Government permitted the Cuban authorities to try the men taken at Contoy, and to convict such as they chose to convict; also, to confiscate the vessels to their own use! The American Government, instead of obtaining a release as a matter of right, accepted of a pardon for these American citizens, convicted by the Spanish Government; and have obtained no indemnity, as I have before stated, for the confiscation of the vessels. Such has been the position of Mr. Fillmore's administration, in face of its valiant declarations that the Spanish authorities had no right to seize our citizens or vessels at the Island of Contoy—an Island within the jurisdiction of Mexico—and that the eagle should protect them.

To show the position of our Government upon this question when the news was first received of the capture of the Georgiana and Susan Loud, and their officers, crews, and passengers, I quote from Hon. John M. Clayton, then Secretary of State:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
"WASHINGTON, June 3, 1850.

"But it is not conceded that the Spanish Government, having captured these citizens on a Mexican Island, have a right to convey them to Havana and punish them capitally for crime. It is unnecessary for me to remind one so well versed in the law of nations, that there is a wide distinction between crime and the intention to commit it. Besides, it has been alleged that these men had abandoned the illegal enterprise, and relinquished all design to invade Cuba."

The Secretary of State to Mr. Calderon.

"WASHINGTON, July 9, 1850.

"I have had the honor to receive your note of the 2d instant. In reference to so much of that note as refers to the trial of the Contoy prisoners by the 'Marine Court of the Havana station,' it is my duty to state, as I have heretofore said to you in conversation, that I do not admit the right of the Spanish authorities to try those prisoners, who, according to all the statements which have reached us, were captured beyond the Spanish jurisdiction, and had committed no act of hostility against Spain or her colonies. It is also my duty to repeat what I have heretofore said verbally to you, that the President of the United States had sent an agent to Havana to demand the release of these prisoners, who, in his judgment, were not guilty of any intention to invade the Island of Cuba. He claimed for these prisoners that they should be tried by the courts of their own country, and that they were not amenable to the Spanish jurisdiction. * * * * * * *

"Were your reasoning correct, you might with equal propriety denounce the penalties of piracy upon any citizen of the United States who has been engaged in fitting out the illegal expedition against Cuba, although he may have never left the limits of his own country. I therefore take occasion again to repeat to your Excellency, that the designation of 'pirates,' when applied to the Contoy prisoners, is utterly erroneous, even supposing (what I would by no means admit) that they entertained hostile intentions against the Spanish dominion in Cuba.

"The facts related in your note to justify the capture and abduction of the prisoners taken at Contoy, and the two vessels, the Georgiana and the Susan Loud, are deemed entirely insufficient, and it is my object now to remind your Excellency that in all I have written and said to you upon this subject, I have endeavored faithfully to warn your Government of the danger which might result to the peaceful relations of the two countries, should illegal punishment be inflicted upon these American citizens."

The Secretary of State to Mr. Calderon.

"WASHINGTON, June 25, 1850.

"You have repeatedly designated these American citizens concerned in the late outrageous violation of the laws, both of the United States and Spain, as 'pirates.' It is by no means my duty to shield them from the use of the most opprobrious epithets you can bestow. Still their crime was not piracy. Murder and robbery are crimes of the deepest dye; but unless committed on the high seas, they cannot amount to piracy. The distinction may appear of little consequence, except where the designation of 'pirate' is applied to citizens of the United States who may have engaged in an enterprise to invade Cuba, but have not executed their intention. The indiscriminate application of such a designation to these men, as well as to those who have been guilty of some overt act of felony, may give rise to errors which we may hereafter have occasion to regret. American citizens who may have engaged in an expedition for the invasion of Cuba have doubtless been guilty of a great crime, in violating the laws of their own country, for which they merit, and will receive, the just censure not only of Spain, but of the United States. Yet their offense, without some overt act of felony, and that, too, on the high seas, cannot with any propriety be characterized as 'piracy.'"

I have stated that our Government demanded the immediate release of the vessels and passengers captured at Contoy. To show that it took such position, I refer to its instructions to Commodore Morris, which are as follows:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
"WASHINGTON, June 29, 1850.

"The President directs that you proceed as soon as possible to Havana, in the war steamer Vixen; that, on your arrival there, you request an audience of the Governor and Captain General of Cuba, representing to him that you bear a message to him from the President of the United States of importance to his country, as well as your own. On being admitted to his presence, you will demand of him the immediate release of all the prisoners taken at Contoy, and without the Spanish jurisdiction. He recognizes no right on the part of the Spanish authorities to try and punish the prisoners taken at Contoy; and he will view their punishment by the authorities of Cuba as an outrage upon the rights of this country. Without enlarging upon the grounds taken in making the demand through the Consul, of which you are fully informed, the President is satisfied, from the reports which he has received of the evidence taken before Judge Marvin at Key West, as well as from other information, which he deems entirely reliable, that the men taken at Contoy had embarked to go to Chagres; and if any of them had ever designed to invade Cuba, they had repented of that design and abandoned it. Under these circumstances, the President cannot consent that the lives or liberties of citizens of the United States shall be forfeited, or that the question of the truth of the evidence above-mentioned shall be referred to any foreign tribunal.

"The owners of the bark Georgiana and the brig Susan Loud have exhibited to this Department statements to prove the innocence of the captains who chartered those vessels; and you will inform the Governor and Captain General of Cuba that this Government expects those vessels to be returned to their owners, with damages for their capture and detention. Those statements confirm the testimony taken before Judge Marvin of the innocence of the prisoners of any intention to invade Cuba—which testimony has, we learn, been fully communicated to the Governor and Captain General."

I also ask attention to the language of our Minister to Spain. Mr. Barringer to Mr. Clayton, giving an account of Mr. B.'s reply to the Spanish Minister of State, at Madrid, August 7, 1850, says:

"I replied, that the Georgiana and Susan Loud were carrying passengers who believed bona fide that they were going to Chagres; that the vessels did not accompany each other, nor was there any proof that they ever had the same original destination; that even if the prisoners taken at Contoy were primarily engaged in the enterprise of Lopez and his comrades, they had abandoned that intention, and were about to return to the United States; that the Government of the United States were in possession of evidence tending to establish this conclusion; that the principle that an intent to commit a crime is not the crime itself, was too palpable to need comment. There must be some overt act, even when such criminal intention existed. There was always a locus penitentiæ; and, in this particular case, if the prisoners were guilty of any offense on the ground of intention, it was certainly not against the laws of Spain, but of the United States, and cognizable alone in their tribunals, which claimed the sole jurisdiction to decide on the competency of the evidence which might be offered to affect their guilt or innocence. But apart from all these considerations, the Government of the United States believed that the American occupants of the Island of Contoy, near the coast of Yucatan, belonging and subject to the jurisdiction and sovereignty of Mexico, a Power on terms of friendship and amity with the United States, and beyond the territory and jurisdiction of Spain, and who were there made prisoners by her direction and command, were not guilty of any offense, under the law of nations, against Spain; and that their seizure on the territory of a third and friendly Power was illegal and in derogation of the rights of the United States: much less did Spain have any right to detain and prosecute American citizens thus captured in her own tribunals, according to her own course of judicial procedure in criminal cases. The United States could not recognize such a right or pretension, and protested in the most firm and solemn manner against all proceedings and consequences which had or might follow from such unlawful capture, and the investigations had by virtue of it in the Spanish courts. I was instructed by the President to demand of her Majesty's Government, at Madrid, the immediate release of the American citizens thus taken, and now in confinement under Spanish authority; and that, as I had every reason to believe that her Majesty's Government had been fully apprized of the nature and character of this demand, I was also instructed to insist on a prompt reply."

Mr. Barringer, in a communication to Pedro J. Pidal, Spanish Minister of State, dated Legation of the United States in Spain, Madrid, September 19, 1850, made use of the following language:

"The argument of your Excellency, in defense of the resolution of her Majesty's Government, is founded on two cardinal errors repeatedly asserted or insisted on in your communication: 1st. That the Contoy prisoners are 'pirates,' according to the law of nations; 2d. That the Island of Contoy is 'desert,' and not subject to any local jurisdiction, so far as the purposes of this question are concerned.

"Piracy, under the law of nations, has a fixed and determinate meaning, and is, in the language of the law, defined with 'reasonable certainty.' Many acts may even partake, to some extent, in moral guilt, of a piratical character, which are nevertheless not piracy.

"To plan, to fit out, and send forth from the United States a military expedition against a colony of Spain—although a most penal and flagitious crime under the laws of the United States, subjecting the offenders to severe punishment if arrested within their jurisdiction, (which extends to the vessels of all their citizens,) and to all the consequences of the violation of Spanish law, if taken within the dominions or jurisdiction of her Majesty—surely is not piracy under the law of nations.

"But to show how a resolute zeal (which I would rather commend than depreciate) to defend, at all hazards, the Island of Cuba against any attempted invasion, might, and did mislead the patriotic officers of her Majesty's Navy, I will suppose, for the sake of argument only, that all originally engaged in this criminal expedition were pirates by the law of nations; even then the arrest at Contoy, and the claim of jurisdiction founded upon it, are not authorized by international law. If they were, in fact, pirates, they could only be followed and seized in the territory of another Power on 'fresh pursuit.'"

Again: Mr. Barringer, writing to the Marquis of Pidal, Minister of State, dated Legation of the United States, Madrid, August 27, 1850, says:

"The Government of the United States cannot recognize the right of Spain to seize American vessels at anchor on the coast, and within the territory and jurisdiction of a Power having friendly relations with the United States; to capture and imprison the men and crew on board of vessels thus situated, and try them in Spanish tribunals, and according to Spanish rules and forms of proceeding, for any supposed violation of the law of nations, much less for that of Spanish municipal law.

"The prisoners whose release is demanded, were all arrested in the month of May last, either on the Island of Contoy or on board of two American vessels, the Georgiana and the Susan Loud, which were seized whilst at anchor at said Island on the coast of Yucatan, which is a portion of her domain and property, and within the jurisdiction of the Mexican Republic, of which the said State of Yucatan is a component part.

"The question of the guilt or innocence of these prisoners as connected with the late hostile expedition of Lopez, to invade the Island of Cuba, does not affect, in the slightest degree, the principles upon which this demand is made.

"Against any such illegal attempt to invade and attack the territory of a friendly Power, the Government of the United States has given too many proofs of its opposition and efficient resistance to render necessary any further assurance of its sincerity and its fidelity to every obligation of duty, or to leave any room for doubt as to its amicable dispositions.

"If these prisoners were guilty of any offense, it is cognizable and punishable by the laws of the United States, whose provisions are most ample and effectual against all such criminal enterprises set on foot within their territory or jurisdiction to invade the territory or dominions of any foreign kingdom, State, or colony, with which we are at peace.

"We deny that these men were guilty of any act of invasion or depredation on Spanish territory, or within Spanish jurisdiction. Even if guilty, originally, of an intention to join the frustrated expedition of Lopez and his coadjutors and followers, this was a crime punishable only by and under the laws of the United States, and could not justify Spain in arresting and prosecuting them under her laws.

"I am instructed to say, that my Government will view the punishment, by the authorities of Cuba, of the prisoners thus taken at Contoy, without the Spanish jurisdiction, as an outrage on the rights of the United States.

"In conclusion, and with a view to prevent misapprehension, I desire to say in reference to the barque Georgiana and the brig Susan Loud, that their owners have exhibited to my Government statements to prove the innocence of the captains who chartered them; and that the Government of the United States expects those vessels to be returned to their owners, with damages for their capture and detention."

It will thus be seen that Mr. Clayton, and Mr. Barringer, our Minister to Spain, took the strongest ground against the legality of the seizure of these vessels and the capture of their crews. Mr. Webster, who afterwards came into the State Department, expressed his entire approbation of the manner in which the claims of indemnity for the capture of the Georgiana and Susan Loud had been maintained by Mr. Barringer. He also pronounced an early acknowledgment of the equity of those claims "an act of sheer justice." Here is what he said, in a letter to Mr. Barringer, dated Department of State, Washington, February 5, 1851:

"I had hoped, ere this, to have been enabled to furnish for your use the necessary materials, with instructions to renew your application to her Catholic Majesty's Government for the early acknowledgment of the equity of these claims—an act of sheer justice, which, however, cannot fail to promote the friendly relations of the two countries.

"I feel that it is due to you, in closing this letter, to express my entire approbation of the manner in which these claims have been maintained by you in your correspondence with the Marquis de Pidal. Spain must be made to understand that the Executive of the United States will not submit to behold an injury done to persons or property under the flag of the Union, without holding to a strict responsibility the Government by whose officers such an injury may have been inflicted."

It will thus be seen how emphatic our Government has been (in language) upon the subject of the seizure and confiscation of these vessels; and yet I regret to say their owners have received not one cent in the way of indemnification.

Our Consul at Havana took the same position maintained by Messrs. Clayton, Webster, and Barringer. I make a few extracts from his correspondence with the Secretary of State:

"CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
"HAVANA, May 31, 1850.

"One of the vessels captured at Contoy is said to be the American barque Georgiana. By reference to the New Orleans Price-current, I find that the American barque Georgiana, Benson master, was on the 25th of April regularly cleared by G. W. Breedlove, with a cargo of coal, for Chagres, which proves the sailing of that particular vessel to have been with the knowledge of the collector of the port, and that her papers were in due order.

"There may have been justification in this particular instance for temporary detention of the two vessels, but, for aught I know to the contrary, no overt act had been committed against the Spanish Government by the master or those on board the captured vessels; there may have been intention, but that intention may have been repented of and changed; but if even the intention of overt acts against this Government were entertained at the time of capture, it cannot vest a power in this Government to arrest the parties in a foreign country, to be brought to Cuba for trial. To illustrate this it may not be amiss to refer to the case of the Duc d'Enghien (with which your Excellency is familiar) to prove the opinion of the civilized world on a parallel case. If (so far as appears) offense against any Government has been committed by the masters and others on board of the captured vessels, (supposing them to be American with regular papers,) the offense has been against the laws and Government of the United States, and to that Government alone are they amenable, unless they have in some way violated the laws of Mexico."

Mr. Campbell, in a letter dated 19th June, 1850, to the Secretary of State, giving an account of his interview with the Captain General of Cuba, says:

"I observed that the President of the United States does not admit the right on the part of the Spanish Government to capture those men; they never having been on Spanish territory, could not have committed any act violative of Spanish law. Even admitting them to be guilty, their guilt was against the laws of the United States: they are amenable to those laws, and to no others."

It would seem to be a work of supererogation to add anything to the language of our Government upon the illegality of the whole proceeding of the Spanish authorities in capturing and confiscating the American vessels at Contoy.

One fact is not disputed. These vessels never went into Spanish waters prior to their capture, and if they committed any offense, it was in Mexican or American territory. Contoy, the place of their capture, it is well known, is an island under the jurisdiction of Mexico.

I take the liberty, then, to quote a single authority applicable to this fact:

"It is evident that a State cannot punish an offense against its municipal laws, committed within the territory of another State, unless by its own citizens; nor can it arrest the persons or property of the supposed offender within that territory."—Wheaton's Law of Nations, pp. 169, 170.

Upon what ground, then, could the Spanish Government capture these vessels, their officers and crews? That they were engaged, it is said, in piracy on the high seas. Certainly on no other ground. If they were pirates, they might, I admit, be lawfully captured on the high seas, but not within Mexican jurisdiction. But the idea that they were pirates is, to say the least, wholly absurd. "Piracy is the offense of DEPREDATING on 'the seas without being authorized by any sov-'ereign State, or with commissions from different 'sovereigns at war with each other."—(Wheaton's Law of Nations, p. 176.)

Now, let the facts in the case of these vessels be examined. Whatever was intended by the officers, crews, or passengers, as a matter of fact they sailed under regular papers from New Orleans to Contoy. They committed no depredations upon anybody. The vessels had no armanent to enable them to plunder and rob upon the high seas; and I hazard nothing in saying, that this Government will never assent to the extraordinary assumption that they were pirates.

The Spanish authorities having, then, no right to capture these vessels, I trust the American Government will do its duty, and submit to no longer delay in obtaining indemnity for our citizens. In my judgment, our vessels of war should have retaken the Georgiana and Susan Loud without hesitation. And while our Government pronounced the detention of these vessel an "outrage," it should have had sufficient courage to have given an instant order for their recapture.

That model President, the illustrious Andrew Jackson, would have given the order without hesitation. But Mr. Fillmore shrunk from a maintenance of the unquestionable convictions of the Government, with such demonstration as those convictions would fully justify. He waited, without any forcible interposition, for the Spanish authorities to convict and pardon several of our citizens, who were on board these vessels. He received as a pardon, what should have been demanded as a right, and insisted on, if need be, at the cannon's mouth. The property of our citizens, amounting to more than thirty thousand dollars, he has suffered the Spanish Government to retain, and no satisfaction has been made to those who were captured, for their unjust detention. We are all interested in this extraordinary proceeding. Should our Government continue such a foreign policy as it has lately pursued in its intercourse with Spain, we shall soon be liable to insult from every considerable Power of the earth. It is refreshing to know that the time is at hand when it will not pursue such a policy. I by no means justify fillibustering of any kind; but we should not allow an unjust infliation by an unauthorized Power even upon an erring citizen of this Republic. Whatever may be said of the acts or intentions of the men who were captured at Contoy, I repeat, the Spanish Government have convicted and punished them without the shadow of authority. There were aggravating circumstances connected with this transaction of the Spanish Government, not generally known. Our citizens were the victims of suffering and insult, which might have been prevented by a forcible interference of our Government at the time. The following statement of the seizure of the Contoy prisoners by eighteen of their number, will be found interesting:

"The officers of the Spanish vessels of war ordered the captain of the Georgiana and another to be hung; and as regards the captain, they proceeded so far as to place a rope around his neck ready greased, and from twenty to twenty-five pounds of lead to each leg. Why they did not carry their threats into execution we are unable to say, for they had declared to the first two (that had been carried on board, as already related in our statement of the 6th May, rendered on board the steamer Levan) that they should be hung, and also all hands; considering us as pirates, and applying the term as the crime for which they said they intended hanging.

"Having, as stated, changed their mode of procedure as regards the hanging part, they set to work binding each man's arms so tight that it caused many to complain of the stagnation of blood; thus manacled, we were conducted to the third deck of the Pizarro, (viz: the thirteen,) and the thirty-nine were placed in similar situation on board of the brig Habanero. Once secured in this way, their next move was to get under way for Havana, at which place we arrived on the 20th May, and from our custody on the Pizarro we, the Pizarro party, were removed on board the ship of-the-line Soberano, with the exception of one, A. B. Moore. Arriving on board said Soberano, we were placed in line on the top deck; when thus placed, our persons were searched to see if we had concealed weapons; (the same policy had been pursued at the time of seizing us at Contoy, and was here again dastardly repeated.) After having rifled our persons of whatever articles of value found with us, we were ordered, in the most brutal manner, to descend to the third gun deck; and having arrived there, orders were issued to chain or shackle us two by two, i. e., placing a shackle on one leg of each party; there was an iron bar, of eighteen inches long and three inches in circumference, placed in said shackles so as to connect the parties together. Being manacled in this manner, we were placed on the floor and ordered to lie down and keep silence; and to this was added the vigilance of two sentinels. To this may be added the various modes they exercised of tormenting us, such as would be too lengthy to give in detail. We, the party of twelve thus manacled, remained until the 24th in the utmost suspense, not knowing what course they were going to pursue towards us; finally, on this date, we were informed of their intentions of trying us by our affidavits, which were to be given by us, and according to their purport to implicate or clear us of the accusation pending at the time. The plan pursued during the whole of this farce was bombastic—Spanish pomposity, arrogance, and vindictive looks, and threats used from time to time during the examination of the culprit pro tem.; and further to impose on this state of procedure a further mark of ignominy, the prisoner was led manacled by both legs in the presence of his honor the fiscal and his interpreter, who, pretending to be a thorough English scholar, proceeded with his inquiries as dictated by the fiscal, and in his efforts to use the figurative and flowing speech of Señor Fiscal, plunged himself deeper and deeper into a labyrinth that already appeared to them insurmountable. They continued to pursue this course during the investigation of the twelve; and on the arrival of the thirty-nine, from on the brig Habanero, on the said Soberano, pursued further acts of restraining, such as cautioning us not to speak to each other, &c., for if we did we would bring down their ire in such a manner as to cause us to be double manacled and sent to the Puntillo; (this is a solitary place of confinement, where the rod and other modes of punishment are recurred to, and from whence the prisoner seldom ever returns to the light of day.")

To the statement of these individuals I will add that of the American Consul, R. B. Campbell, in a letter to the Secretary of State, dated, Consulate of the United States, Havana, July 16, 1850:

"The captain, two mates, and seven seamen, detained by this Government, have not yet been relieved from incommunication; but permission being granted to Commodore Morris for him and myself to see the prisoners, we first called at the military hopital, at ten and half, a. m., of this day, to see Captain Benson, who had been placed in the hospital, as was understood, on account of indisposition. We found him in a room with grated windows, and had the pain and mortification to discover that his intellect was entirely destroyed, and he had become a raving maniac. The madness is manifestly real and not assumed. The acts and words of a madman it would be idle to report, and I therefore pass them unnoticed. * * * * *

"My feelings have been so harassed and wounded by the melancholy and hopeless condition of Captain Benson, and the conviction that, with the strongest desires, I have been impotent to save him from so sad and cruel a fate, that I hope I shall be excused by the President should I for a time visit the States, even in advance of permission being received. A few days, however, may lessen the present intensity of feeling; should they not, I shall leave by an early opportunity.

* * * * * * *

"The trial of the Contoy prisoners is, I suppose, being proceeded with. Captain Benson, of the Georgiana, it is believed, has been removed to a lunatic hospital. I feel a deep interest in his fate, and very much fear that his mind cannot be restored so long as he continues in a situation where he never hears his native language, or sees a familiar face. Should anything occur by which, officially or personally, I can in any manner serve him, the contingency will be immediately availed of."

I shall not be charged with drawing on my own imagination, or with exaggeration in an exhibition of the suffering and insult to which our people were subjected while in custody of the Spanish authorities. I simply refer to the documents I have quoted. They certainly present a picture sufficiently unpleasant to awaken American sensibilities.

I take this occasion again to express the hope that our Government will demand immediate satisfaction for the confiscation of these vessels, and for the damages sustained by their officers and crews. Should the Spanish Government refuse to make such satisfaction, I have no hesitation in expressing my own opinion as to the course the American Government would have a right to pursue. I have no ulterior objects in expressing that opinion; I want no war for conquest, and no annexation that is not brought about by peaceable negotiation. I would not involve the country in difficulty upon frivolous pretexts with a view that annexation of territory might result. But a positive right, whether the amount in dispute is large or small, should not be surrendered. In this case the amount, though comparatively small, is not small to those who have suffered. I repeat, then, I have no hesitation in expressing my own opinion as to the course this Government would have a right to pursue, if the Spanish authorities do not make immediate satisfaction. I think we should be justified in making reprisals of Spanish property. We should be fully justified in doing this.

Whether the Government would do this, it is, of course, not for me to say. Vattel says:

"Reprisals are used between nation and nation, in order to do themselves justice, when they cannnot otherwise obtain it. If a nation has taken possession of what belongs to another, if it refuses to pay a debt, to repair an injury, or to give adequate satisfaction for it, the latter may seize something belonging to the former, and apply it to its own advantage till it obtains payment of what is due, together with interest and damages; or keep it as a pledge till the offending nation has refused ample satisfaction or justice. As soon as that hope disappears, they are confiscated, and then reprisals are accomplished."

I have called the attention of the House and the country to this subject, because my constituents, having applied to this Government more than two years ago, have failed to accomplish anything.

I express the hope now, publicly, which I long ago expressed by letter to the State Department—that our Government will take this matter in hand and obtain indemnity for the men who have suffered, by what has been properly characterized by Mr. Clayton and Mr. Webster, as an outrage upon the property and persons of American citizens.

GOLD COIN IN CALIFORNIA.

SPEECH OF HON. W. M. GWIN,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE SENATE, December 29, 1852,

On the occasion of the presentation of several Memorials by Mr. WELLER, signed by Merchants in the city of San Francisco and California, complaining of an act of Congress passed on the 20th of August, 1852.

Mr. GWIN said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: These memorials are old acquaintances of mine. They played a part in the late political campaign in California, and were contrived for the purpose of exciting prejudice in the minds of the people of that State against the members of Congress from that State. I met the issues contained in them, on the stump there, and I have no reason to complain of the result. Therefore, I am not anxious to reargue the whole subject. But as the receipt of pieces of assayed gold for public dues in that State is a question of considerable importance, and as I had an agency in obtaining the legislation connected with the matter, I shall avail myself of this occasion to give a short history of my action in connection with the currency in California, that it may be correctly understood by my constituents and this body.

Soon after I arrived here as one of the Senators elect from California, among the first subjects that engaged my attention, was that of proposed legislation connected with the staple production of California, to wit, her gold; and inasmuch as I was not so well informed as I wished to be, I consulted the most eminent scientific men in the country, as to the best provisions that could be devised for the benefit of my constituents, concerned in the gold industry, and especially in relation to the coinage of said gold.

I may be permitted to say that I made inquiries of the able and distinguished gentleman who is now at the head of the Coast Survey, as well as of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, and of a gentleman whom they mentioned as one who had great practical experience and knowledge on the subject of coining. On the 11th of May, 1850, this gentleman favored me with a communication, which I will read:

COLLEGE OF NEW JERSEY, PRINCETON, May 11th, 1850.

MY DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request, I have the honor to present the following views in relation to the gold and commerce of California. Of course you may make any use of them you see fit.

On the continent of Europe, as you are aware, payments in large amount are rarely made in coin. Bars of the purest gold, of exactly-determined weight, quality, and value, are preferred and used for that purpose.

The size of said bars is usually about ten inches in length, three wide, and one-and-a-half thick, value, about $10,000.

The color of pure gold, a rich orange yellow, is much more difficult to imitate than that of any of its alloys. This, united with its great density, is a security against counterfeiting. Large bullion and specie transactions, are also generally confined to institutions, and persons whose commercial character is a guarantee against deception and fraud. There is, therefore, reason to believe that the counterfeiting of such bars would rarely occur, especially if it be rendered criminal to mutilate the bar without destroying or entirely changing its form, or to imitate or alter the assay marks upon it.

In France, bars of refined gold, stamped by an assayer, appointed by authority of law, with their respective weights, qualities, and values, and with the name and seal of said assayer, are a legal tender for their certified values.

During the administration of President Jackson, the French indemnity was paid in such bars. And the Rothschilds frequently send them to their agent, A. Belmont, Esq., in New York, from whom they sometimes go to the United States Mint for coinage.

For international commerce, gold bars are far preferable to coin; being compact and liable to no loss of parts, they are adapted to transportation. As the equivalent value in the coin of any country is readily deduced, by a little simple arithmetic, from the weight and fineness of a bar, it is equally suited to all nations—being a sort of universal coin. Besides, bars require no tedious and difficult counting of numerous small pieces, and dispense with the cost and delay of coinage.

England and the United States alone seem to restrict commerce to coin. In 1847, the heavy payments of specie in return for our breadstuffs were made in sovereigns, rated as pounds sterling, though more or less worn, and therefore of variable value. Also, the Smithsonian bequest was paid in sovereigns. These sovereigns were all melted and recoined at the United States Mint; and our own coin is similarly treated when it crosses the Atlantic. Why should commercial nations be thus constantly recoining the money of each other, every time that the precious metals pass to and fro in the settlement of balances of trade, which are but temporary and oscillating?

The gold of California will find its way chiefly to Europe. Had it not better go there, then, in bars of exactly determined value, without the expense and delay of preparatory coinage by the United States, free of charge (as it now is) to the owners, but costly to the nation?

For the inhabitants of California and for their commerce with the Pacific nations, with China, and with the United States, a Mint is, however, indispensable. And it should be established as soon as practicable. At that Mint, it should be optional with any one depositing bullion to have it either coined, or cast into bars, upon which their weight, fineness, and value, and the stamp of the United States should be impressed,—all the penalties against counterfeiting being extended to the imitation of such stamped bars of the United States; but this provision not to interfere with the rights of any private or State assayer to manufacture, and stamp bars with his seal and their value, &c.

Of the organization of the California Mint, I could present much of valuable detail, from which I refrain.

To justify public confidence, it should be as perfect as possible, and be intrusted only to men of the highest integrity and skill.

It should, I think, be less dependent upon or controlled by the Philadelphia Mint than the existing branches are; for its greater distance, if so dependent, might produce vexations hindrances and inefficiency—besides it should be free from the local policy of a remote city.

With the view to economy, dispatch, and other advantages, the Mint system of the United States might be varied. In France the coinage is very well executed by contract, under supervision and verification by the Government. In England an association of chartered companies performs the work of refining, coining, &c., under similar governmental control. And the contract system, as in France, may be found that best suited for California.

Very truly, yours,
R. S. McCULLOH.

Hon. W. M. GWIN, U. S. Senate.

On the 9th of May, 1850, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] offered a resolution of inquiry, contemplating a change of the system of coinage, to wit: that authority be given to the Mint of the United States to issue coin without separating the silver from the gold of California—to let the alloy be entirely of silver, instead of silver and copper. On the 17th of July, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, to which that resolution was referred, reported against it, and that for the reason that in commerce silver which enters into gold coin is not considered of any value, and that, if the alloy was of silver only, the producers of gold in California would therefore lose the value of their silver. For this, and other good and valid reasons, the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the resolution.

In July, the bill establishing a branch Mint of the United States in California passed this body, before I was a member of it, and in it was incorporated the power of appointing immediately an assayer in California, and permitting him to assay gold. Soon after this I was admitted to my seat, and not looking upon that as a proper mode of accomplishing the object I had in view, I introduced two bills on the 19th of September, one providing for assay offices in Stockton and Sacramento City, and the other for the manufacture of large gold coins in the Mint, its branches, and assay offices. The bills were drawn up with great care and attention, and I shall publish them with these remarks.

After my bills reached the Committee on Finance, I ascertained that the Mint of the United States at Philadelphia was hostile to the establishment of a large Mint and assay offices in California. No sooner had I introduced my bill for large coins, than the Director of the Mint opened a correspondence with me, assuming that I was wrong, and that I did not understand the subject. He sent me a substitute for my bill, and a letter explaining how it was wrong, and his right. I found that mine met with no favor in the Committee on Finance; and the session passed without action on it. To the letter of the Director I replied, though not immediately, because I had not time at the close of the session of Congress; and in said reply I showed, I think, that his views, not mine, were erroneous. That correspondence, or extracts from it, I will also append to these remarks, as I do not wish to detain the Senate by reading it.

Inasmuch as I could not get my own bills, nor any Mint bill through Congress, at the close of the session of 1850, a law authorizing the establishment of an assaying office at San Francisco, as the only alternative, and the only legislation we could have, was passed. It was proposed to employ temporarily an assaying establishment in California, for the purpose of assaying gold. I wished to have bars, which should be of prescribed fineness and weight, stamped with legends and tracery, of given denominations, legalized and protected as coins of the United States; but the Director of the Mint denied that they could be made, and urged that gold in bars should be merely assayed, and that they should not be coins, nor be protected by penal statutes. When, towards the close of the session, chiefly, I believe, because of the interference of the Director of the Mint, this opposition to my bills, authorizing the making of gold coin in bars, I became convinced that I could not get such an act passed before the adjournment, and the proposition to employ an assay office by contract on the most reasonable terms for the assaying of gold in bars at San Francisco, was presented to me as all that could be enacted for the gold industry of California before the end of that session. I deemed it expedient to accede to that enactment, which might give some commercial facilities, but without any thought that it could lead to so gross an usurpation as that of the coining power by the Secretary of the Treasury, with or without the advice of the Director of the Mint, or any other officer of this Government, or that it would have embarrassed and deferred the passage of the California Mint bill.

These memorialists say that we intended to give them power to make that which would be legally receivable for public dues, in fact coin. I deny it. No such power was ever intended to be given. The power to coin money is conferred by the Constitution exclusively on the Congress of the United States. I will not go as largely into this question now as I would if the subject was regularly before the Senate. But, inasmuch as I have been very bitterly assailed in regard to this matter, I shall now controvert some statements which these memorialists make. Among other things, they say of this enactment which they ask you to repeal, that its object was, and is, to prohibit the receipt of the issues of the United States assay office for customs and other public dues.

Now, I will state what our object was. It was to restrain the exercise of a legislative power usurped by the Secretary of the Treasury, to wit: the sovereign power of coinage; and to reduce the charge for doing what the law had authorized, to wit: the assaying of bars from two and three fourths per cent. to one per cent.; and to arrest the substitution and augmentation of a debased metallic currency for the lawful coins of the land, to their exclusion. We never intended to confer the coining power upon the Secretary of the Treasury in the provision of 1850, otherwise we would not have passed the act during the last session of Congress prohibiting the receipt of ingots made under the aforesaid provision, because that would have been a violation of contract. We never intended that any coin should be made and issued by the assaying office. We wished merely that bars should be prepared for commercial purposes.

The memorialists refer to the sub-treasury act for the authority for making these assayed bars receivable; but that law expressly enacts that all public dues "shall be paid in gold and silver coin only;" and it goes further, and enacts that if any officer shall neglect, evade, or violate this law, he shall be immediately reported by the Secretary of the Treasury to the President, with the facts of such neglect, evasion, or violation, and also to Congress.

Here is a palpable violation of the sub-treasury law, which is brought by these memorialists to the notice of the Senate and of the country, for they show that the collector of the customs at San Francisco has refused to conform to the law, and has taken the responsibility of receiving other gold and silver than the current coin of the land; and it has never been reported to Congress, as the law requires, nor has he been dismissed from office. I will not detain the Senate, but I will not permit false statements, concerning the interests of California, to go to the country without rebuke, exposure, and refutation. They say, for instance, that the establishment of this assaying office has raised the price of gold dust from $16 to $17 25 per ounce. This is not true. Competition and other causes independent of this assay office, have increased said price. Two and three quarters per cent., the price this assay office was allowed to charge, is about fifty cents per ounce; besides, as the miner loses his silver, worth about fourteen cents per ounce, subject to a charge for parting and alloy, the stamping of slugs costs the miner fifty-five cents or more per ounce, which is taken from his gold in transitu to the Mint at Philadelphia, where these slugs have to be separated, and are not more valuable than the mere dust itself. How, then, can the assay office, independent of other causes, have made the price of gold dust rise from $16 to $17 25? This office was intended to give a more merchantable form to the gold, and therefore was expected to be of some service.

It may be proper to make these slugs receivable for public dues at their real value, as my colleague has suggested, if that can be ascertained. The Mint publishes them to be worth $49 90 only for the gold they contain, and to be of irregular weight and value. They go on in this memorial, Mr. President, and present some extracts from memorials which came here last session in favor of a Mint connected with this assay office, and they presume to speak in the name of the people of California. Why, all these memorials originated at this assay office, and those of the last session were sent to me after the Mint bill passed the Senate. They sought to connect the two together in public estimation, and thus help their speculation of the assay office through the popularity of the Mint. As to the views of the people of California, they are not given in these memorials, for they never came from the people. They were got up by interested parties, who have reaped enormous profits from the order issued by the Secretary of the Treasury. But with all their exertions, sending them by express through the country as a Whig electioneering document, they could not get the signatures of more than a thousand out of the seventy thousand votes cast in the late election.

No coin is receivable for the public dues except that which is made so by authority of law; and no foreign coin can be received unless its value is regulated by law, and it particularly specified. The coining is one of the highest powers of this and other Governments; and if we had intended that this assay office should issue coin, do you suppose that we would not have provided a penalty for counterfeiting, debasing, or mutilating it? Could we have given this power without prescribing penalties for violations of the high trust devolved? The act, I repeat, was merely intended to furnish commercial facilities, to determine and stamp the fineness of gold bullion in bars, instead of leaving it in grains and lumps, and it was designed to accomplish this object, authorize this, and only this. I am prepared to show that there was plenty of coin in California to pay the public dues before this order was issued from the Treasury Department, making ingots receivable as coin. Coin always is and ever will be imported and exported according to the wants and course of commerce.

In 1848 and 1849, there was a great scarcity of coin, but it afterwards became abundant. And in my opinion, if it had not been for this usurpation of power, it would have remained so, and we should have got along very well until a Mint was established. But by the substitution consequent upon that usurpation of an inferior and debased currency, for the coins expressly and exclusively authorized by the laws of the United States to be received in payment of public dues, the coin was shipped out of the country.

I will now declare that I am entirely opposed to the manner in which the Treasury Department has proposed to construct a Mint in California, with all due deference to those to whom the progress of that work is intrusted. A new state of affairs has arisen in the bullion trade of the world, since the Mint in Philadelphia was planned and built; and the whole arrangements of a new Mint ought to be adapted to this change. The plan of the Mint projected is servilely copied from that in Philadelphia, with all its incongruities, and would not be suitable to my State at all. By the leave of the Senate, I will, on a fit occasion, ask their consideration of the question whether we had not better suspend the building of a Mint on the plan proposed, until we can ascertain from those who understand the subject, what kind of a Mint is best calculated for California. This can be better done after the fourth of March next, when those shall come into power who will hold themselves, and be held by others, to be fully responsible to the people for the manner in which they expend money appropriated by Congress.

Ever since I took my seat I have had to contend with the Philadelphia Mint, closely connected with this assay office, and attempting to establish a local monopoly, injurious alike to the interests of my constituents and of the commerce of the country. And I intend shortly to bring to the notice of the Senate abuses in the management of this Mint and its branches.

They have resorted to falsehood to mislead legislation, by misrepresenting the capacity of the Mint; and to conceal this imposture, they even neglected to separate silver from the gold, coining it without parting, contrary to the report of the Committee on Finance to which I have referred; thereby depriving the depositors of their silver, whom they, at the same time, charged for its extraction; and therein they defrauded them of that which legally belonged to them.

The poor miner who brings with him his savings on his return to the Atlantic coast, unless he deposits so many ounces—I believe about seventy—as will pay the Mint for parting, and leave five dollars of silver over and above their charges, has his silver filched from him. It would be of no advantage to him, in the belief of the Mint officers, to have any sum less than five dollars in silver coin, yet by these filchings of small sums they augment their contingent fund annually to the amount of thousands of dollars. The rich depositor, who makes large profits from the miners of California, by speculating in their gold dust, and sends his accumulations to the Mint to the extent of thousands or millions of dollars, receives the silver from his bullion; but the humble owner of a few ounces, which he has earned by hard toil and kept by rigid economy, can receive no benefit from the parting process; his silver must go to the contingent fund of the Mint.

The legislation of the country has been in all respects liberal, just, and considerate. According to the existing laws, the depositor is entitled to have his gold coined without charge, and the silver separated therefrom for his benefit, and at cost of materials and labor only. The Mint, however, in the administration of those laws, makes the meanest exactions from him, taking that which he should receive to augment a fund for their expenditure, and avoid the disagreeable and dreaded duty of asking Congress for appropriations.

Lastly: I know, and am prepared to show, that the coin of the United States has been debased; and that the issue of gold coined during one year in one of the Mints, amounting to millions of dollars, was so much debased that it was under serious consideration whether it should not be entirely withdrawn from circulation.

APPENDIX.

MINT OF THE UNITED STATES, Sept. 24, 1850.

SIR: Adverting to my letter of yesterday, on the subject of your bill "to facilitate commerce by authorizing the manufacture of large rectangular coins or ingots at the Mint of the United States and its branches," and reasserting my approval of the object expressed in that letter, I beg leave to offer some remarks upon its chief provisions.

The shortness of the time debars me from entering into as much detail as would otherwise be proper. Permit me to say, that the third and thirteenth sections are not as free from ambiguity as is desirable in an enactment of law, and that the second, sixth, eighth, twelfth and fifteenth sections contain provisions, which, in my judgment, are not expedient, or are unsuitably parceled out to the officers of the Mint. Without waiting to give my reasons for these criticisms, as being of secondary importance, I come at once to the sections which I believe to be impracticable in their operations.

The second, fourth, seventh, and tenth sections taken together, provide for the casting of coins or ingots of specific denominations and values, from one hundred dollars to ten thousand dollars, (I hope you will excuse me here for pointing out the impropriety of the idea of "casting a coin," which runs through the entire bill: the word ingot is proper and sufficient.) It requires that those ingots shall be adjusted with an accuracy of fineness and weight, far more critical and refined than is required for our coins—namely, the half thousandth part in fineness, and the two one hundred thousandth part in weight. Lastly, it provides, that those ingots shall be subjected to an impression or coinage on each of their six sides and over the whole surface of them.

The practice of European nations proves that it does facilitate commerce to have large ingots or bars of gold, of an assured weight and fineness. And in respect to the State of California, it is manifestly desirable that her staple product, so far as it is intended for exportation, or for very large dealings, might be legally put into this form, just as the cotton of Louisiana is concentrated into bales; but then how does it become necessary or desirable to adjust them to a round value? Such bars are mainly, almost entirely an international currency, and any stamps or "tracery" we would put upon them, at whatever pains or expense, would not save them from being subjected to a fresh weighing, assay, and valuation—our troy ounces would be figured into kilogrammes or marks—our thousandths into carats, and carat grains—our even sum of dollars into pounds, francs or rix dollars, and their fractions; and not only so, but there might be found an irreconcilable variance of ten or twenty dollars in an ingot of ten thousand. We have never been able to take the commercial bars of Europe, any more than their coins, at their face.

The argument from this is, that all that the miner or trader wants is the assurance that his bar will pass in all lands for so many thousand dollars, exact money; but that it possesses a definite Mint value, resulting from a known weight and fineness; consequently it is not necessary nor desirable to adjust these bars to any given standard of fineness, nor to a specific weight, nor to a round value; they may be of any weight, any fineness, any value, according as the banker or miner has bullion to be put into that form. As to the stringent limits of weight and fineness stated in the bill, I assure you they are quite unattainable in business operations; and although I will not undertake to say, that to coin the whole surface of a large six-sided ingot would be an impossibility, provided there were an unlimited amount of time and money; yet I do not hesitate to pronounce it an impracticable measure, and if practicable, useless. The peculiar exterior aspect of a gold casting, is a better preservative against the arts of cutting and filing, than the most skillful and costly tracery that could be expended upon it. Trusting that you will receive these criticisms in a candid and courteous spirit, in which they are intended, and that the experience of the Mint in such a matter would be regarded as important, I now beg leave to offer a substitute to the whole bill. I have only to add, that I have omitted all the penal provisions, except as to the assayer, as entirely unnecessary; and happily so, as it would be next to impossible to prosecute such felonies to conviction. I have also omitted "assay offices," as none have been created by law separate from Mints, and when they are, they will, of course, be made to participate in the duties of this act.

Very respectfully, yours,

R. M. PATTERSON, Director.

Hon. W. M. GWIN, United States Senate.

A BILL to facilitate commerce, by authorizing the manufacture and issue of large ingots of gold, at the Mint of the United States and its branches.

1. Be it enacted, That it shall be lawful to manufacture ingots of gold at the Mint of the United States and its branches, whenever the same shall be requested by the depositors of gold bullion, which ingots shall be issued to such depositors in payment thereof: Provided, That such ingots shall not be of less value than ten thousand dollars.

2. Be it further enacted, That such ingots, before they are issued, shall be impressed with the words "MINT OF THE UNITED STATES," with the addition of the name of the place of the branch Mint, in case of issue from a branch Mint, with such further stamps as shall indicate the registered number and date, the fineness in thousandths, the weight in troy ounces, and the decimal parts of an ounce, and the net value in dollars and cents. Every such ingot shall also be accompanied with a memorandum from the Treasurer of the Mint, or branch Mint, stating the particulars in respect to the deposit, as is now customary in respect to deposits for coinage.

3. Be it further enacted, That the respective duties to be performed in execution of this act, shall be assigned by the Director of the Mint, to the subordinate officers of the Mint, or branch Mint, with the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury, in such division and order as is most compatible with the duties now assigned by law to such officers: Provided, That the only accounting officer in this case shall be the Treasurer.

4. Be it further enacted, That gold bullion deposited for the purpose contemplated in this act, shall be subject to such charges and deductions, and no other, as are imposed by law upon bullion deposited for coinage.

5. Be it further enacted, That to secure a due accuracy and uniformity in the assay of such ingots, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, from time to time, to cause check assays to be made, under the supervision of the Director of the Mint, of samples from ingots which may be received into the Treasury of the United States, and if, in repeated instances, the error is found to exceed two thousandths, said Director shall certify the fact to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the President of the United States, and the assayer in fault, shall thenceforth be disqualified from exercising that office.

6. Be it further enacted, That all such ingots shall be receivable for debts due to the United States, of every sort, at the Treasury of the United States, or any of its offices or custom-houses, at the net Mint value stamped upon them, and attested by the accompanying memorandum.

VICKSBURG, MISSISSIPPI, October, 1850.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 24th ultimo, with the proposed substitute for my bill; and I have considered the criticisms and views they contain in that "candid and courteous spirit" which you invoke for them, and in which I am assured they were intended.

It is evident that, while we agree in the general object of facilitating commerce, we differ, perhaps irreconcilably, as to some of the means most desirable or requisite to prepare the gold bullion of California for that purpose; and that advantages sought by me have been by you overlooked. Under such circumstances, I shall discuss the subject generally, and further criticisms, or suggestions, from you, in reply, will be fairly considered.

You should believe that I have not submitted a bill, upon so important a subject, to the consideration of Congress, without having obtained and availed myself of full information concerning both the commercial and technical facts and provisions embraced in it, even to their more minute details.

The object of your proposed substitute appears to be to introduce, into our country, the crude, imperfect, and limited ingot system of European bankers, designed chiefly for international exchanges—a system which I consider antiquated, and wholly inadequate and inadmissible; and for which I propose to substitute, and by law establish, an improvement, which shall virtually consist in the fabrication of large gold coins, adapted alike to domestic and international payments of considerable amount.

You have justly compared the casting of gold into crude ingots, such as those proposed by you, to the packing of cotton in bales of any weight and quality. But the large coins which I desire to have made, by legislative direction, are analogous to the barrel of flour, of one hundred and ninety-six pounds weight, and of superfine, fine, or other specific denomination; or to the barrel, of two hundred pounds, of mess, prime, or cargo beef or pork; and other uniform packages of staple productions, of definite weight and specific quality, which are most conveniently and commonly bought and sold by tale, or by reason of the faith reposed in the brand of their inspection; which is by the Constitution of the United States left with the States respectively. As gold is the staple production of California, and as the Constitution prohibits coining by the States, it is fit and proper that the United States should extend to that State every facility requisite for the definite inspection in weight and quality, and for the stamping of this most valuable commercial article.

Having presented these preliminary considerations which will perhaps serve to indicate the points upon which we differ, I shall comment upon your remarks and criticisms, and the features of your proposed substitute for the bill, with freedom, but with justice and entire frankness.

I did not expect verbal criticisms; but as you have seen fit to question the correctness of the phrase, to cast a coin, I would remark, that the sand dollars of Mexico are castings; and that legally, as well as in fact, a coin is any piece of either of the more precious metals, of adjusted weight and fineness, which by law is made tender of payment for its nominal value in the country to which it belongs. And if ingots be not coins, they can be so made to be by suitable legislative enactments, whether the same be cast, hammered, rolled, or in any other way manufactured.

If you will turn again to the third and thirteenth sections of the bill, and read them more attentively, you will, perhaps, cease to consider them ambiguous. It is a matter of arithmetic to calculate from the gold now required by law to be contained in the eagle, or coin of ten dollars, the quantity which should be in an ingot or coin of one thousand dollars, or of any other given denomination. And there can be no difficulty of ascertaining the meaning of an enactment which authorizes the exchange of small coins for ingots of equal value, and the conversion of such ingots into such coins, at the Mint and its branches, by the recoinage thereof; thus providing a legally-authorized means for the redemption of those ingots, and for their recoinage into small pieces suitable for diffused circulation, and for minor commercial and domestic purposes.

With reference to the sections of the bill allotting to the different officers their respective portions of the work required for the fabrication of the large coins or ingots, I am not aware that there is in them anything incompatible with the proper functions of those officers. * * *

It is known to me that the bill would add to the judicial responsibility, and slightly to the labor of the assayer, by requiring him to verify the weights as well as the fineness of the ingots, and to certify the same by stamping thereon the said weight and fineness, and a discriminating mark, which shall indicate not only the place of issue, but also, privately, to the Director of the Mint, the individual assayer. Thus the assayer would become the only judicial officer, and might be held, as he should be, to the strictest responsibility. The Treasurer does not appear to be the proper officer to act judicially upon the work of the coiner, as he is required to do by section twenty-six of the act approved January 18, 1837; and it seems to be both fit and expedient that such a transfer of duty from the treasurer to the assayer, as I propose, should be one of the provisions of the bill. * * * * * *

When the above modifications of the bill shall have been made, it will, I think, conform to the present allotments of work in the Mint, based upon the act approved 18th January, 1837, except in the aforesaid transfer of judicial duty from the treasurer to the assayer. And as the said act was framed, and is, as I am informed, in close accordance with the practice of the Mint and your own views, I trust that, when so modified, the distribution of official duties to the respective officers will meet with your approbation. I have endeavored, in preparing the bill, to be guided by the act of January 18th, 1837, as much as possible, consistently with the ends to be attained. And if you can point out any inconsistency, impropriety, or imperfection, in its working features, I should be happy to have you do so, and will make the proper correction or alteration.

In your proposed substitute, you leave the allotment of the work of the respective officers undefined, and subject to the administrative regulation of the Director, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury,—instead of prescribing the same by legislative enactment. To all such arrangements I am utterly opposed, for the reasons: that, when an officer takes an oath faithfully to perform the duties of his office, as prescribed by law, he has the right to know definitely what those duties are; and when his securities give bond, jointly with him, to the United States, they have a similar right to know, precisely, what are the conditions of their bond: that when power is delegated, by legislation, to any administrative officer, it is fit and wise that, if practicable, it be explicitly defined: that when discretionary authority is granted loosely, or vaguely, it is apt to lead to negligence or abuse; and even if this should not happen, the most conscientious exercise of such authority by an officer may, if attended with accidental loss or failure, involve him in difficulty and unmerited censure; against which contingency precise legislation alone can protect him: finally, that any want of harmony between officers in their coördinate duties may give rise to embarrassing difficulties, unless said duties shall be fixed by law.

Having presented you my views upon those provisions of the bill which relate to the distribution of the work to the respective officers, and which you treat as of secondary importance, I shall now discuss your criticisms and remarks upon those features which you pronounce to be impracticable and of no utility.

I cannot concur with you in believing it "impracticable, and, if practicable, useless," to cover the six surfaces of a rectangular ingot with impressions and tracery. It may be deemed impracticable by the coiner of a Mint, and that such is the case, if you have spoken as its official head, I do not doubt. But I cannot do to the ingenious and skillful artisans of your city the injustice to believe that it would be impracticable for them to contrive machinery adapted to the purpose, which shall be neither very complex nor very costly. And I am assured, by accomplished mechanicians, that I am correct in believing the art and mechanical skill of our country fully adequate to, and prepared for, the fabrication or coinage of such rectangular ingots or coins, covered with impressions and tracery, with a degree of beauty and perfection far surpassing that of any of the coins hitherto struck in the Mint; and that such work can readily be done in New York, if not in your Mint or city.

With reference to the supposed uselessness which you have been pleased to ascribe to the execution of such work, if practicable, for reasons assigned by you, I would remark, that your objections apply as well to the coins of the United States now in use, as to the new and much larger coins which I propose to have created. It is equally true of both, if they find their way, by international commerce, into foreign countries, that they would be expressed in accounts, or actually converted by recoinage, into such weights, denominations and technical finenesses, as may be customary and legal in said countries. And so long as every nation or government, whether powerful or weak, important or insignificant, shall arbitrarily and capriciously vary, adopt, and fix for its own use and purposes, peculiar standards of weight, measure and value, will commerce have to tolerate, as it now does, in international exchanges and accounts, for all commodities and coins whatever, that complexity and variety of terms which you have adduced, as if it would belong only, and were a valid objection to such large coins as are provided for in the bill—an objection which, if it prove what you design, must also prove that all foreign commerce should cease, and which, therefore, is nugatory and absurd. Meanwhile, the Spanish-American dollar, wisely adopted by our country, will continue to be, as it has long been, the commercial unit of value of the world. And if the gold of California should take the place, even but in part, of the silver of Spanish America, large coins or ingots of definite denominations, in dollars, will circulate familiarly throughout the length and breadth of our land, and coextensively with our commerce and that of other nations over the globe.

You profess to be unable to see why ingots should not be of any weight, any fineness, any value whatever. Excuse me, then, for asking you why the gold coins at present struck at the Mint, may not also be of any weight, any fineness, any value whatever? Why might not each be only a piece of weighed and assayed, though crude metal,—protected against mutilation only by "the peculiar exterior aspect of a gold casting,"—stamped "with the words, MINT OF THE UNITED STATES," and "such further stamp as shall indicate the registered number and date, the fineness in thousandths, the weight in troy ounces, and the decimal parts of an ounce and the net Mint value in dollars and cents," the silver dollar being the standard unit, "accompanied with a memorandum from the treasurer of the Mint, or branch Mint, stating the particulars in respect to the deposit," and unprotected against counterfeiting, either by skillful workmanship or by penal statutes? If the paper memorandum should be lost or destroyed, as all of them sooner or later would be, coins of gold would still be precious metal, and they might be carried back to the Mint, at considerable expense and inconvenience, for reissue of memorandum or refabrication. There would no longer be decimal denominations, or round sums; and we would possess a coinage system of such plasticity and generality, that it might be suited to any caprice of circumstance or individual fancy; and their "net Mint values" would also fluctuate with every change in the rates of charges to depositors at the Mint.

With reference to the "unlimited amount of time and money" which you appear to think would be necessary to prevent the "impossibility" of coining the whole surface of a large six sided ingot, permit me say, that you will find it difficult to persuade either myself or others, that any great mechanical trouble or expense is to be apprehended in the execution of such work. You will, I presume, scarcely venture to assert that it will be more costly and laborious to adjust and impress one single coin of ten thousand dollars, than a thousand pieces of ten dollars each, or ten thousand pieces of one dollar each. And, certainly, you have not found it more convenient, expeditious, and economical to convert a large amount of gold into little dollar pieces, than to manufacture the same into double eagles.

Concerning the limits of deviation in fineness and weight which you pronounce to be "quite unattainable in business operations," to wit: the half of a thousandth part in fineness, and two hundred thousandth parts in weight, I certainly cannot be mistaken in the information I have received. I have learned that the alloying and assaying of gold may be, and that it is, performed with almost mathematical exactness: that the gold coins of the British Mint are of the uniform average fineness of 915.5 thousandths, and that at this rate you have been in the habit of receiving them at the Mint, and of paying for them without previously assaying each parcel of them: that the gold coins of France, Italy, and Holland are uniformly of the fineness of eight hundred and ninety-nine thousandths, and so received hitherto by you without assaying each lot: that the average quality of our own gold coins struck at the Philadelphia Mint of late years, scarcely varies appreciably from nine hundred thousandths, the legal standard. Also, that in the coördinate operations of the melting and assaying departments of the Mint, the usual variations from the exact standard do not exceed the limits of 899.8 thousandths, and 900.2 thousandths, within which limits errors of workmanship are ordinarily confined: that the limits of 899.5 thousandths, and 900.5 thousandths are rarely attained: that the Mint practice is to condemn any ingot as unfit for coinage, of which the deviation from the standard fineness considerably transcends either of these limits. If this be so, and the assayer of the Mint can testify whether it is or not, I can see no reason why the deviation in fineness of two thousandths, which you propose in your substitute for the bill, should ever be allowed by law; on the contrary, I can see strong reasons why it should not be done. A dishonest melter and refiner, through the connivance of a faithless, or the indifference of an incompetent assayer, might avail himself fraudulently of such loose legislation to commit with impunity the crime of embezzlement. It may, perhaps, be that the limits of 899.5 thousandths and 900.5 thousandths are too stringent for any but experienced and the most skillful officers. If this be so in the judgment of the chemical officers of the Mint, and you inform me thereof, I will willingly extend the legally allowed deviation, from the half to one thousandth part, so as sufficiently to protect honest though inexperienced Mint officers; but no greater allowance than one thousandth should be made, for the Government has the right to command not only fidelity but skill in the performance of such responsible duties.

Of the limits of deviation in weight for the large gold coins or ingots, to wit: two one hundred thousandth parts thereof, permit me to remark, that if it be true that the balances and weights constructed for the several States, and for the Mints of Philadelphia and New Orleans, at the office of Weights and Measures in Washington, under the present able Superintendent, and under the immediate direction of that accomplished machinist who is intrusted with the execution of the work upon them, as well as those made in the Mint at Philadelphia, either formerly under the charge of said machinist, or more recently of that of the coiner, be as perfect as they are said to be, there can be, and is, no difficulty in promptly weighing to its one hundred thousandth part any ingot of gold not exceeding in value the sum of $10,000. Is it not true that upon the balances in the office of the Treasurer of the Mint more than a thousand ounces of gold have been correctly weighed to the one hundredth of the ounce, the smallest weight used for the purpose, and the half of the one hundred thousandth of the entire load upon the balance? How, then, can it be unattainable to adjust the weight of large ingots within limits twice as wide as those adopted for weighing gold in the ordinary transactions of the Mints at Philadelphia and New Orleans? As however, such balances and weights may justly be considered masterpieces of workmanship, and can be properly used only by skillful and careful persons, whose services may not always be readily attainable, as the carelessness of a workman, in the hurry of heavy operations, might unjustly bring upon the responsible officers disgrace, or even the punishment prescribed by penal statutes, if the legal limits be too stringent, and said officer be not incessantly vigilant, as accidental injury or destruction might befall the balances, and render it necessary temporarily to employ others of inferior character; and as the branch Mints probably are not now and may not hereafter be provided fully with such instruments, it may be expedient or necessary, and I see no great objection, to extend the limit of deviation in weight, to be allowed by law for large gold coins or ingots to the one ten thousandth part. But Mint allowances designed by law properly to protect the working officers, by tasking them to the performance only of possibilities, should not be so loose as to exempt them from the proper exercise of skill and fidelity, or to tempt them, if dishonest, to the perpetration of crime. In avoiding one extreme, it were wise not to pass to the other.

With the above allowed deviations of one half of one thousandth in fineness, and one ten thousandth in weight, the variation in intrinsic value of the ingot of ten thousand dollars, could never differ legally more than six dollars from its nominal value; there never, therefore, would be, as you seem to think probable, a true and "irreconcilable variance of ten or twenty dollars in an ingot of ten thousand" between two determinations made independently, and with equal skill and integrity.

It should be borne in mind, that it is the effect of small unintentional errors of workmanship, occurring as often above as below the legal standards of weight and fineness, to compensate each other, and to render large quantities of coin of different issues strictly in conformity with said standards; and this compensation of errors, existing in fact, may even have been contemplated in previous legislation. In large ingots, or coins, the advantage of great numbers of pieces to compensate errors, is lost; and the skill of the officers should therefore be tasked to the utmost, to secure a just and rigid conformity in their average to the legal standards.

In conclusion, permit me to say of your expressed "trust that the experience of the Mint in such a matter will be regarded as important," that in whatever respect the business transactions, or the metallurgic and mechanical details of the ordinary coining operations of the Mint may have given it experience, it is both just and wise to attach particular importance thereto. But in such a matter as this, of coining large ingots, entirely new and untried, commercially and technically, no one can claim experience as the basis of opinions entertained. The present is an age of novelty and improvement, and our country is one of vast, rapid, and unexampled developments and progress. The electric telegraph is giving to thought ubiquity, and the steamship and locomotive are annihilating distances, so that those who aspire to lead, should not only be well acquainted with the past, but alive to the present, and thoughtful of the future.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. M. GWIN.

To the Director of the United States Mint.

A BILL to facilitate commerce, by authorizing the manufacture or coinage of large rectangular gold coins or ingots of the United States, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That gold bullion brought to the Mint of the United States, or either of its branches, or assay offices, and not intended for ordinary coinage in small pieces, may and shall hereafter be received, for the benefit of the depositor, to be melted, assayed, or refined, and cast into large rectangular coins or ingots of the United States, of the respective values of one hundred, two hundred and fifty, or five hundred dollars, or of the respective values of one, five, or ten thousand dollars each.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the standard fineness of the said rectangular gold coins or ingots of the United States shall be such that of one thousand parts by weight, nine hundred and eighty shall be of pure gold, and twenty parts of alloy, which alloy shall be of copper, or silver and copper mixed in any proportion.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the respective weights of the rectangular gold coins or ingots of the United States shall be such that they shall each contain the same quantity of pure gold that is now required by law to be contained in small gold coins of the legal standard of the United States, and of equal amount in value.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That upon the rectangular gold coins or ingots of the United States there shall be stamped upon one side or face of each of said rectangular coins or ingots, the year, weight, and fineness, with an impression emblematic of liberty, and an inscription of the word "liberty," also some discriminating mark to designate the particular assayer by whom it was assayed, and the place where it was issued; and upon the other side there shall be stamped the denomination or value, with the figure or representation of an eagle, and the inscription, "United States of America;" and that the portion of each and every of the six surfaces, or faces, of said rectangular gold coins or ingots, which shall not be unimpressed as aforesaid, shall be covered with skillfully-devised tracery of grooved lines.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all the dies that shall be used to stamp rectangular gold coins or ingots of the United States shall be prepared and registered by the engraver of the Mint of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the rectangular gold coins or ingots of the United States to be thus prepared, shall be assayed by the assayer; and if they prove to be within the limits allowed for deviation from the standard fineness, he shall return them, with a certificate, to the melter and refiner to be delivered to the treasurer.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That every rectangular gold ingot shall be condemned by the assayer of which the fineness differs more than the half of one thousandth from the legal standard.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That when the coiner shall have adjusted the weight of the ingots, the assayer shall weigh them, and if they prove to be within the limits allowed for deviation from the standard weight, the assayer shall stamp each with his discriminating mark, and the coiner shall deliver them to the treasurer.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the treasurer shall deliver to the coiner the gold ingots received from the melter and refiner; and it shall be the duty of the coiner to take and stamp or strike upon each of them, the year, weight, fineness, legend, device, and tracery, with its denomination or value in conspicuous characters, before he shall deliver it to the treasurer. And at the assay offices this duty of stamping or striking upon the rectangular gold coins or ingots their proper years, weights, finenesses, legends, devices, tracery, and values shall be performed by the melter and refiner before he shall deliver the same to the treasurer. And in the settlement of the respective accounts of the melter and refiner and of the coiner with the treasurer, they shall each be allowed a credit for such necessary waste of gold bullion delivered to them to be manufactured into rectangular gold coins or ingots as shall have actually occurred in the operations employed for that purpose: Provided, That this allowance shall not exceed one thousandth part of the amount of gold bullion so delivered to each of those officers.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That in adjusting the respective weights of the rectangular gold coins or ingots of the United States, no ingot shall differ more than one ten thousandth part in weight from its legal standard.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That for rectangular gold coins or ingots of the United States, the only subjects of charge to the depositor shall be the following: For refining when the bullion is below standard; for toughening when metals are contained in it which render it brittle or unfit for coinage; and for separating the gold and silver when these metals exist together in the bullion: and that the rate of these charges shall be fixed, from time to time, by the director of the Mint and the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be the same as the rate of charges, for the same operations, performed upon bullion deposited in the Mint and its branches for coinage into small gold coins.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That no charge shall hereafter be made to the depositor of gold bullion for copper used for alloy of gold coins or ingots.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the Treasurer of the United States, the Assistant Treasurers of the United States, the Treasurers of the Mint, its branches, and assay offices, and the designated depositories of the Treasury, may at any time receive rectangular gold coins or ingots of the United States in exchange for small gold or silver coins of the United States. And it shall be lawful for the Mint of the United States and its branches, to convert rectangular gold coins or ingots of the United States into small coins, but the same shall be delivered to the melter and refiner as bullion, by weight and actual assay.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That for all sums whatever, rectangular gold coins or ingots of the United States, made in pursuance of the provisions of this act, shall be legal tenders of payment, according to the nominal value.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That to secure a due conformity in the rectangular gold coins or ingots of the United States to their respective standards of weight and fineness, specimens thereof shall be selected, transmitted to the Director of the Mint, and examined before the commissioners of assay, who shall meet annually at the Mint, in the manner and in pursuance of the regulations prescribed by sections twenty-seven and thirty-two of the act supplementary to the act establishing a Mint and regulating the coins of the United States, approved January eighteen, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven. And the better to secure the said conformity, it shall be the duty of the Director of the Mint, from time to time, to take indiscriminately from the circulation of the country, rectangular gold coins or ingots of the United States, and cause such examination thereof to be made as he may consider fit and requisite.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That if any of the rectangular gold coins or ingots of the United States which shall be made at the Mint, or at either of its branches or assay offices, shall be debased, or made worse as to the proportion of pure gold that ought to be therein contained; or shall be of less weight or value than the same ought to be pursuant to this act, through the default or with the connivance of one or more of the officers or persons who shall be employed at the Mint, or at either of its branches or assay offices, with the purpose of profit or gain, or otherwise with a fraudulent intent; every such officer or person, who shall commit any or either of said offenses, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and on conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment at hard labor for not exceeding ten years, and by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, according to the aggravation of the offense.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons who shall be employed in the Mint of the United States or in either of its branches or assay offices, shall fraudulently take, embezzle, steal, or carry away any bullion deposited therein, or any ingots made or deposited therein, or which shall have come into his possession or custody, by virtue of such employment, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of felony; and on conviction thereof, he shall be punished by imprisonment at hard labor for not exceeding ten years, and by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, according to the aggravation of the offense.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall fraudulently, and for gain sake, by any art, way, or means whatsoever, impair, diminish, falsify, scale, or lighten any rectangular gold coin or ingot of the United States, which has been made, or may hereafter be made, at the Mint of the United States, or at either of its branches or assay offices, or shall cause or procure either of said acts to be done, or shall willingly aid or assist in doing, or in causing or procuring to be done, either of said acts, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of felony, and on conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment at hard labor for not exceeding ten years, and by a fine not exceeding $10,000, according to the aggravation of the offense.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall falsely make, forge, or counterfeit; or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited; or willingly aid or assist in falsely making, forging, or counterfeiting any coin or ingot in the resemblance or similitude of the rectangular gold coin or ingot which has been, or may hereafter be made, at the Mint of the United States, or at either of its branches or assay offices; or shall pass, utter, publish, or sell, or shall bring into the United States from any foreign place, with the intent to pass, utter, publish or sell, as true, any such false, forged, or counterfeit coin or ingot, knowing the same to be false, forged, or counterfeit, with intent to defraud any body politic or corporate, or any person or persons whatever; every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of felony, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by imprisonment at hard labor for not exceeding ten years, and by a fine not exceeding $10,000, according to the aggravation of the offense; Provided always, That it shall be lawful for any person to make ingots of gold or silver, or of gold and silver, and to certify, by durable impression thereon, the true weight and value of the gold or silver, or of the gold and silver, contained in each ingot, with some private legend and device, and with his proper name, after he shall have delivered a copy of such legend, device, and name, to the director of the Mint, or to the superintendent of either of its branches, or to the treasurer of one of its assay offices, who shall record the same, together with his place of business and residence, or cause it to be done in books to be kept for such purpose in the Mint, and in each of its branches and assay offices.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to deprive the courts of individual States, of jurisdiction, under the laws of the several States, over offenses made punishable by this act.

A BILL to establish Assay Offices of the Mint of the United States at Stockton and Sacramento City, in California, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That offices of the Mint of the United States shall be established at Stockton and at Sacramento City, in California, for the purpose of assaying and refining gold bullion not intended for coinage, and of casting the same into ingots or bars of fine gold, or into bars of gold and silver.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of purchasing sites, erecting suitable buildings, and completing the necessary combinations of machinery for the aforesaid assay offices, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars is hereby appropriated.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That temporary buildings shall be procured or erected immediately, for carrying on the business of the aforesaid offices, and that the following officers shall be appointed, upon the nomination of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to wit: one treasurer, one assayer, and one melter and refiner. And the said treasurer shall engage and employ as many clerks and subordinate workmen and servants as shall be provided for by law. And the salaries of said officers and clerks shall be as follows: to the treasurer, the sum of five thousand dollars; to the assayer and to the melter and refiner, the sum of four thousand dollars each; to the clerks, the sum of three thousand dollars each; and to the subordinate workmen and servants, not exceeding fifteen in each office, such wages and allowances as are customary and reasonable according to their respective stations and occupations.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That said offices shall be depositories for such public moneys as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct to be deposited therein; and the treasurers of said offices shall have the custody of the same, and shall perform the duties of assistant treasurers, and for that purpose shall be subject to all the provisions contained in the act entitled "An act to provide for the better organization of the Treasury, and for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue," approved August sixth, eighteen hundred and forty-six, which relate to the treasurer of the branch Mint at New Orleans.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the officers and clerks to be appointed under this act shall, before entering upon the duties of their offices, take an oath or affirmation before some judge of the United States, or judge of the superior court of any court of record of any State, faithfully and diligently to perform said duties; and they shall each become bound to the United States of America, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the Director of the Mint and the Secretary of the Treasury, with condition for the faithful and diligent performance of the duties of their offices.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the general direction of the business of the said assay offices of the Mint of the United States, shall be under the control and regulation of the Director of the Mint, subject to the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury; and for that purpose, it shall be the duty of the said Director, to prescribe such regulations, and require such returns, periodically and occasionally, as shall appear to him to be necessary, for the purpose of carrying into effect the intention of this act, in establishing the said assay offices; also, for the purpose of discriminating the bars or ingots which shall be stamped at each office; also, for the purpose of preserving accuracy of weight and fineness in the bars stamped at each place; and to require the transmission and delivery to him at the Mint, from time to time, such bars or ingots of each office as he shall think proper to be subjected to such assays and tests as he shall direct.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That all the laws and parts of laws made for the regulation of the Mint of the United States, and for the government of the officers and persons employed therein, and for the punishment of all offenses committed by persons connected with the Mint shall be, and the same are hereby, declared to be in full force, in relation to each of the assay offices by this act established, so far as the same shall be applicable thereto.

KEY WEST AND TORTUGAS.

SPEECH OF HON. E. C. CABELL,

OF FLORIDA,

On the subject of fortifying Key West and Tortugas: prepared from notes of remarks made by him in the House of Representatives, December 21, 1852.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the resolutions to refer the annual message of the President of the United States, Mr. CABELL, of Florida, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom has been referred so much of the President's message as relates to fortifications, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating the amount necessary to complete the fortifications at Key West and Tortugas, known as Fort Jefferson and Fort Taylor.

Which being read, Mr. CABELL said:

The proposition I submit for the consideration of the committee does not involve the question of the merits or demerits of that "magnificent," and which in reference to the advanced stage of military science, nautical skill, and steam power, has been styled that "absurd system of coast defense," about which so much has been written and spoken, and which was so decidedly condemned by the present House of Representatives at its last session. I acquiesce, to some extent, in the propriety of some of the denunciations of certain "wild and extravagant schemes," which have, in times past, been recommended by high official authority. The language used by an able writer on this subject, that "these schemes are Utopian in the extreme, and fit only to be discussed by the inmates of a mad house," is not perhaps too strong in reference to some of them. I will not, however, discuss this topic at this time.

But whatever objection may be made to the subject of fortifications generally, or to any particular system, I think that the public mind is satisfied that there is great propriety in fortifying the points to which I have called the attention of the committee—Key West and Tortugas. Every consideration of national policy demands that the construction of the works, commenced more than five years ago, at these points, should be continued and prosecuted to completion as soon as possible.

I speak not now as the representative of Florida, for this is a matter in which my own State has comparatively less direct interest than even New York and Massachusetts. It is a question deeply affecting the trade, commerce, and navigation of every section of the United States, and indeed of the world. But these important points are in the State I have the honor to represent, and it is perhaps most appropriately my duty to urge upon Congress the necessity of taking prompt measures with reference to them. Their importance and the interests involved in their complete fortification, cannot be too highly estimated. They are the keys to the Gulf of Mexico, to the West Indies and the Caribbean sea. Being in the direct line of navigation, the entire Gulf commerce must pass near and in sight of them. A large portion of the export and import trade of Georgia, the whole trade of Alabama and the other Gulf States, and of the valley of the Mississippi, of Mexico, of the Caribbean sea, and of the eastern coast of South America, as far down as La Plata, including the rich and almost unexplored country watered by the Amazon, "the King of Rivers," navigable for three thousand miles, and its tributaries, said to be capable of sustaining a population of two hundred millions, must pass through the Florida Straits.

In a late publication I stated that "property of upwards of $200,000,000 in value, it is estimated, annually passes along a large portion of the Florida coast."

In making this estimate I was controlled by an estimate of the Treasury Department, made in a communication to the Senate at last session, (Sen. Doc. No. —, in relation to the Florida Ship Canal,) in which the value of the merchandise, annually shipped to and from the Gulf ports, was put down at $250,000,000. Though I believed then it was an under estimate, I deducted $50,000,000 from it, to avoid any charge of extravagance, which I had heard made against the Treasury estimate. Since then I have investigated this matter with care, and am now fully convinced that the value of our Gulf trade, commerce and navigation, was underrated perhaps one half of its true value. And since the Treasury report I have cited was made, the subject has undergone further and fuller investigation by Mr. Hodge, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and I have seen a letter addressed by him, some weeks ago, to Mr. Andrews, correcting his former report, and estimating our Gulf trade, commerce and navigation, as amounting annually to $325,000,000. This is of the Gulf ports of the United States only. All this must pass, wheresoever bound, within sight of Tortugas and Key West. In this estimate the $60,000,000 of gold annually received from California, by the Chagres and Nicaragua steamers, the value of the other property or merchandise carried both ways by these steamers, the value of the tonnage in that trade; our Cuba trade and tonnage, worth more than $30,000,000 annually; our trade and tonnage with other West Indies and with Honduras, amounting annually to at least $25,000,000 more; our annual trade and tonnage with Brazil, worth more than $20,000,000 more; and our trade and tonnage with all the eastern coast of South America, down to La Plata, are not included. Most of this trade, particularly on the homeward voyage, passes through the Florida Straits, and near to Tortugas and Key West. Considering all this trade, commerce and navigation, and estimating the tonnage at $50 per ton, (instead of $75, as stated by Mr. Hodge, which is perhaps too high an estimate for a series of years, though it may be reasonable at this time,) I hesitate not to say that the value of American "property," annually passing through these straits, instead of being but $200,000,000, actually exceeds $400,000,000. In this estimate none of the British, French, Dutch, Spanish, Mexican, or other foreign "commerce or navigation" passing through these straits is included. It amounts annually to at least $125,000,000. My information on this subject has been collected with very great care; I feel assured of the correctness of my statements, but will be happy to rectify them if shown to be erroneous.

Where, I ask, Mr. Chairman, is there on the face of the globe a position belonging to any country so important for the defense of that country, and for attack upon the commerce of an enemy, and for the protection of its commercial and navigating interests to such an immense amount, as these facts show Key West and Tortugas to be to the United States?

My estimates are in round numbers. No official returns of our coasting trade are received at the Treasury. Estimates of it, therefore, can only be approximated, and are to be gathered and compiled from statistics otherwise obtained. Our census returns of products and manufactures of the different States, and the statements in commercial magazines and newspapers prepared by the chambers of commerce, or other reliable local authorities of the different cities and ports, furnish the chief data.

The value of our exports of raw cotton alone to foreign countries for the year ending 30th of June, 1851, was $112,315,317, more than two thirds of which was from the Gulf ports; to which should be added 405,108 bales consumed in this country, out of a crop of 2,355,257 bales. The whole cotton crop of the United States for the year ending September 1, 1852, was 3,015,029 bales, of which 603,029 bales were consumed in this country. The entire crop of the world for the same period is estimated at 3,448,000. The States of Texas, Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Florida, and part of Georgia, produced and shipped through the Gulf ports 2,175,464 bales, or 165,445 bales more than two thirds of the entire crop of the United States for the year ending September 1, 1852. Estimating the bales to average 450 pounds, the crop amounts to 978,958,800 pounds, which, at the average price of nine cents per pound, makes the value of the cotton crop alone from the States I have named $88,206,292; the whole of which, whether shipped to foreign ports or to the Atlantic cities, must pass through the Straits of Florida. Most of the merchandise, foreign or domestic, purchased with the proceeds of the sale of this crop goes back to the States which produced it by the same channel, and its value is generally quite equal to that of the cotton. So also is it with respect to the sugar, tobacco, hemp, lumber, rice, naval stores, and all the products of the same regions, and of other western and northwestern States, and the immense shipments, foreign and coastwise, of breadstuffs, pork, bacon, lard, beef, tallow, and other products of the whole Mississippi valley made through New Orleans, and the return merchandise, &c.; to which should be added the tonnage engaged in this immense trade, both outward and inward bound.* Examination and reflection, and a proper consideration of these matters, will not only verify my estimate, but will satisfy every one how vitally all the States and regions of country I have mentioned are interested in the measure I now propose.

The construction of a ship-canal or railroad across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, or the completion of similar works elsewhere, at Nicaragua, at Panama, or Atrato, will secure much of the trade of China, of the East Indies, and the Asiatic seas generally, and of the Pacific ocean. An inter-oceanic railroad communication at Tehuantepec would probably, in a few years, double the value of the Gulf trade, and a ship-canal, through which would pass all the vessels engaged in the whale fisheries, and most of those owned in this country and in Europe, trading in the Pacific ocean and Asiatic seas, would more than quadruple the value of the present trade, commerce and navigation passing through the Florida Straits. To what extent this value will be increased, when time and Anglo Saxon energy shall have developed the resources of the "Great West," and of that magnificent region embraced in the vast "Amazonian basin," the imagination can scarcely conceive.

All this commerce and navigation will be "at the mercy" of any strong naval power in possession of Key West and Tortugas.

The attention of Congress has been repeatedly called to the importance of fortifying the places to which I have made reference: first by Mr. Monroe, who was President at the time of the acquisition of Florida, and since his time by most of the Presidents, Secretaries of War, and engineers who have examined the subject.

In my investigations I have been greatly aided by reference to a highly valuable document, communicated by the Treasury Department to Congress at the last session, respecting the trade, commerce, and navigation of the United States, which was prepared by J. D. Andrews, Esq., the intelligent and able United States Consul for St. John's, New Brunswick. It is now being printed by order of both Houses, and is, in my judgment, one of the most important reports ever laid before Congress. I have been allowed to make reference to, and extracts from some of the proof sheets, which, at my request, were politely furnished to me. An appendix to that report contains an important paper, prepared, as I learn, principally from data and notes furnished by one of the most intelligent engineer officers in the service, relating to the Gulf of Mexico and Straits of Florida. This document (Ex. Doc. H. No. 136, 1st sess. 32d Cong.) will soon be laid on our tables, and I solicit members to read the paper I refer to attentively.

In the American State Papers, volume entitled Naval Affairs, page 871, there is a message of President Monroe, January 20, 1823, communicating a report from Smith Thompson, Secretary of the Navy, in which he says, speaking of Key West:

"From the report of Lieutenant Commandant Perry, [now Commodore M. C. Perry,] who was charged with this duty, it has been satisfactorily ascertained that this position affords a safe, convenient, and extensive harbor for vessels of war and merchant vessels." * * * * *

"There can be no doubt, however, of the importance of this Island, and its contiguous waters in various points of view. The harbor affords a safe and convenient rendezvous for our public vessels, cruising in the West Indies and the Gulf of Mexico; and the Island a very suitable depôt for provisions and supplies. From the peculiar dangers of the navigation along the coast, and among the Florida keys, our merchant vessels are frequently driven by distress to seek a harbor; and for want of one in our own waters, are under the necessity of making a port in the Island of Cuba, which subjects them to considerable additional expense. This Isl and [Key West] also affords a very eligible depôt for wrecked property, and which is highly necessary and advantageous where the navigation is attended with so many dangers and difficulties. We are at this time, in a great measure, dependent on the wreckers of New Providence [in the Bahamas] for the protection of property in case of shipwreck. This not only gives employment to a great number of foreign vessels and seamen, but it subjects our m rchants to heavy expenses. These are some of the obvious benefits of this position in time of peace; but its advantages in time of war with any Enropean Power having West India possessions, are still more important both as it respects the protection of our own commerce and the annoyance of our enemy. An enemy with a superior naval force occupying this position could completely intercept the whole trade between those parts of our country lying north and east of it, and those to the west, and seal up all our ports within the Gulf of Mexico," &c.

The late Commodore Rodgers, in an official letter, written November 24th, 1823, (ibid., p. 1121,) says of Key West:

"As an auxiliary to an extensive and permanent southern naval depôt, (perhaps at Pensacola;) such as a proper security for our commerce, and the permanent union of the States seem to render indispensable; it will be found, I am inclined to believe, that the Island in question will soon become an object worthy of the serious attention and consideration of the Government. Nature has made it the advance post from which to watch and guard our commerce passing to and from the Mississippi; while at the same time its peculiar situation, and the excellence of its harbor, point it out as the most certain key to the commerce of the Havana, to that of the Gulf of Mexico, and to the returning trade of Jamaica, and I venture to predict that the first important naval contest in which this country shall be engaged, will be in the neighborhood of this very Island," &c.

The late Commodore David Porter, it is well known, repeatedly expressed his opinion that Key West and Tortugas were the most important points in the Gulf, and he unhesitatingly avowed, on all occasions, his decided preference for Key West as a naval station. Before he left our service, and while in command of "the Mosquito fleet" against the Cuban pirates, he rendezvoused at Key West; and after he became Commander-in-Chief of the Mexican Navy, he adopted the same course. In the "Appendix" referred to, it is stated that he effectually blockaded Havana and Matanzas, though protected by the Spanish Admiral Laborde with a superior force.

Indeed, Key West and Tortugas are so situated as to command the Havana and Matanzas as effectually as they do the trade of the Gulf passing through the straits between the Island of Cuba and the Florida Keys. And they have an advantage over the Havana in two respects: The first is, that the very narrow entrance, and the eddies and rapid currents of the straits, sweeping along the rock-bound Cuban shore, render it difficult, and frequently impossible, to enter that port, if the wind is at all unfavorable; whereas no harbors perhaps in the world are more easy of approach and entrance than Key West and Tortugas. But the most important difference and advantage is, that it is impossible, except with a greatly superior force, to blockade either of these Keys, each having more than one pass to the Straits and the Gulf.

In December, 1851, Secretary Conrad, in obedience to a call from Congress, made a communication to this House, on the subject of fortifications, replete with valuable information. On page 9, (Ex. Doc., No. 5, 1st sess. 32d Cong.,) he says:

"The two remaining works now in course of construction, are those on Key West and the Tortugas. In relation to these there can be but one opinion. These islands, situated directly in the narrow channel between the southern extremity of Florida and the Island of Cuba, may be said to command the northern gateway of the Gulf, as Jamaica does its southern. The latter is in possession of the only nation from whose naval power the United States have anything to apprehend. Were these Islands, with their fine harbors, also to fall into her hands, they would enable her to cut off all communication between our naval forces on the Gulf and those on the Atlantic, to obtain complete control over the Gulf, and block up the vast and increasing commerce of which it is the theater. A railroad across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, (the existence of which, at no distant period, can hardly be doubted,) would impart additional importance to the Gulf, as it would then become the main channel of communication between the Atlantic and the Pacific; and recent events admonish us that our progress in that quarter is watched with jealousy by more than one of the great Powers of Europe.

"I am, therefore, decidedly of opinion, not only that these two works should not be abandoned, but that they should be completed as soon as practicable."

General Totten, in his report, (ibid., p. 52,) says:

"A naval force designed to control the navigation of the Gulf, could desire no better position than Key West or the Tortugas. Upon the very way-side of the only path through the Gulf, it is at the same time well situated as to all the great points therein. It overlooks Havana, Pensacola, Mobile, the mouths of the Mississippi, and both the inlet and outlet of the Gulf.

"The Tortugas harbor and that of Key West affords perfect shelter for vessels of every class, with the greatest facility of ingress and egress. And there can be no doubt that an adversary in possession of large naval means, would, with great advantage, make them his habitual resort and his point of general rendezvous and concentration for all operations on this sea. With an enemy thus posted, the navigation of the Gulf by us would be eminently hazardous, if not impossible, and nothing but absolute naval superiority would avail anything against him. Mere military means could approach no nearer than the nearest shore of the continent. There are no harbors in the Gulf at all comparable with these, that an enemy could resort to with his large vessels. To deprive him of these would, therefore, be interfering materially with any organized system of naval operations in this sea. The defense of these harbors would, however, do much more than this. It would secure to our own squadron, even should it be inferior, the use of these most valuable positions, and would afford a point of refuge to our Navy and our commerce at the very spot where it would be most necessary and useful.

"I forbear to enlarge on this point, merely adding that certain and complete defense will be easily secured, and that we shall thereby possess ports of refuge in the middle of the Gulf whenever we have to fly, and points of rendezvous and refreshment in the very midst of all passing vessels whenever we hold the mastery. Every vessel that crosses the Gulf of Mexico passes within sight of the two forts commenced under the sanction of Congress and now in progress—one at Tortugas, and one at Key West."

Lieutenant Maury, of the Navy, one of the most intelligent and scientific officers in the service—whose liberal and enlarged views show that he keeps pace with the improvements of the age—who, with nothing of old fogyism in his composition, is a man of wise and prudent progress—who has condemned in language stronger, perhaps, than has been used on this floor, that "system of fortifications" which found so little favor in this House, and whose recommendations are, therefore, entitled to credit with those who are not opposed to all works of defense—says at page 166, same document:

"The only fortifications that are wanted along our Atlantic sea-board, except those at Key West and the Tortugas, at Ship Island, and at one or two more such places, are those which will protect our cities and towns from the broadsides of men-of-war.

"The forts already completed, or well advanced towards completion, are believed to be sufficient for this. They should, however, be mounted with heavier ordnance, and pieces of the most effective caliber for throwing explosive shot and shells."

The entire report of Lieutenant Maury possesses great interest, is full of useful information, and will amply repay perusal and study. From p. 179 to 184 inclusive, he treats of the defenses of the Gulf of Mexico, and proves in a masterly manner, that the measure I propose is not only important, and one that concerns the whole country, but that it is essentially necessary to protect the Commerce of the Gulf. So cogent and conclusive is his reasoning, and so valuable his suggestions, that I feel I would do injustice to the cause I advocate, were I not to ask special attention to them.

Beginning at page 180, he says:

"The plan, therefore, of providing permanent fortifications for the Gulf, seems to be this: that we should select a few of the points which would be most important for us as places of refuge and rendezvous, and which, if occupied by an enemy in war, would enable him the most to annoy us, and fortify them.

"These points are Key West and the Tortugas, and perhaps Ship and Cat Islands. In a commercial and military sense, the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean sea are but an expansion of the Mississippi and Amazon rivers. In this view of the subject, the mouth of the Mississippi is not

*Colonel Abert, Chief of Topographical Engineers, in a report to the Senate of the United States, estimates the trade of the Mississippi alone for the year 1850 at $274,000,000, and for the year 1860 at $494,000,000. A portion of it passes inland, by railroads and canals, to and from the Atlantic seaports.

at the Balize, nor that of the Amazon at Para. They are both in the Florida pass, between Key West and Cuba.

"For one half the year there is a sort of monsoon in the Gulf of Mexico; during this period the winds are from the southeast; at this season, therefore, the winds and the currents in the Yucatan pass are such as to prevent the passage that way of vessels from the Gulf.

"Moreover, the Island of Jamaica, where the English have a naval station, overlooks the Yucatan pass. When the northeast winds prevail, the Yucatan pass is open to sailing vessels; but a few steamers, with Jamaica as the center of operations, would close it to our commerce.

"When the southeast winds prevail, the route of a sailing vessel bound from the Gulf to Jamaica, is not through the straits of Yucatan; it is through the Florida pass by Key West, and then back on the south side of Cuba. Now a maritime enemy seizing upon Key West and the Tortugas, could land a few heavy guns from his ship, and make it difficult for us to dislodge him. Here, railroads and the telegraph do not reach, and as long as he should hold that position, so long would he control the commercial mouth of the great Mississippi valley.

"In that position he would shut up in the Gulf whatever force inferior to his own we might have there. He would prevent reinforcements sent to relieve it from Boston, New York and Norfolk, from entering the Gulf. Indeed, in a war with England, the Tortugas and Key West being in her possession, it might be more advisable, instead of sending from our Atlantic dock-yards a fleet to the Gulf, to send it over to the British islands, and sound the Irish people as to throwing off the yoke of allegiance."

* * * * * * *

"In an expedition upon Jamaica, Key West being in the hands of the enemy, it would be difficult for our Gulf and Atlantic forces to unite.

"Therefore the works at Key West and the Tortugas should be provided with shell guns of the most destructive caliber, and their walls should be substantial enough to resist the concussion of a man-of-war broadside. They are wanted to give protection to our fleeing merchantmen, to afford a refuge to our fleets until time and opportunity and circumstances serve for striking the blow, or making a move. They are wanted by us, because they would be so immensely valuable to an enemy.

"The railroads that will be in operation from Pensacola and Mobile soon, and probably before any additional fortifications can be erected there, will secure these places from invasion, and seizure; and the works already there, with a few more guns in open battery along the beach, would effectually protect them from the great guns of ships. Still, an enemy with a fleet superior to the one we might have in the Gulf, could anchor along the shore, as he can in the Chesapeake, and greatly harass our commerce there. No system of fortifications can prevent that.

"In the next maritime war, (and in such a war we have nothing to fear from any quarter except one,) it is not upon the Atlantic, properly speaking, that the great sea fight is to take place; it is in the Gulf of Mexico, or near the English shores.

"Jamaica is an important naval station; it commands one entrance to the Gulf. There Great Britain can assemble her fleet, and within three days have it off the Balize, in position to strike a terrible blow at the commerce of that valley. Shutting up the Florida pass, she would have complete control of the Gulf. Norfolk and New York are inconveniently situated to defend it. Some years ago a man-of-war was sent with dispatches from Norfolk to Pensacola; she was fifty-odd days in making the passage."

"We have turned the corner, and are now going ahead in the peaceful race for the commercial supremacy of the seas; the next trial is to be for maritime supremacy of another sort. It is hoped that the day for that contest is far distant. But every people are liable to war; and it is a fact which we cannot blink, that in providing for the contingency, our statesmen and warriors must, for many years to come, have an eye to the forces which Great Britain, rather than any other Power, can bring against us. But let that contest come when it may, it is most likely to be decided in the Gulf of Mexico, and its twin basin, the Caribbean sea; they are the receptacles of all that the two grandest systems of river basins in the world will have to pour into the lap of commerce. The valley of the Mississippi on one side, and the valley of the Amazon on the other, will in time make these two arms of the sea the commercial center of the world.

"The mouth of the Amazon, the mouth of the Orinoco, and the mouth of the Magdalena, are, commercially speaking, almost as much in the Florida pass as is the mouth of the Mississippi river. Such is the course of the currents, and such the direction of the winds, in that part of the world, that a vessel sailing from the mouth of any one of these rivers for Rio de Janeiro, in Brazil, or for India, or for the markets of the Pacific around Cape Horn, or for Africa, or for Europe, has first to steer to the northward and westward, until she reaches the parallel of 25° or 30° north. This brings her off our own shores; and it is impossible for her to pursue any other route, so long as the northeast trade winds prevail, or the great equatorial current which feeds the Gulf stream continues to flow across the Atlantic. No vessel trading under canvas from the mouth of these rivers to the markets of South America, Europe, Asia, or Africa, can go any other way. They must pass by our doors.

"Therefore, in planning a system of national defenses, who can over estimate the importance of the Gulf of Mexico as a nucleus of naval means, the center of naval operations? That center is at Key West and the Tortugas; hence the great need of strong works there."

* * * * * * *

"The Amazonian basin, embracing an area more than twice the extent of our great Mississippi valley, fills too large a space in the world to escape attention from us, when we are in the very act of laying the foundations for a permanent system of national defense. With all the climates of India, with unheard-of capacities of production, and the most boundless sources of wealth in the field, the forest, and the mine, that valley, so soon as it shall begin to feel the axe and the plow, will pour into our lap a commerce, the value of which is as limitless as are its own vast resources. Nature has placed us in the position to command that commerce. The great business of fetching and carrying there must be ours. For coming and for going, the winds are fair for us; and we are the only nation for whose shipping they are so fair.

"That arm of the ocean which severs the continent nearly in twain, to make between the 'Father of Waters' at the north, and the 'King of Rivers' at the south, a receptacle for their commerce, is receiving from the Mississippi valley alone an amount of produce that astonishes the world. Yet the Mississippi valley is not half peopled up. What, therefore, will the oceanic basin, this commercial receptacle for the surplus produce of the two grandest systems of river basins on the face of the earth, be, when the great Amazonian valley, of double area, with its everlasting summer, and its endless round of harvests, comes to be subdued and brought into cultivation? What the Gulf of Mexico is now, is as nothing to what it is to be. It abounds with commercial elements that cannot be comprehended for their magnitude; and in proportion as it becomes the seat of maritime wealth and greatness, so, too, must it become the center of naval strength and power. As Columbus lay sick, it was upon the waters of this sea-basin that the angel visited him in a dream, and told him that God had made his name great, and sent him to 'unbar the gates of ocean.' The keys to these gates are at Key West and the Tortugas, Memphis, and Pensacola. Nature has placed them among the wonderful resources of the great valley; and to stand as gate-keeper before them, is the mission of those naval forces that naturally center in the Gulf."

As early as May, 1840, this officer published in the columns of the Southern Literary Messenger, (vol. 6, p. 310, &c.,) views, opinions, and recommendations similar to those contained in the document last referred to. This paper is of a character that deserves the attention of every statesman. Lieutenant Maury there expresses the opinion, now generally entertained, that the Florida Pass is to be the battle-ground of the next war in which we may be engaged. On page 310, he says:

"In future the West Indies are to be the scene of our great naval engagements—the vast slaughter-house of maritime nations at war. France and England have their islands at which their ships may rendezvous. But such is the unprotected state of our southern coast, and the condition of our Navy at present, that in a war with either of these two Powers, Pensacola and all the rich outpourings of the Mississippi would be at their mercy."

After speaking of the necessity of a strongly-fortified rendezvous for our ships of war and mercantile marine, he shows that every man west of the Alleghany "has a direct personal interest in the matter," and that "all the immense wealth which is poured in and out of the Gulf is at the mercy of the enemy," and makes a strong appeal to western men.

He says, page 311:

"Let them take a map and examine with a view to ascertain what protection is guarantied to their commerce in time of war. They will find that the Gulf of Mexico, studded with islands on its eastern borders, is hemmed in on all sides by other nations; that every 'pass' is commanded by them. And, in time of war, the only outlet for their commerce is around Cape Sable through the Gulf of Florida; that along this 'pass' it must have a strong guard lest it fall a prey into the enemy's hands. And they will then see that, cost what money it may, the United States should have the command—should hold the keys to this 'pass.'"

He then adds, still appealing to his western countrymen:

"As one whose pride it is to 'hail' from the West, I warn my fellow-citizens there of the dangers which some day may blight their prosperity; and as one who may be called on to ward off these dangers in the face of death, I beseech them to look to their welfare; and now, while it is peace, to listen to the dictates of prudence and of wisdom, and warn their representatives in Congress not to let their especial interest and the nation's wealth be found in this exposed, unprotected, and defenseless state, in the hour of danger."

It is not inappropriate in this connection to relate an anecdote of General Jackson, which I have heard from good authority, and which, I think, was first published by Lieutenant Maury. Soon after he was elected President, the "Old Hero" told a friend there were three things he had much at heart, and in his peculiar, decided way, declared, "With the blessing of God, these three things I will cause to be done. Pay off the national debt. Kill the monster bank at Philadelphia. And fortify the Tortugas." He succeeded in the first. The second he accomplished most effectually. The third he was constrained by the remissness of Congress to leave to his successors; and I appeal to his friends to heed the counsels and carry out the patriotic wishes of this illustrious man.

So strongly impressed was he with the great importance of this measure, that one of his first official acts was in respect to it. He ordered, within a month after his inauguration, "such a general examination to be made (by naval and military officers) as would lead to a just estimate of the value, susceptibility of defense, &c., of the Dry Tortugas." This duty was assigned to Commodore Rodgers, in April, 1829. Governor Branch, then Secretary of the Navy, in his first annual report, (Sen. doc. No. 1, p. 37, 1st sess. 21st Cong.,) said of the report of Commodore Rodgers, it "was so favorable as to justify a full and minute survey," which was intrusted to Lieutenants Tattnall and Gedney. Of Tortugas, Commodore Rodgers says, (p. 236, same doc.:)

"Besides affording a safe anchorage at all seasons of the year, is sufficiently capacious to ride in security all the navies of Europe; but what is most singular, there is within this harbor another, still more secure, which in its character may be said to be unique, uniting as it does, sufficient depth of water for ships of the largest class, to a narrow entrance not more than one hundred and twenty yards wide; easy of ingress and egress; and may be entered or departed from at all times, let the wind be from what point of the compass it may."

In March, 1830, General Jackson, still manifesting the interest expressed in this subject prior to his inauguration, sent a special message to Congress, calling "attention to the importance of this position (Tortugas) to the United States as a naval station," and transmitted a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, who said "it would be difficult to estimate the value of such a position for a naval rendezvous and depôt," &c., and also the report of Lieutenant Tattnall, in which, among other recommendations, he said:

"A fortress at the Tortugas, looking directly into the port of Havana, in conjunction with a naval force, would be a strong, if not an effectual check on such a disposition, AND GIVE US AT ALL TIMES THE CONTROL OF THE ISLAND OF CUBA. (Sen. doc. vol. 2, No. 111, pp. 1, 2, and 5, 1st sess. 21st Cong.)

In subsequent communications he continued to press this subject on the attention of Congress.

But, sir, it is useless to multiply authorities. Enough has been said to show that this measure has received the sanction and earnest advocacy of our most enlightened and patriotic statesmen, and of all the experienced and scientific officers of the Army and Navy who have turned their attention to the subject. Nor has the consideration and discussion of this question, and appreciation of its importance, been confined to our own officers and statesmen. It often attracted notice and elicited debate in the British Parliament before the cession of the Floridas, and was a subject of frequent, animated, and most interesting discussion at and soon after the cession. In May, 1819, the Marquis of Lansdowne, (the famous Sir Henry Petty,) then an opposition Peer, while speaking on the subject of the execution by General Jackson of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, British "fillibusters" among the Florida Indians and negroes, (upon whom doubtless they desired to confer all "the blessings of civil and religious liberty,") alluded to the purchase of "the Floridas" by the United States, and took Earls Bathurst and Liverpool to task for having permitted the cession, and gave cogent reasons for his censure—the chief of which was the importance of the naval and military positions the United States obtained by this acquisition. I will quote a few passages from his speech, as reported in Hansard Parl. Deb., 1st series, vol. 40, p. 291. He said:

"It was impossible for him not to advert to that event, which had so materially changed the situation of this country, [England,] with respect to its colonial power in the West Indies—he meant the cession of the Floridas. He could state without fear of contradiction in that House, or elsewhere, that no colonial cession so materially affecting the interests of this country, had ever before taken place. It was his anxious wish, and he believed that of all the country, that the peace now enjoyed should be of long duration; but neither their lordships, nor those who administered the Government, were justified in overlooking the prospect of a renewal of hostilities at some period or other. Should a war take place, the relative situation of this country would be essentially changed. He could without the slightest hesitation assert, that the acquisition of the Floridas would place a great part of the commerce of this country with the West Indies, at the mercy of the United States. In the case of hostilities, our homeward bound fleet could not pass the Gulf of Florida without the greater part becoming the prey of gun-boats and small privateers of every description. Another injurious consequence to the country was, that the possession of Florida gave the United States a commanding influence over the present black governments, or any which might hereafter be formed in the West Indies. He was far from supposing that the noble lords opposite, [Lord Bathurst and his colleagues,] were insensible to the importance of this cession, but the event was strangely inconsistent with the commanding influence which it was supposed British councils had obtained, by the late adjustment of the affairs of Europe."

The Marquis asked, "How did it happen that Ministers had been unable to prevent this cession?" He again speaks of it as "an occurrence, the prevention of which was so important to our interests."

Earl Bathurst and Earl Liverpool replied to this speech at length, but did not controvert the facts asserted or opinions avowed as to the importance and effect of the cession.

On the same subject (ibid., p. 902) June 3, 1819, in a debate in the House of Commons, on the "foreign enlistment bill," Mr. Macdonald said:

"As to Ferdinand, in whose behalf we were now called on to interfere, this monarch, who was leagued to us in the strictest amity, had the other day made over a most important colony to OUR GREAT WESTERN RIVAL without consulting our interests or our wishes. The cession of Florida to the United States could never have taken place if the spirit of the treaty of Utrecht had prevailed in the negotiations of those statesmen to whom the settlement of Bavaria, Baden, or any other German province, had seemed of so much consequence. But independently of positive treaties, there could be no question that we should have been justified in interfering in such a case, as self-preservation, which formed a part of the law of nature, was necessarily a part of the law of nations."

And in the same debate (ibid., p. 893) Mr. Maryatt, referring to the Spanish revolted colonies in South America, said they had—

"Another ally in both the interest and feelings of the people of the United States, whose territories, by the purchase of Louisiana, now come into contact with the borders of Mexico. The great and avowed object of their ambition is, that the whole of the vast continent which they inhabit should become independent like themselves, and the New World one day rival the Old. Although a sop has for the present been given to Cerberus by the cession of the Floridas to the United States, the policy of the Government will not long be able to restrain the wishes of the people, but be compelled to join in this popular and patriotic cause," &c. * * * * * *

The "late cession of the Floridas to the United States has certainly furnished that Government with great additional means of annoyance to our West India colonies in case of war;" and, "the want of regard she [Spain] has shown in both these cases to the security of our colonial possessions certainly releases us from all obligation to interest ourselves about hers," &c.

The celebrated Sir Robert Wilson, in same debate, (ibid., p. 871,) said:

"North America had sent commissioners [to South America,] not to negotiate South American independence, but to give a character to their governments. Seeing all that had been done, Spain interposed and purchased the forbearance of America by the cession of Florida. It was dangerous to be a prophet in political events at all times, but more particularly of late, when reason and facts were so opposed. But he would hazard the assertion, that after Florida had been occupied by her population, and her new position was secured to menace in the event of war the trade through the Gulf, America would next demand Cuba, AND THAT SHE WOULD OBTAIN. By intrigue and intimidation she would ultimately extend her views of aggrandizement to Mexico, push her frontier from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, and in the end laugh at Great Britain as the dupe of her artifice."

And in the House of Lords, June 28, 1819, in a debate on the same bill, (ibid., p. 1413,) the Earl of Carnarvan asked:

"Had no events recently taken place, which were calculated to affect the interests of Great Britain? Had not Spain ceded to America that very colony, [Florida,] which of all her other colonies, was most important to the welfare of our transatlantic possessions? * * * * *

"Would not each of her colonies, one after another, fall a victim to the avarice and ambition of another great Power? Would not the fate of Florida soon become the fate of Mexico? When we looked at the weakness, the imbecility, and the absurd policy of Spain, it was proper that we should also consider what the fate of South America would be were the House to withdraw the British troops from it."

Similar opinions were advanced by other speakers in both Houses of Parliament, in the debate on that bill, and in other debates the same session. On repeated occasions since, like views have been expressed by British statesmen.

Mr. Huskisson, an English Minister, it is said (see Senate Doc. No. 318, p. 33, 1st sess. 32d Cong.) once proposed the seizure and fortification of the Tortugas by the British Government, because it was the key to the Gulf and West India trade. Lord George Bentinck's speeches, since made, show that both ministerial and opposition statesmen in England, have had their vigilant attention directed to that region, and to these points as controlling them. They appreciate their importance, if some American statesmen do not.

On the 3d of February, 1848, in a debate in the House of Commons respecting the slave trade and slavery, Lord George Bentinck, as reported in the London Times, said:

"He would, therefore, say at once, let them [the British Government] take possession of Cuba, and settle the question altogether. Let them distrain upon it for the just debt due, and too long asked in vain from the Spanish Government. They would put an end to the slave-trade if they could emancipate the slaves of Cuba. If the people of this country thought it right to spend £150,000,000 in putting down slavery and ruining our colonies besides, would it not be cheap policy to put an end to slavery forever by seizing Cuba?" Lord George further said, "The case of Cuba stood upon its own merits, and upon the debt of £45,000,000 due to British subjects from the Spanish Government. Then, depend upon it, when Great Britain possessed Havana, as once she did in 1762, when she held it for about a year, and then exchanged it for the Floridas, and when she could cut the trade of America in two, no more boasts could be heard of what the United States would do, such as that which was not long ago uttered by one of her military officers, who declared that they 'never would be satisfied until Uncle Sam had set his right foot upon British Canada, and his left upon California, embrace the whole of the eastern sea-board, and throw his leg, like a freeman, over the whole continent of South America to Cape Horn, with Cuba for a cabbage garden.'"

The speeches just referred to are exemplifications of the feelings and sentiments of certain British statesmen, perhaps of the English people generally in past times with reference to this country. They are noticed, however, to show how important the acquisition of Florida and the outposts of Key West and Tortugas, were regarded by the wisest British statesmen when the treaty of cession was made. It was regarded as a blow at British interests in the West Indies, and was considered the entering-wedge to the acquisition of Cuba by the United States. They are noticed also as exhibiting the deep interest felt, and close attention paid to our conduct and progress. Some of these speeches are interesting, also, as showing the astonishing prescience of her statesmen of that day, who, thirty-four years ago, so prophetically alluded to our future career. They did not mistake; they properly appreciated the "manifest destiny"—the "inevitable progress" of this Confederacy; and they properly estimated its effect upon their own country. The jealousy they exhibited was at that time natural; yet I am rejoiced to believe that, except with very few of the leading men of England, it no longer exists. They do not now look upon us as an enemy or a rival to be checked. They regard our interests as identified with their own on most subjects. They know that a contest of arms with us could not result in any ulterior benefit to their own country, and that injury to us would be injurious to themselves. Their enemies are nearer home. Beyond all doubt, prior to the annexation of Texas, and the adjustment of the Oregon question, and the close of the Mexican war, they were inclined to check and impede our march to prosperity and power, and were averse to our assuming the position of the first agricultural and commercial nation of the world—the greatest in geographical extent and in population and in resources. But this is no longer the case. They are now disposed to acquiesce in our manifest destiny. The true interest of Great Britain, as her most sagacious public men have learned, is, so far from opposing, to forward the accomplishment of this end. "United by the ties of a common origin, common laws, and a common language," her policy, as they now understand, is to look to us as her natural ally in times of danger that may and probably will arise from those who are yet smarting under chastisement formerly inflicted by her, and panting for revenge. She considers this country as a sure and profitable market for her manufactures of our raw material, which resource alone is sufficient to ensure her prosperity. Abandoning to some extent her ancient restrictive commercial systems, she now seeks to conciliate and secure our good will by somewhat more liberal regulations. When she is convinced that she can no longer profitably or successfully compete with us, she wisely and gracefully yields, and even takes satisfaction in the credit resulting to herself from the astonishing success of her young "Anglo-Saxon offshoot." Rely upon it, sir, Great Britain will not enter into a contest with us, unless we force her to engage in it to avoid dishonor. The questions and negotiations connected with the subjects of our Fisheries—Canada reciprocity—Vancouver's Island, and the adjacent territory—and the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company—all will be adjusted without trouble. Least of all will she quarrel with us about Cuba, or Hayti, or the Sandwich Islands. She does not want Cuba; she could not own it advantageously; the present deplorable condition of Jamaica would soon become the fate of Cuba. It would be better for her for the United States to own it. She is sincere in her expressed desire to put an end to the African slave trade. This will be stopped if we possess Cuba. Even the shallow-brained fanatics who would excite trouble on the subject of negro servitude, are beginning to see that such would be the result. Whatever Lord Palmerston or such misguided and mischievous men as the late Lord Bentinck, may say or be willing to do exhibiting hostility to the United States, they are not now sustained by the British people, or their judicious and most intelligent statesmen.

But though it is not probable that we shall have any serious difficulty with Great Britain, he must be a careless observer of passing events who does not perceive the "clouds gathering in the political horizon" of Europe. Great Britain sees it. She is preparing for it. She is vastly augmenting her naval force at Jamaica and elsewhere. An European war may take place within the next year, which will be fought in American seas; nay, near our own coasts. We may be involved in it. It will be difficult to avoid it. I repeat, though once our enemy, Great Britain is now bound to us by ties of interest and friendship; there is little probability of collision between the "stars and stripes" and the "cross of Saint George." Her preparations are to meet the coming storm in Europe. In this, great as she is, she may encounter fearful odds, and be induced to invoke our aid against the combined despotisms of the Continent, and which aid a distinguished Democratic statesman, the ablest of President Polk's Cabinet, recently assured the people of England would be promptly and freely given.

Profiting by her past dear-bought experience, Great Britain, however, may wisely adopt the policy of the United States, and resolve to keep aloof from the wars of continental despotisms, which have been so profitless to her, and have entailed upon her people a public debt of eight hundred millions of pounds sterling. This policy of "armed neutrality" will enable her to maintain such attitude, and will coerce the respect of all belligerent Powers.

Our relations with Spain may lead to trouble. The odious and insulting system of secret spies she has adopted towards our Government and people, and their unfounded and mischievous reports; the unnecessary severity and cruelty her functionaries have pursued towards misguided Americans in their power; the strange conduct of her Cuban officers, displaying jealousy and hatred towards our people; its misgovernment of Cuba and Cuban affairs, arising from fear, selfishness and avarice; her exactions upon our trade and commerce, and the illegal exclusion of our vessels and citizens from her harbors, in violation of the spirit of treaty stipulations, and her exhibitions of hostile feelings, are combined provocations to dispute. But it is to be hoped wiser and better counsels may prevail at Madrid, and at the Havana, which may result in the preservation of peace and harmony between the two nations.

The difficulty that we should endeavor to be fully prepared for, if any occurs in which we shall become involved, is, it is most likely, with the French Emperor. The character and abilities of Napoleon the Third are greatly misunderstood in this country. He is one of the most observing and able men of the age, and has exhibited energy and executive talent scarcely surpassed by the great founder of his family. He is eminently a practical man—a man of few words, but of prompt and decisive action. I have good reason to say that the incessant attacks of a portion of the newspaper press of this country upon his conduct and motives, have excited ill feelings against us. Like the first Napoleon, he is exceedingly sensitive to such attacks; and the coarseness with which he has been assailed here has incensed him against the Government and people of the United States. It can be readily supposed that his assuming an unfriendly or belligerent attitude towards the only formidable republican government now existing, would gratify some of the other crowned heads of the continent, and would in some degree reconcile them to the restoration of the Napoleonic dynasty in France. The reported recent acts of the French Government with respect to the port of Samana, in Hayti, are in harmony with the known sentiments of Louis Napoleon when in this country some years ago. It is a well-known fact, that Napoleon the First never recognized the independence of Hayti, and contemplated its resubjugation as a French colony. Louis Napoleon understands American affairs as well as any man in Europe. He is well acquainted with important matters of which many American citizens are ignorant. In 1846 he wrote and published an able work respecting the interoceanic route proposed at Nicaragua, as valuable as any written on the subject. It is hardly to be doubted that he intends or desires to reannex Hayti; and that he wishes to acquire a foothold in the Sandwich Islands, in Mexico, and elsewhere on this continent, and in South America, is equally certain. The restless genius of France loves not quiet. The French people, intoxicated by the memory of the glories of the Empire, anxiously await expected demonstrations by him to effect the unfulfilled purposes of Napoleon the First. It is necessary for his own security that he should not disappoint them. He must divert and employ the turbulent spirits whom he has been elected to govern. His choice is a continental war—a war with the victors of Waterloo,—or a war distant from France, and in which he will have the sympathy of the ancient foes of the Empire. He cannot avoid one or the other. If he preserves peace in Europe, it will be by a war in the western hemisphere.

There are some who believe that he designs an attack upon Great Britain, and that there is danger of the invasion of that Island. In my judgment this is an idle surmise. The English papers, and especially the ministerial papers, nevertheless encourage it. I have observed that whenever the English rulers discover any trouble likely to arise at home from Chartists, Liberals, Irish patriots, oppressed working classes, or the like, they generally conjure up some such bugbear as "French invasion," and make cogent appeals to the loyalty of all British subjects to stand together for the "defense of their altars and firesides." The appeal rarely fails in its desired effect. Domestic and internal dissension is stifled by the aroused feelings of patriotic loyalty distinguishing the English people. Napoleon the Third has no intention of invading England. He may, however, unavoidably become involved with Great Britain; or he will engage in war with the continental Powers who hate and fear France, and will therefore combine against her, or, defying the American principle maintained by Mr. Madison with respect to Florida, in 1811, repeated by Mr. Monroe in 1823, and reiterated since, he may attempt to establish French monarchical colonies in America. He will be prepared for resistance to his measures; and he will be prepared, in retaliation for opposition to him, to intervene to prevent the acquisition by the United States, even by peaceful cession, of Cuba or any other new territory. And there is but one sentiment in this country, that such intervention will necessarily lead to war.

Sir, I have some ground for speaking thus. One of the ablest and best of the Bonaparte family was long a near neighbor of mine, and an intimate friend. He was a sound republican, a large slaveholder, and an excellent citizen. I have heard much from that intelligent gentleman of his relative, the present Emperor—of the sentiments, feelings, and views of the family; and I tell you, sir, Napoleon the Third cannot if he would, and would not if he could, remain at peace during the year 1853. We are as likely as any other people to become embroiled with him, and such result will be accelerated, if it can be, by the intrigues and incitement of every Power of the Old World hostile to liberal government.

IN SUCH A CONTEST FORTS TAYLOR AND JEFFERSON WILL BE NEEDED.

I think, Mr. Chairman, I have said enough to show the importance of the measure I suggest, and indeed the absolute necessity for the construction of strong fortifications on the Florida Keys.

On page 25, Executive Document No. 5, already referred to, there is the official estimate of the cost of Forts Taylor and Jefferson, and of the past appropriations and expenditures therefor; it is as follows:

Fort Taylor, Key West: Peace garrison, one company; war one thousand men; commenced in 1845; estimated cost of construction and repairs $1,900,000; expended $395,000; amount necessary to complete $805,000; cannon 185; cost of armament $160,725.

Fort Jefferson, Garden Key, Tortugas: Peace garrison, one company; war fifteen hundred men; commenced in 1846; estimated cost, &c., $1,200,000; expended $210,133; necessary to complete $989,862; cannon 298; cost of armament $273,594.

If it is the intention of our Government to complete these fortifications at any time; if it is not intended to abandon them, though partly finished, it seems to me there is an obvious propriety in the proposition I now submit, to make at once, the appropriation necessary to complete them as soon as practicable. As the appropriations are now made, it will require from fifteen to twenty years to complete the works at Tortugas! If appropriations be made in the manner recommended, they may be completed forthwith. To show the importance of completing works which have been commenced or determined upon, I ask special attention to the celebrated report of General Cass, then Secretary of War, of April 8, 1836, one of the ablest, and perhaps the best report ever made on the subject of fortifications. On pages 22 and 23, (Ex. Doc., vol. 6, No. 243, 1st sess. 24th Cong.,) he says:

"I would suggest that the works which are determined on be pushed with all reasonable vigor, that our whole coast may be placed beyond the reach of injury or insult, as soon as a just regard to circumstances will permit. No objections can arise to this procedure on the ground of expense, because whatever system may be approved by the Legislature, nothing will be gained by delaying its completion beyond the time necessary to the proper execution of the work. In fact the cost will be greater the longer we are employed in it, not only for obvious reasons arising out of general superintendence and other contingencies, but because accidents are liable to happen to unfinished works, and the business upon them is deranged during the winter, when they must be properly secured; and the season for resuming labor always finds some preparations necessary, which would not have been required had no interruption happened."

"But the political considerations which urge forward this great object are entitled to much more weight. When once completed, we should feel secure. There is probably not a man in the country who did not look with some solicitude during the past season at our comparatively defenseless condition, when the issue of our discussions with France was uncertain; and who did not regret that our preparations, during the long interval of peace we had enjoyed, had not kept pace with our growth and importance. We have now this lesson to add to our other experience. Adequate security is not only due from the Government to the country, and the conviction of it is not only satisfactory, but the knowledge of its existence cannot fail to produce an influence upon other nations, as well in the advent of war itself as in the mode of conducting it. If we are prepared to attack and resist, the chances of being compelled to embark in hostilities will be diminished much in proportion to our preparation. An unprotected commerce, a defenseless coast, and a military marine wholly inadequate to the wants of our service, would indeed hold out strong inducements to other nations to convert trifling pretexts into serious causes of quarrel."

"I think that when the plan of a work has been approved by Congress, and its construction authorized, the whole appropriation should be made at once, to be drawn from the Treasury in annual installments to be fixed by the law. This mode of appropriation would remedy much of the inconvenience which has been felt for years in this branch of the public service. The uncertainty respecting the appropriations annually deranges the business, and the delay which biennially takes place in the passage of the necessary law reduces the alternate season of operations to a comparatively short period. An exact inquiry into the effect which the present system of making the appropriations has had upon the expense of the works would probably exhibit an amount far greater than is generally anticipated."

The suspension of labor on works further north during the winter, mentioned by General Cass, is not the case as to these works. This should be considered in providing the means for their completion. That adequate means ought to be afforded to finish and arm these fortifications as soon as possible, so as to be ready forthwith for any emergency that may come upon us, is not only dictated by true economy, but in these instances the arguments urged by that distinguished statesman, in the first paragraphs above quoted, apply with peculiar force. Before those works are probably completed in the ordinary progress in times of peace, allowed by annual or semi-annual appropriations of limited sums, they may be needed for defense or attack. More than five years have elapsed since they were begun, and not a third of the amount officially estimated as necessary for their completion, has as yet been appropriated. If a necessity should arise within the next five years for their use, and if they are then unfinished, the force to complete them may be wanted elsewhere; it may be more difficult to procure it, and the necessary materials than at present, and the expense would probably be greatly increased.

If the recollection of the "solicitude" felt by so distinguished a statesman as General Cass, one of the most watchful guardians of his country's honor and interests, pending "our discussions with France," in 1835, should have caused him so strongly to urge the adoption of the measure I now recommend, with how much greater force do similar "political considerations" now appeal to us! They demand the serious attention of every statesman. Even delay in their consideration may be greatly injurious.

No time can be more propitious for the execution of this proposition than the present. Our Treasury is overflowing. Our surplus revenue has become a subject of complaint. It is a positive grievance, and there is difficulty, real difficulty, in the way of the proper disposition of this excess of revenue over the present wants of Government. The public debt is not yet due, and the Government bonds cannot be bought except at a premium so high as to make their purchase at this time impolitic. This premium would necessarily be increased, so soon as it became known that the Government was in the market, a bidder for its own bonds. Why, then, may we not apply a portion of the fund lying idle in the hands of subtreasurers to this purpose? It cannot be more usefully employed, and will be but an anticipation of appropriations which must hereafter be made, when, perhaps, the expenditure of the money will be less convenient to us than now.

The completion of these works is also a judicious measure, because it will destroy one argument strenuously urged by some in favor of the immediate annexation of Cuba, founded on the assertion that the Moro Castle now commands our Gulf commerce; and therefore that it is necessary we should possess it. As I have before shown, the fact assumed is not true. The Moro Castle, or any other point in Cuba, does not command the Gulf trade even now, if a respectable naval force is placed to protect it at Key West and Tortugas. On the contrary, Forts Jefferson and Taylor will, when fortified, with a small naval force, not only command that trade, but the Havana and Matanzas, and the entire northern and eastern side of Cuba, more effectually than the Moro Castle now does, even if the latter has a superior naval force to aid it. They will command that Castle itself. Yet the logic just alluded to, so artfully addressed to our pockets as well as our patriotic pride, is so potential that it has misled many good citizens and otherwise prudent statesmen into a willingness to withhold their pointed condemnation of highly reprehensible conduct by others, professedly to attain an object falsely assumed to be indispensable for the protection of our interests.

It was my purpose to speak of the much-talked-of acquisition by the United States of Cuba, as closely connected with this subject. It is by far the most important question pending in this country. I desire and am prepared to discuss it; and, representing a State perhaps more deeply interested in what may precede, and in what must follow the consummation of such a measure, I intend to avail myself of the first opportunity that presents itself to express my views frankly and fully. At present I will content myself with saying, first, that if the works commenced at Key West and Tortugas are finished, it is not requisite for the protection of our vast and constantly-augmenting commerce passing through "the Straits of Florida" that we should possess Cuba, or the Havana, or the Moro Castle, or any point in Cuba. Secondly, that if any attempt is to be made to conquer Cuba by naval and military force, the fortifications at Key West and Tortugas should be finished and garrisoned before it is made; being important to ensure success in that undertaking, with the least hazard, difficulty, and expense. Thirdly, after such conquest of Cuba, these fortifications are essential to ensure the continued possession of Cuba, even during the war for its acquisition, and at all times to prevent its blockade by a naval enemy. Fourthly, without these fortifications, in a war that will ensue from an attempt by us to conquer Cuba, or from our resistance of the attempts of any other Power to obtain that Island, or to interfere with it, or a war that may arise in any other way with any respectable naval power, our Gulf commerce, and all else that passes through the "Florida Straits," will be greatly exposed, and may be seriously injured. Fifthly, that these fortifications are necessary, even if we acquire Cuba by purchase and peaceful cession, and not only for the protection of the vast commercial and navigating interests I have mentioned, but for the protection, defense, and security of Cuba at all times hereafter. And, sixthly, if Cuba remains in possession of Spain, these fortifications are essential to us, insomuch as besides protecting our commerce and navigation, they "will at all times" command the Havana, and "give us the control of the Island of Cuba." So far as Cuba is concerned, therefore, I claim for this measure the support of all divisions in this House and elsewhere—of those who oppose the acquisition of that Island, of those who favor its acquisition by purchase and peaceful cession, and of those who would seize and hold it per fas aut nefas.

In conclusion, I repeat, sir, that no appropriation can be made, no work constructed, in which so many and such varied and important interests are involved. The ship builders and the ship owners of the East, and the commercial men of the North generally, the planters of the South, and the farmers of the West, all have a direct personal interest in this measure. The General Government is interested in the fortification of these points. It is due to itself, and to the people of the United States. Without them, our Navy may be crippled in its strength, and rendered comparatively inefficient; and our commercial marine may, in the language of Lord Bentinck, "be cut in two" by a maritime enemy. May I not, then, confidently appeal to all sides of this House, and to the patriotism of every American, to sustain the proposition I have made?

I am indifferent, Mr. Chairman, about the adoption of this resolution, at this time. My object was to direct public attention, and particularly that of members of Congress, to this subject. That has been accomplished. Hereafter, when we come to consider the appropriation bills, I will again bring the matter before the House. In the mean time, I shall print these remarks, and the facts, statistics, and authorities to which I have referred, for the use of members, who I trust will give the subject some attention, and I most earnestly and respectfully solicit the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, and on Ways and Means, to give that consideration to the subject which its importance demands.

THE TARIFF.

SPEECH OF MR. WOODWARD,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

December 10, 1852.

The proposition of Mr. BROOKS to raise a Select Committee on the Tariff, being under consideration—

Mr. WOODWARD said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: This subject has come unexpectedly to me before the committee this morning, and I shall not detain them by entering at length into a discussion of the special merits of the tariff law of 1846, but shall limit my remarks chiefly to the question of what, in future, should be the commercial and fiscal policy of the country.

Standing ready, at all times, to vote a reduction of the duties on imports, I am yet aware that Congress need not, at this short session, attempt any general or fundamental action on the subject. But it is because this is true, and because still more is true, it is because your longest session will not be long enough for mature action, that I am in favor of bringing up the question now. I desire that the discussion that may be had at this time shall go before the country, in order that the popular mind may be brought to bear upon the next session of Congress in relation to the matter. You have, time and again, seen propositions of radical reform run out at the end of your longest sessions. Why, sir, do not gentlemen remember, does not my friend from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] remember, that the tariff of 1846 was saved from running out at the end of the session by its friends refusing to consume the time of the House in debate? I know that I declined to discuss it for that reason, and that I urged others not to discuss it for the same reason. I know that discussion in the Senate was declined for that reason, and that ostensible and pretended friends of the bill hoped that it might be defeated by discussion, but were, I rejoice to say, disappointed.

Now, I was in favor of the resolution first introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] the day before yesterday. It was, in express terms, a proposition to reduce the revenue by reducing the duties; and are not we on this side of the House in favor of reduction? True, the proposition was to raise a special committee for this purpose, instead of referring the matter to the regular committee; but besides that the regular committee would have had no time to prepare such an exposition as would be useful and satisfactory to the public; where was the danger in the appointment of a special committee? Would not the Speaker of the House have been bound—I do not say bound simply as a party man and a free trade man—as a Democrat, representing the majority on this floor, but bound as the Presiding Officer of the House, by parliamentary rule, to constitute the committee favorably to the proposition to reduce? Though he had been a Whig, and a high tariff man, he would have been bound thus to compose the committee; for reduction was the only substantive proposition. Very true, likewise, the committee was empowered by the resolution to send for persons and papers; but if, as has been suspected, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] intended—I do not, myself, impute any such intention to him, but others have, and his individual intentions appeared to be regarded by them as constituting a part of his resolution—I say though he may have intended that the committee should send for persons and papers only on one side of the question, yet it must be remembered that his individual purpose would not have controlled the committee. There was no obligation imposed on the committee to send for persons or papers at all—it was only empowered to do so; and even if it had been bound, it would have had its own discretion as to the manner of discharging the obligation. Had I been made a member of such a committee, I am sure I should have objected to receiving any ex parte budget without giving full time for the preparation of a budget on the opposite side of the question.

Now, the gentleman from New York seems to be in favor of a permanent fixed rate of duties, adapted to prices abroad, and which shall be high enough when prices are low abroad, and low enough when prices are high abroad.

Mr. Chairman, I take the position that a permanent system is impossible, if the object be not to destroy foreign commerce, but to raise revenue by imposts. I take the position, that a permanent system is utterly inconsistent with the only lawful object of the system, which is the raising of revenue. In providing a tariff system, we do not act under the power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations," but under a wholly different power, found in a different part of the Constitution; the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, the declared and only object of which is to raise money. That this is purely a money power has been declared by your ablest jurists—Judge Marshall among the rest, high Federalist as he was.

I mean to say that a permanent tariff is impracticable, not in the nature of things, but consistently with the trust reposed in us, which makes it our imperious duty to see and be sure that we raise revenue by the imposition of duties and imposts, instead of fruitlessly and unjustly imposing a burden on trade; as though the Constitution had made it our duty to fetter commerce, instead of raising revenue for public uses. To impose duties with any other view, is to defraud the Treasury of which we are the guardians; to oppress commerce, which we are only authorized to tax for the sake of the Treasury; and all for the benefit of a class, which class is not once mentioned in the Constitution. Many public men reason and act as though the Constitution were a compact not between States, but between classes, and as though we met here to execute and enforce the covenants between classes as such, looking directly to class rights on the one side, and class obligations on the other.

Well, sir, if revenue be the object of an impost system, and all of us agree that it is, at least one of the objects, and an indispensable one, it becomes us to know what constitutes the capacity, or rather the specific condition of the capacity of a country, to raise revenue by means of impost duties. That condition is, the absence of wealth in particular forms. It is because you can buy abroad what you do not make at home, or can buy cheaper abroad than you can at home, that foreign merchandise can bear an impost tax, and yet come into our markets. It is the difference in the cost of foreign and domestic production, in reference to any given article, that enables you to impose a duty on it, and without this difference you could impose no available duty whatever.

Such being the case, the question of the practicability of a fixed system of imposts, a permanent rate of duties, which, in the language of the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] should be adapted to prices abroad, and be high enough when prices are low abroad, and low enough when prices are high abroad, will depend upon the inquiry, whether the difference in the cost of foreign and domestic production, in relation to the several articles of commerce, be fixed and permanent; and this inquiry will be brought to a satisfactory conclusion, by a single restrospective glance at the brief period of twenty or twenty-five years last past. I now assert, that a large proportion of foreign merchandise, which, at the beginning of that period, would have borne a duty of one hundred per cent. or upwards, is at the present time incapable of any duty whatever. And if this be true, your capacity for levying imposts, in relation to the descriptions of merchandise indicated, has diminished at the average rate of from three to five, and in some instances, ten per cent. per annum. I beg gentlemen on both sides of the House to think of this; and especially would I solicit the serious meditations of that portion of the Democratic party, if there be, as I trust there is no longer any such, who have aimed to stand upon the tariff of '46 as a finality, and who would fraudulently erase from the Democratic creed the article of free trade and substitute therefor the tariff of '46.

Why, sir, go back to the year 1816. At that time a huge proportion of foreign merchandise could have been imported under a duty of from one hundred to five hundred per cent. In 1816, you could have imported a hat, such as the one before me, under a duty of one hundred and fifty, probably two hundred per cent. At the present time, a duty of fifteen or twenty would be prohibitory. Indeed, the existing duty is, I believe, prohibitory; for I have it from good authority that the article has quite ceased to be imported. And why is this? It is because the growth of the wealth of the country in home-made hats has reduced or destroyed the difference between the cost-value of the domestic and foreign article. It is the absence of wealth in particular forms, that enables any country to maintain an impost system. I could refer to a thousand important articles to prove the immense decline, and the large ratio of a still progressive decline, in your ability to levy high duties. I might refer to cotton cloths and cotton goods of every description; to leather, and every description of article made of leather, as very prominent articles for illustrating the proposition. In 1816, or even in 1828, most of the suggested articles would have borne a duty of one hundred per cent. Now many of them are incapable of any duty. Cottons, which twenty-five years ago would have borne that duty, are now exported into the very country against which they then had to be protected in the home market. Every single article of manufacture has become capable of less and less duty successively and continually. Not a year, not a month revolves, but some article of foreign commerce ceases to be dutiable.

Take the article of sugar, once a prominent article in the protective system. Twenty years ago sugar would have borne a duty of one hundred and fifty, and probably two hundred per cent. I will stand corrected if I am in error. It did in fact bear a heavy duty. How is it now? What would be called a revenue duty in the view of a high tariff man, would now be a prohibition upon sugar, and it is not difficult to foresee that in ten years from this hour—and ten years is but an hour in the lifetime of a nation—sugar will be exported from the United States. And if the high tariff interest should make any proposition relative to it, ten years hence, it is most likely they will insist upon a repeal of all duties in order that the raw material may come in cheap to the manufacturer; for they teach us that whatever they want to buy is made cheaper by a low duty, and whatever they want to sell is made cheaper by a high duty.

I must be understood as arguing the question before the committee more as a question of revenue, than one of free trade; assuming that the Government is to look to its impost system as its only present resource; and that direct taxes are to be resorted to only when, and in proportion as, an impost system shall prove inadequate. And I insist that the country ought to determine, at once, whether, in future, it is to look for its revenue to imposts, or in part to direct taxes.

But the specific object proposed by the gentleman from New York, is to get rid of an existing surplus in the Treasury. There are two modes by which this can be done: You may diminish the revenue by reducing duties to moderate rates; or else, by means of prohibitory duties, you may reduce the amount of foreign commerce, which is the basis of duties, and in this way diminish revenue. In other words, you may diminish revenue by reducing or abolishing duties, or by reducing or abolishing foreign commerce. Either will answer the purpose. And regarded in a financial, and not a commercial point of view, it will make but little difference which method you adopt, if the object be simply to get rid of an existing surplus. But if the object be what it ought to be, to provide against future probable deficiencies as well as surpluses, then it is of great importance, both as a commercial and a financial question, whether you adopt this method or that. But the gentleman from New York proposed, in express terms, a reduction of duties as the means of reducing the revenue. Why should we, how can we, decline to meet him on that general proposition? The surplus in the Treasury has forced the question upon us. We, Democrats, cannot consistently evade it; we dare not; for the country sees that there ought to be a reduction of the tariff. Our situation is not what it was in 1846. The free trade party is in much better case now than then. At that time there was a deficient Treasury, and the fear was that reducing duties would increase the deficiency. The tariff men declared that it would, and treated the opposite proposition as an absurdity; and a portion of our friends were well nigh driven from the support of that tariff, from a serious apprehension that the Government might be bankrupted by it. It was not that they were averse to low duties—not that they were in favor of protection, that they gave in reluctantly, but because they were afraid of impoverishing the Government.

That argument or ground of apprehension is now gone. There is a surplus in the Treasury of from seven to fourteen millions of dollars, and the question is whether you will continue that surplus, and if not, how you are to get rid of it. If it is determined that the surplus shall not be rendered permanent, then you are to decide whether you will reduce the revenue by reducing the duties, or by enacting prohibitory duties—and I maintain that this question could not go before the country in a form more favorable to free trade, or at a time more propitious than the present. In 1846 there was a deficient revenue, and the friends of a moderate tariff found it difficult to persuade the community that high duties made low revenue. The proposition was a little complex. But, sir, now that there is a surplus, the gentlemen who may propose to reduce the revenue by high duties must themselves evolve and expound that complex proposition. It does not rest upon our shoulders to do it. They themselves propose to reduce the revenue now, and they must show the country that raising duties will reduce the revenue, or else unite with us in giving effect to the opposite idea—they must maintain our former proposition.

Having $14,000,000 surplus, the naked question is how to get rid of it; and, my word for it, the people of the United States will demand a reduction of duties as the means of reducing the revenue, when the proposition is submitted to them.

But, sir, to return to the drift of my remarks, which was to show in what degree our foreign commerce is continually less and less capable of bearing high duties; and if I speak immethodically, and without a natural order of propositions, the committee will, of course, indulge me under the circumstances.

The tariff of 1846 has already become, to a very considerable extent, and is rapidly becoming to a much greater extent, a prohibitory tariff. American skill is onward, American machinery is amplifying and approximating the perfection of that of Europe; in some instances surpassing it. American profits are lowering, and American economy is improving. There are very few things we could not make almost as cheap as they are made abroad. But just in proportion as our capacity to manufacture cheaply advances, so must duties fall progressively. The principle of low duties must be as progressive as American skill and American machinery, or else your tariff will become prohibitory.

Now, sir, I lay it down as an undeniable proposition—and I am willing, in the course of this discussion, which I hope will go on, to be met upon the proposition—that the tariff of 1846 is at this time more prohibitory than the tariff of 1842 was at that time; and I maintain that if the tariff of 1842 were now the tariff of the country, your revenue would be less than $35,000,000; and if the tariff of 1828 were now the tariff of the United States, your revenue would not exceed $25,000,000; because, with the advancing skill of American artizans, foreign competition could not pay the duties imposed at that time, and come into competition with us.

I do not pretend to deny that there is a much heavier importation at this time, than what took place at either of those periods: what I mean to say is, that the proportion of merchandise excluded by the present tariff, which would otherwise come into the country, is greater than the proportion excluded by either of those tariffs which would otherwise, then, have come in.

As to agricultural articles, look at the extent of this country. We are the producers of almost everything, or capable of being so. What that is produced in any other country is not produced, or capable of being produced, in the United States? Tell me what articles of manufacture abroad, or what of the agricultural products of foreign climes, are not also produced in the United States, or likely soon to be? Coffee, tea, and some few tropical fruits, are not yet, I believe, found in the United States, but almost every other production is. There is, in the United States, this side of the stony mountain range, an amount of territory equal to the three States of Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana, of prodigious fertility and remarkable salubrity, which lies south of the southern extremity of Europe. It extends even further south than the Barbary States of Africa; and though not of the same temperature, yet it is known that the inequality is not so great as to vary in any considerable degree its agricultural capabilities. The United States are a great Zoll-Verein, extending from the highest northern to the lowest southern latitude. Should Cuba become a portion of them, there will be almost nothing produced throughout the world that will not have its representative or analogue in the United States. I am told that in the deserts of California they actually find the gum acasia, a commodity thought indigenous only in the sand seas of Africa.

In our day, almost everything is manufactured by means of machinery. A railroad locomotive, of five-horse power, inferior in quality and uncertain in its operation, and requiring to be tinkered every trip of fifty or one hundred miles, fifteen years ago, to my knowledge, cost $10,000. You now get an engine of six times that power, three times the speed, and as reliable for its operation as the rising of the sun and moon, for $6,000 or $7,000. Who will pretend that permanent duties are appropriate for that article? If a strict estimate be made, it will be found that railroad locomotives have been cheapened ninety per cent., and that is the reason why railroad stock, which was sold a few years back for thirty cents the dollar, is now one hundred and twenty-five and one hundred and thirty. I state this to illustrate the fact that American skill is progressing. It is hard on the heels of European skill, and so long as the difference between the two diminishes, which difference is the only thing which makes revenue by impost possible, your duties must be reduced progressively. A permanent system is an absurdity, if revenue be the object. Can any gentleman say what articles are not subject to the laws I have laid down? Take breadstuffs: What reason have we to imagine any description of breadstuffs will long remain cheaper elsewhere than in the United States? This great country has the greatest amount of waste land, and the most genial climates on the face of the earth. Are we to become dependent on foreign countries for breadstuffs? Never! Are we to become dependent on them for anything having relation to live-stock, or for animal products?

It is only because the people of the United States getting virgin lands for nothing, can live on half labor, and the whole people can live by the labor of one half, that we do not drive Europe out of every market. When the population of the United States becomes a little more compact we will want to sell everything; for, taking in the northern region of Maine, the northwest division of our territory, this and the other side of the Rocky Mountains, and Texas, with the countries which can hardly fail to come under the operation of our institutions before many years, we will have (so to speak) an analogue to every country in the universe. A nation limited to a particular region, like England, having only a few descriptions of minerals, and producing only a limited number of vegetable commodities and raising a limited number of cattle, will be thus dependent, and the greater the number of articles she cannot produce, and the more pressing her need of them, the greater will be her power of levying imposts. And so of all the other European States. Their power of taxing the commerce of one another is immense; and, by reason of the impossibility of home production, the people of neither can evade the tax. But to think of this great Zoll-Verein—this great free-trade alliance of States, covering every clime of the world, resting their revenue system upon no broader a basis than their deficient capacity for home production, is absurd. Suppose the States of Europe, like the States of America, were united on the principle of a Zoll-Verein, (and to complete the comparison you should include with Europe the northern States of Africa,) with free-trade among them as there is by the Constitution among these States, and without any other reliance for revenue than on trade external to the whole of them, what would be the consequence? Royalty and nobility, armies and navies, would starve on any possible revenue under the case supposed. That is not yet our condition, but we are coming rapidly to it.

It is a mistake to suppose that we have to grow as old as Europe to rival in her manufacturing. The newness of a country affords advantages for manufacturing in some respects. Many descriptions of raw material can be had cheaper, and the operative can, for the most part, purchase his provisions cheaper. I will mention materials of wood for illustration: Wood is cheaper in the United States than in England, and why cannot we make wooden fabrics cheaper? A laborer buys his meal for fifty cents a bushel here, and there for $1 50; and why cannot the laborer here, working ten hours a day, live better than the laborer there working fourteen hours a day? The half of a dollar is four times as much to a man in Ohio, Indiana, or Illinois, as to a man in Manchester, because he can get four times as much to eat with it. If he can live so much cheaper, and if the materials for manufacture, mineral or vegetable, are also cheaper, why cannot he manufacture cheaper? He can do it. He does not do it, because he can live comfortably without hard labor; while in Europe the operative must use diligent and hard labor or perish. There is a necessity to do it. Were our operatives to undergo the same labor, a man in Ohio would break down his competitor in England, because he obtains his raw material as cheap, and in some respects, a vast deal cheaper, and his bread and meal at less than half price.

But this is not to continue always. The population of the United States is becoming dense.

The northern and middle States will not always have the alternative of high wages at home or public land in the West. The alternative of fleeing to the West to cultivate the soil instead of working for wages below certain rates, disables manufacturing in the older States; but that disability is continually being reduced. The new country is settling up, land is increasing in value, and every day your manufacturer acquires a new facility of bringing his laborer to cheap wages. I am not speaking according to any sentiment of my mind, but according to the laws of political economy. They will rule. Wages will be regulated by supply and demand, and you may as well try to repeal the laws of chemistry as to repeal that law. They are all the laws of God. And I shall never hope, by progressive political science, to substitute a better law for it. Indeed, had a better law been possible, in the nature of things, God would have ordained that better law.

But this is the age of engines—one machine makes another, or, rather, each one is made by all the rest. Everything is done by engines, and human beings are but their body servants. Why, sir, you have a machine for setting card-teeth, that has cut off one half of the revenue on that article. A machine can work as cheap in the United States as in England. It does not matter whether it be run among a crowded or sparse population. A pin-making machine will work as rapidly in a wilderness as in a dense population. Take your machine for making percussion caps, and your machine for moulding bullets, (and I speak of these as curiosities familiar to every one,) will they make fewer caps or fewer bullets in the United States because we have a sparse population? They are constructed mathematically to run so fast, and in that proportion is their product. Indeed, it seems to be the destiny of machinery to engross the whole business of manufacturing, and to supersede, to a great extent, the employment of human labor in the mechanic arts. It would seem that the cultivation of the soil alone is to be left to human hands, and even that not altogether. It is therefore a great mistake to suppose that cheap manufacturing must await the old age of the country, and a dense population. These conditions are favorable as to most kinds of manufacturing, but not indispensable to any. And they are favorable only to the extent that human labor mixes with the operations of machinery. But while machinery thus tends to bring manufacturing to its highest perfection, even in a wilderness, when once introduced, it has the effect, also, of producing a precocious development of the agricultural and mineral resources of a new country; for, engrossing, to a great extent, the business of manufacturing, it drives thousand to the cultivation of the soil. The competition thus produced in agriculture leads, naturally, to the development of the science, and the improvement of the practice of agriculture. The consequence of which is, that agricultural products become greatly multiplied, and that, too, while the home market is contracted; for an engine neither eats bread or meat, or cheese, or vegetables, or wears clothes of wool, or flax, or cotton. For these disadvantages, however, the tiller of the soil has innumerable compensations in the institution of machinery. And I do not regret that things are as they are. One, however, cannot help regretting that this Government should have selected for the subject of its burdens those employments which are committed to human hands, and for the object of its bounties, those that are committed to hands of iron.

But, in referring to compensations to the farmer, I do not admit that the increased wealth and consumptive capacity of the manufacturer is worthy to be mentioned, so far as breadstuffs, provisions, and the more substantial eatables are concerned. It is conceded that wealth is capable of increasing indefinitely one's importance as a consumer, with reference to manufactured commodities. Take, for instance, fabrics of wood or iron, or of any other metal. Such articles are applicable to ten thousand purposes of use or taste, or ostentation and folly; and the richer a man is, the more of them is he able and likely to consume. Each manufacturer, therefore, is apt to become a very important consumer to all the rest. But the human stomach is the spherometer of the chief market of the farmer; and that stomach is only in a minute degree progressive; its capacity for consumption depends very little on wealth.

Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to suspect that many do not realize the situation in which the country stands in regard to its commercial and financial interests. There seems to be a delusion on the subject, and I will endeavor to explain my conception of the cause.

The duty on iron is thirty per cent. That duty we know is not prohibitory. But how much does it lack of being so? Is the prohibitory point five per cent. above the existing duty; or ten, or twenty? Who will undertake to say? The man who has made himself acquainted with the laws that govern in such matters, and has ascertained the principal conditions under which these laws are now operating, who has studied to know the number and force of existing activé causes, may be able to form a rational judgment; but he who has not done this is as incapable of an opinion as a dead man. He cannot know whether the point of prohibition be fifty, or only five per cent. above the actual duty. He cannot see that point, and will realize it only when it is present. It is to him as invisible as death, and like death it will most likely come upon him unawares. That the prohibitory point is near in our neighborhood, is proven by the fact that the reduced duties of the tariff of 1846 increased the revenue; for there was an increase of revenue before the gold crop came in.

I think that no one will deny what I have already stated, that from the year 1824 to the present time, the dutiable capacity of a very large proportion of foreign merchandise has diminished at an average rate of from four to five per cent. per annum. The causes that have produced this diminution, I have endeavored briefly to explain. Now, suppose that for the next four years this reduction should go on at the same rate; what would be the action of the tariff of '46, at the end of the period, upon foreign merchandise that could not, to-day, bear a heavier duty than thirty per cent., or twenty-five, or twenty per cent.? Who can deny that this tariff is fast becoming a prohibitory tariff; and, indeed, is already so to a considerable extent?

But it may be asked whether I would, by reducing the duties, incur the risk of increasing the existing surplus, instead of getting rid of it. I answer that I would most certainly, not doubting that the public would demand still further reductions, until surpluses should cease.

The discovery of gold in California is the only thing that throws doubt upon the financial and commercial prospects of the country. We cannot reason safely from that fact, because we cannot know its future importance. But we can safely say that it will not repeal the laws of political economy. It has introduced no new principle, but has only made the country richer than it was before. Speculation, buying on credit, and over-banking, will not, however, be prevented by increased wealth, though their consequences may be postponed by a rapid progressive increase of wealth.

The tariff of '46 would not now yield sufficient revenue to sustain your current expenditures, but for the gold crop from California. The discovery of those mines, besides throwing a large amount of specie into circulation, duplicating your currency, paper and metallic, has added vastly to your foreign trade. I may be charged with boldness when I say that the gold crop of the country in its double character of merchandise and circulating medium, has added to your exports eighty millions of dollars. In its character as merchandise it is admitted to have added some forty millions. In its character of money, it is conceded to have increased the circulating medium in metallic form, twenty millions. And when it is considered that the portion which went abroad as merchandise, in its transition, percolated the country and served as money for the time, twenty millions may be supposed too low a figure. But by increasing the metallic medium, it has also bolstered up and kept in a flush state, the paper medium, and in this way has enlarged the general circulation.

Now, consider what is the just proportion between the whole amount of circulating medium and the whole valuation of property in a country. Set down money as one twentieth part of property, and it follows that if you add thirty millions to currency, you add six hundred millions to the valuation of property. But an increase of valuation, brought about so suddenly, would not, at first, extend equally to all descriptions of property. It would first affect property actually in the market, and which from its nature belongs to trade, and is destined for annual consumption. Cotton, tobacco, &c., manufactures, &c., would first be affected. Real estate, fixed investments of capital, would experience the effects more gradually. But where the influence first acted it would tend to expend its whole energy, and cotton, with the other items mentioned, would go up to a valuation far above the due proportion between currency and property.

Thus it will be seen that while gold as merchandise has added forty millions to our exports, as currency it has probably added forty millions more, by enhancing the valuation of exported property. And here I must beg you to recollect that the increase of our exports is not so much in the specific quantity of the articles exported as in their valuation. The specific quantity of cotton exported the last year does not much exceed that of previous years, but its valuation is fifty millions greater. And this valuation has been caused in the way I have described.

I have said that forty millions goes abroad as merchandise; but it goes to Europe to become currency, and, added to the influx from Australia, it produces commercial and financial effects there, similar to those produced here by what remains in the country. The relations of the two countries will not therefore be changed. Both have acquired new wealth, and that is about all. The capacity of foreign imports to bear impost duties will go on diminishing hereafter as heretofore. If next year there should be found a surplus in the Treasury, it will be the result of increased wealth in this country and in Europe, and will only show that the prohibitory tendency of your tariff is not sufficient wholly to obviate the effects of that increase of wealth.

We should pursue the same financial policy as if the mines of California had no existence. The discovery of these mines, by-the-by, and their yield, has saved this country from a commercial revulsion. We are now in the midst of the period when that revulsion would have occurred, but for the finding of these mines.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. If there be a commercial revulsion in prospect, would it not be better, since we have a surplus, to provide for our debt, which will not embarrass us when the revulsion comes?

Mr. WOODWARD. That was a part of the argument which I overlooked. I have shown that duties are progressively advancing towards the prohibitory point. There are articles now imported into the United States under the tariff of 1846, which under that same tariff, will not be capable of importation hereafter, and by reducing the duty you will greatly increase revenue.

I do not, Mr. Chairman, believe in a horizontal tariff in any sense, and I am not going to sustain a maxim because the Democratic party is the author of that maxim. There is a great variety of articles that will not bear more than five per cent. If you put twenty per cent. upon them they are prohibited. There are other commodities that will bear a duty of twenty per cent., and would raise the highest possible revenue at that duty. Would I have the same duty upon each of these articles out of respect to the horizontal principle? We ought to measure the capacity for duty of each article, and adjust the duty accordingly.

I was about to conclude by saying, that if twelve months be permitted to elapse, and this discussion is deferred to the commencement of the next Congress, we will not get a bill through even at the long session of Congress. We have failed too often, and always would have failed, but for expedients by the prominent friends of free trade in the session of 1846.

But the gentleman from New York has referred to the estimates of the tariff of 1846, showing how we were then disappointed. Now I happened not to be disappointed. I had been for several years on the Committee on Manufactures, and I felt it my duty to look into that matter. I did not know but that the question of revenue would come before that committee. I recollect perfectly well that my estimates, at the time most carefully made, gave $28,000,000. I remember distinctly three or four friends coming to me and asking me whether we had not better put off the whole matter, saying there was danger that we would reduce the revenue so much that the whole country would become disgusted with the free-trade party. I said to these gentlemen, "If this tariff does not give us $28,000,000, take my head off at the block." I was not deceived in my estimates.

I am persuaded that the first proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] would have been voted for by every sincere free-trade man upon this side of the House, had it not been sprung upon us unawares. They were afraid of some trap set for them. They thought it extraordinary that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] should be the author of such a proposition. It never once occurred to them that that gentleman was capable of making a mistake. I could see plainly that he had made a mistake in submitting that proposition; that the parliamentary rule would give us the committee, and that the whole thing would result in a thorough investigation of the question, and lead to a discussion, not upon the abstract question of philosophical political economy, but upon the existing crisis now before the country. It would have been a specific inquiry as to the present revenue, the present commerce, the present surplus, laying aside all philosophical abstractions.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to one point he has made. He seems to be apprehensive that, under the operation of the present tariff, we are in danger of a commercial revulsion. The present tariff has raised a larger amount of revenue than the Government consumes. One of the chief complaints is, that we have more revenue than our wants demand. The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. WOODWARD,] if I understand the drift of his argument, is in favor of reducing the duties. The point which I submit to him is this: If you reduce the duties, will you not necessarily increase the amount of imports; and in doing that, will you not of necessity make the danger more imminent of that very commercial revulsion of which the gentleman seems to be apprehensive?

Mr. WOODWARD. I have not said that the surplus in the Treasury, or that large importations threatened us with a revulsion. I said, distinctly, that the gold from California, which produced the surplus, had paid for the importations, and thus saved the country from revulsion. The causes which were about to bring on this revulsion, are to be found in the great expansion of bank currency, producing high prices, and thus stimulating the mercantile adventurer to exhaust his credit abroad, in the hope of realizing the high prices at home. This foreign debt has been discharged as far as required by the foreign creditor, by means of California gold. But if no gold had come from California, the metallic currency would have been drawn off to pay the debt, and your paper currency would have lost its basis. The consequence would have been the calling in of their paper by the banks, leaving the people without any kind of money, whether metallic or paper. And if the State governments will incorporate banks indefinitely; if the people will receive as money the scrip of town councils, railroads, and other corporations; and if the commercial adventurer, prompted by the high prices that follows, will exhaust his credit abroad, the country must take the consequences. This Government has no jurisdiction to prevent it, and has no means if it had jurisdiction.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I desire to ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question. I agree with him in the general doctrine that this expansion of bank currency is likely to be attended with such effects as he attributes to it. But since the last revulsion, the United States have become a great gold-producing country—producing sixty or seventy millions of gold annually, and exporting some forty or fifty millions. Now, the question I wish to put to my friend from South Carolina, is this: Suppose there should be a pressure here, would not the effect of it really be to stop this export of forty or fifty millions of gold, and thus prevent the revulsion from operating as it did formerly? For instance, if things became very tight, instead of relying on bank currency alone, and sending abroad forty or fifty millions of gold, that specie might be retained in this country, and no such evils as the gentleman seems to apprehend would result. It strikes me, therefore, that as long as we continue to get gold in much larger quantities than we need it, this system will not produce the injury which the gentleman apprehends. But the moment we stop producing gold, or the moment we produce less than sufficient to supply our wants, then I think this difficulty will present itself.

Mr. WOODWARD. My friend has stated what I endeavored to state, that the increase in the production of gold has operated to postpone this crisis. But I think he falls into one error. He seems to suppose that as long as the yield of gold continues what it is, we will have a safeguard against such revulsions for all future time, or for an indefinite future. I dissent from that. It will only postpone it for a certain time, under the laws of political economy. The yield of gold, too, must be progressive in order to put off such a crisis. If a people will have a bank currency based upon credit—three paper capitals to one specie capital, or probably no specie capital at all—they must suffer the consequence, and all the governments on God's earth cannot save them from it. Now, I think, however, that there is a probability that the yield of the gold mines of California will be for a time progressive. The earth seems to contain an indefinite quantity of gold. The yield thus far has been in proportion to the population. Just exactly as the population has increased in California, the produce of gold has increased; and we have a right to expect that if the population doubles during twenty years, the increase of gold may also double, and that might save the country from revulsions. But the impost system is the question I am upon. Revulsions were referred to incidentally.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do not think my friend understood me exactly. My view is this: that until the export of gold has to be stopped, this danger will not occur. As long as we are a great gold-exporting country the want of money here will check that exportation and must check it, and whilst we produce a great deal more gold than we need, the danger is not to be apprehended.

[Mr. WOODWARD at the time of speaking did not rightly apprehend the interrogatory of Mr. CLINGMAN. The following answer would have been appropriate.]

As has already been said, the gold from your mines has postponed the period of revulsion, and will continue to have that tendency more or less, according to the yield of the mines. But I do not believe that any amount of gold will prevent the evils of licentious banking, such as we have in this country. The instincts which lead to banking, will always carry it to excess. The rivalry of cities and towns and villages, and a great variety of corporations, seeking each to aggrandize itself, leads inevitably to over-banking where banks have once come into existence. If a bank be given to one, then all the rest set up their claim on the score of justice and equality, and a bank is given to each on that score; and without any inquiry whether the circulating medium be not already sufficient. Bank paper will therefore run up to, or beyond the healthy point. And if it never fails to surcharge the whole sphere of circulation when specie has retired to the vaults, and left it the whole, for the same reason it will never fail to surcharge any portion of that sphere which specie may leave vacant for it. I mean to say it will always occupy more space than it is entitled to.

But while the indefinite supply of native gold may fail to prevent revulsion or depression, it will, at all times, tend to mitigate them, for the reason stated by my friend, [Mr. CLINGMAN.] But it will not obviate the necessity of moderate duties or imposts; and that is the point I have been considering.

Paper money, when it has once acquired the confidence of the people, will drive metallic currency to other countries, or into the sphere of international money, whither paper cannot go. Your gold crop, therefore, will in the main go abroad to pay debts, or be exchanged for importations. And as a crop, it will have a similar relation to paper medium, as any other crop of equal value, except that its indefinite increase will cause the depreciation of all money, itself in particular.

LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

SPEECH OF MR. SMITH,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 5, 1853.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill to confer the title of Lieutenant General by Brevet—

Mr. SMITH said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I am not here for the purpose of defending the private, the political, or the personal character of General Scott. I rise to advocate the passage of the Senate resolution creating a new title of lieutenant general, and authorizing the President to confer it, by brevet, for eminent military services. It is a military question, and I propose to address myself to it as such; and in speaking of General Scott, I shall confine myself, mainly, to his military character. There is no man in the country who was more sincerely or earnestly opposed to his elevation to the Presidency than I was. But my opposition to him, my political opposition, was tempered by my admiration of his military character; and I have never permitted myself, on any occasion, to detract his military renown.

Sir, I have examined this question in all its bearings; but before I go into the midst of the subject, as I have arranged it, I must refer to the remarks of the honorable gentlemen who spoke yesterday, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] and the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. LANE.]

I expected, sir, and I had my pencil ready to take notes thereof—I expected that the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] would bring forward some substantial arguments against the passage of this resolution. I was disappointed; perhaps it was because his mind was directed to another and a greater question. The gentleman's opposition to this bill merged itself into a simple attack upon the private character of General Scott, under the declaration that he was unworthy of the honor——

Mr. POLK, (interrupting.) The assault that the gentleman from Alabama makes upon me, that the speech I made on yesterday was conceived in the spirit of personal feeling, is unjust.

Mr. SMITH. The gentleman misunderstands me——

Mr. POLK. I relied upon the testimony of Jackson, of Wilkinson, of De Witt Clinton, of Worth, of Pillow, of Duncan, of Brown, and a host of others that form the galaxy of military greatness in this country, to show that he was unworthy of it, and the course I pursued proves that I had no personal feeling in it.

Mr. SMITH. I expect to answer the gentleman in the spirit in which he made his remarks. I beg him to be patient. I am a patient man myself.

Mr. POLK. So am I.

THE QUARRELS OF GREAT LEADERS.

Mr. SMITH. I propose to show that the arguments brought forward by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] against this resolution, in whatever spirit they may have been conceived, are, to say the most for them, but objections to General Scott's private and personal character. I did not intimate that the gentleman had any personal motive, because he disclaimed it at the time. What was the argument? The charge was that General Jackson, and General Wilkinson, and De Witt Clinton and others, had quarreled with General Scott. The intimation was that because they had quarreled with General Scott, he, General Scott, was a knave, and unworthy of his honors. Sir, great men have the right to quarrel—very many of them do quarrel. Is a quarrel an indication that either of the parties is a knave? Why, sir, does the British press, when our condidates for the Presidency are announced, say that the people of the United States have selected two of the greatest scamps in the country to be their candidates for the Presidency? Because the antagonistic presses of the country authorize the conclusion. The English press can prove its assertions by the Herald on the one side, and the Tribune on the other; so common is it to slander and abuse great men.

Well, sir, it seems that General Jackson, De Witt Clinton, and General Wilkinson were not friendly with General Scott. But what does that amount to? No one would pause to answer a charge made by General Wilkinson; but anything coming from General Jackson must be respected, and noted, and answered. And I answer. How? That General Jackson knew very well that the way to rise in the world was to put his foot upon his enemy and crush him, to prevent the enemy from crushing him:—and he had all those qualities in an eminent degree which rendered him the very man to take advantage of the suggestions of his intuitive sagacity.

Sir, from the beginning of the world we see great political leaders commencing life friendly, remaining so until they become competitors, and then—they become enemies. Go back to the olden times, and you see one great Athenian ostracizing his enemy to-day—he himself, in his turn, is ostracized to-morrow. You see the great Roman exiling his enemy to-day, and himself exiled to-morrow. You see Cæsar and Pompey, whose young plumes kissed each other in the beginning of life, afterwards quarreling. Brutus and Cassius quarreled. Cæsar and Cato quarreled. General Jackson quarreled with General Scott, and he quarreled with Mr. Clay, and he quarreled with Mr. Calhoun. What is the argument? It resolves itself at last into this, that great leaders want to get one another out of the way.

I remember a phrase—it is the whole idea in a nut-shell—in the quarrel between Percy and Prince Hal, when they met upon the field of battle—

"Think not, Percy,
To share with me in glory any more:
Two stars keep not their motion in one sphere;
Nor can one England brook the double reign
Of Harry Percy and the Prince of Wales."

There is the philosophy. There is the principle. This is a complete, and a full and perfect answer to the fact that General Jackson quarreled with General Scott. General Jackson had in his elements those terrible traits of character (without which no man could have achieved such a successful career) which made him the best friend and the fiercest enemy. General Jackson was himself assailed by the coffin hand-bills! Is that any evidence that he was a knave? If it be admitted that that is no evidence that General Jackson was a knave, I am sure General Wilkinson's hand-bill against General Scott is no evidence that he is a knave.

Now, sir, I propose to disarm the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] further in this matter, by his own witnesses, by his own men, his own friends. Beginning with the history of the country, and with the compliments of Congress to General Scott, I pass to the distinguished gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. LANE,] and with him disarm the gentleman from Tennessee, in this attack upon General Scott. I understood the gentleman, [Mr. POLK,] in the fine eulogy he passed upon General Washington, to say that General Washington was first in the hearts of his officers, thereby intimating that General Scott was not in the hearts of his officers. Did I understand aright?

Mr. POLK. I meant that the history of his difficulties with his officers will prove what I said.

Mr. SMITH. If by the words, "General Washington was first in the hearts of his officers," I interpret the gentleman properly, that he meant that General Scott was not in the hearts of his officers, I call the gentleman's attention to the speech of his distinguished friend from Oregon, [Mr. LANE,] a man with a big military heart—a man who had served with General Scott—a man who had smelled gunpowder—a man who knew how to appreciate military capacity and military character; and what did General LANE say? "I 'love General Scott as a man, and I have the 'highest admiration of him as the Commander-in-'Chief of the Army of the United States. He 'deserves the place." I ask if that does not disarm General Wilkinson? I ask if it is not a fair answer to the bitter enmity of General Jackson? Here is one officer, at least, who speaks in favor of General Scott's military and personal character.

The gentleman mis-reads the history of Washington, sir, when he says he was first in the hearts of his officers. It is well known that even he had to contend with the jealousies and heartburnings of ambitious and aspiring spirits, who wished to supersede and thwart him. Many were the combinations formed by some of his officers in the course of the revolutionary war, to take from him the position he held, and to prostrate him as an officer. Even he had his quarrels.

Where, then, are the arguments of my friend from Tennessee? What is this charge worth? Nothing—nothing. It is "stale, flat, and unprofitable."

GENERAL WASHINGTON.

The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] in his fine eulogy upon the character of General Washington, gravely and solemnly asks: "Will you make, by a solemn enactment of Congress, General Scott equal to General Washington?" This is an intimation, of course, that, as General Washington had once held the office of lieutenant general, no other man ought to hold it! Why, sir, it is true that General Washington was made, by act of Congress, a lieutenant general; but it was no elevation to him. It was positively a degradation; so understood and so acted upon afterwards by Congress. Sir, General Washington was not only a lieutenant general, but he was a President of the United States. Will you say, that because he happened to be President, it is a profanation of his character to make any other man President; and that because he happened to be a lieutenant general, it is a profanation of his character to make any other man a lieutenant general? I have as high an appreciation of the character of General Washington as any American citizen. But I do not despair of many Washingtons. It was not because he won great battles alone that he is revered; not because he was a great warrior, for there have been greater mere fighters, but it was because the battles he won were liberty's first battles, and because, in the moral grandeur of his character, he refused to take advantage of the popularity which his military achievements had acquired, to elevate and aggrandize himself.

Now, I must pass from my honorable friend from Tennessee, giving to him for his motives the utmost patriotism in all his movements. I know that he does not intend anything wrong; and the gallant manner in which he fought for the bill just passed by this House, for the relief of Mrs. Worth, met with my approbation so heartily that I forgive him for the mistake which he has made in this. It is a great mistake in a small matter.

GENERAL LANE, GENERAL WOOL, AND THE HISTORY OF THIS PROPOSITION.

I now go to the honorable gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. LANE,] and propose to disarm him. I am glad he is not here, (I see his seat vacant,) because I can say freely how much I admire him—how great I believe him to be in arms—how largely the country is indebted to him for his eminent services in Mexico and Oregon—and how high the pillar of glory ought to be erected for him. I can say this in his absence, which I might be unwilling to say in his presence. But, on another account, I regret his absence. I must say something that I would rather say in his presence. I would show him how completely he has disarmed himself in his argument.

The gentleman from Oregon [General LANE] spoke of the necessity, under this resolution, of reorganizing the Army—of increasing its generals. That is an important question, but no longer an open one. The Army, at least, must be increased; and a reorganization, as suggested by the gentleman, could do no harm. Sir, if we continue to look forward to the acquisition of new territories, (and we do,)—if we intend to stand by the Monroe doctrine as to the foreign occupancy of American soil, (and we do,) our Army must be increased. Our conduct and designs cannot always be mere brag and bluster. Our continuous filibustering is bound to bring about a fight after awhile. You will not only have to increase your armies, sir, but you must repair your navies. There should be new grades in the Navy, as well as new ships. Your little squadron of canoes must be changed into a great and respectable and powerful steam Navy to meet the exigencies of the day.

You remember, that the gentleman, [General LANE,] after making some suggestion about the consequence of the passage of this resolution as to the necessity of a reorganization of the Army, paused and commented upon General Wool, giving to him in a splendid eulogy the glory of the battle of Buena Vista. General Wool may possibly deserve it. I have a high admiration of General Wool, and I wish him to have the last laurel, and more than the last, for all the honors that he has won in the service of his country. But what use have I for that reference?

The opinions expressed by the honorable gentleman from Oregon, [General LANE,] were the opinions of a distinguished military chieftain, and they are entitled to credit as coming from such a source. I propose to answer him with his own witness:—and I now call the attention of the committee to the HISTORY OF THE PROPOSITION with reference to the establishment of the grade and title of lieutenant general.

It has been pending many years in Congress, and is not offered now as a mere salvo to General Scott. I would scorn to make such an offer to such a man. His consolation may be found in the speech of an old Roman, who, upon being defeated for Consul, rejoiced that Rome had in her limits one greater man than himself.

But as to the history of this resolution, in connection with General LANE's eulogy upon General Wool:

"July 29, 1850, Hon. Mr. CLEMENS submitted the following:

"'Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be 'instructed to inquire into the expediency of conferring, by 'law, the brevet rank of lieutenant general on Major General Winfield Scott, with such additional pay and allow-'ances as may be deemed proper, in consideration of the distinguished services rendered to the Republic by that officer 'during the late war with Mexico.'

"Eight days later that resolution was referred to the Senate's Military Committee.

"On the last day of the session, September 30, 1850, Hon. JEFFERSON DAVIS, chairman, reported the following resolution on the same subject:

"'Resolved, That the President of the United States be, 'and he is hereby, requested to refer to an army board of 'officers, to be designated by him, the following questions, 'viz:

"'Is it expedient or necessary to provide for additional 'grades of commissioned officers in the Army of the United 'States? If so, what grades, in addition to the present or-'ganization, should be created?'

"In pursuance of this request the President of the United States, by order, December 2, 1852, appointed a board of officers—Generals Jesup, (President,) WOOL, Gibson, Totten, Talcott, Hitchcock, and Colonel Crane, who reported, unanimously, as follows:

"'Under the first inquiry referred to it, the board is of 'opinion that it is expedient to create, by law, for the Army, 'the additional grade of lieutenant general, and that when, 'in the opinion of the President and Senate, it shall be 'deemed proper to acknowledge eminent services of officers of the Army, and in the mode already provided for in 'subordinate grades, it is expedient and proper that the 'grade of lieutenant general may be conferred by brevet.'

"December 17, 1850, that report was laid before the Senate, and 'referred to the Committee on Military Affairs,' &c.

"January 25, 1851, Hon. Mr. SHIELDS, chairman, &c., reported a joint resolution in conformity with the recommendation of the Military Board."

You will see from this that the President of the United States, in compliance with the request of the Senate, appointed a board of Army officers to examine the matter. That board consisted of the following gentlemen: Jesup, WOOL, Totten, Talcott, Hitchcock, and Colonel Crane. Recollect that General Wool, the man who was so much eulogized by the honorable Delegate from Oregon on yesterday, was placed on that board; and you have this report recommending, in the fullest possible manner, the passage of this proposition.

I ask if the gentleman from Oregon [General LANE] is not partially disarmed by his own eulogized witness? General Wool is a regular officer of the Army; bred in the Army—a Major General, having earned the distinction by long service in camp. I have shown you that he recommended, after solemn investigation and examination, the adoption of this new military rank. Now I propose to offset the opinion of the gentleman from Oregon against this resolution, with the opinion of his own great witness, General Wool, in its favor. And General Wool is a Democrat of the first water.

Mr. HALL, (in his seat.) What sort is that?

Mr. SMITH. The phrase is applicable to a diamond—a diamond of the first water—purest. There is your answer. General Jesup was the President of this board of inquiry. He, too, is a Democrat of the first water—an old soldier—beginning life in arms with General Scott; bred in the camp, his opinion is entitled to weight—much weight. And doubtless those other gentlemen of the board are greatly distinguished and learned in the science of arms and the strategics of war. In reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Oregon, as to the ingratitude of the country and Congress, I concur with them fully. The Congress is in fault in not having appreciated General Wool, and many other distinguished officers who have fought and bled for the country. But that is no argument against the passage of this resolution. Do you believe that Ben McCullough, the distinguished captain so honorably alluded to by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LANE] on yesterday, if he were here, would oppose this resolution? No, sir-ee! [Laughter.] If the country be ungrateful upon one occasion, is it any reason why it should be ungrateful upon another? That would be a strange sort of logic. The fact that the country refuses to-day to do its duty is no reason that it should refuse to-morrow to do it. Congress has signally failed to do its duty in this matter. But let us begin. This is as good a time as any, and we are beginning, in my opinion, at a very proper point.

NATIONAL INGRATITUDE—REWARDS.

Mr. Chairman, national ingratitude will always be visited with proper retribution. If you refuse to reward your military men, you make them sullen, silent, and gloomy—panting for honors which you refuse to them—they may desert your flag and drive you to the necessity of throwing yourself upon newer men, more untried soldiers. The true policy of nations and of princes, is to reward merit at all times. The love and desire of reward is insatiate in man's heart. It is exhibited in the child whose little mouth is upturned to receive its mother's approving kiss; in the school-boy in his struggles for the medal; in the student who trims the midnight lamp, and coaxes up the last drop of the oil that can yield him light; and in the man when he is rejoicing over the success of his first achievement. In the days of chivalry, what was a knight without a rose—what was knighthood without a lady's smile? This word "reward," embodies in it a greater and loftier word—excelsior, which lifts a man above the common places of earth, and inspires him to the loftiest pursuits. Reward is the nurse of ambition, and what would life be worth without ambition?

Your mere politician may plod through life, and, if he be a reasonable man, only expect a seat in Congress as his reward. Unless he has extraordinary qualities, or uncommon luck, that is as high as he can reasonably expect to climb; but he faces no bullets, (except paper bullets,) he storms no fortresses, (except the groceries.) But blood and peril demand to be paid in pleasures and rewards. There, sir, is the difference between the deserts of a military man and a mere politician.

With the kind attention of the committee, I could now demonstrate, Mr. Chairman, that all the nations of the earth, from the beginning of time, have been in the habit of rewarding their military men to the utmost extent. But I must crowd the history of the past into this phrase, while I make particular allusion to the lately-deceased Duke of Wellington, who has occupied much of the attention of the people of the earth so recently.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON'S PROMOTIONS.

I desire to show you that with less military capacity, with fewer military achievements and fewer military difficulties, the Duke of Wellington has been rewarded a thousand times more than General Scott—living in the same age—but under a more enlightened and more liberal, and a more grateful Government than ours: I mean as to military matters. I show that the secret is known to the Powers of England. They know the sources of their success in arms; and that secret is the reward they bestow upon their military heroes. The Duke of Wellington was promoted at a very early age, and he never made a military movement upon any occasion without receiving a promotion. He was sent as a colonel to the East Indies, and after a few skirmishes there, rising grade by grade, he was made a major general on the 2d of April, 1802. Here is a list of his commissions when he was a young man. The first commission of colonel was conferred on the 3d of May, 1796, that of major general on the 2d of April, 1802, that of lieutenant general on the 25th of April, 1808, that of general in Spain and Portugal 1811, and that of field marshal in 1813. This is rapid promotion for a military man, and he sometimes received two or three promotions for a single military display. The achievements of Wellington in the East deserve but the name of mere military skirmishes. He there contended with untutored barbarians, yet he was made a field marshal before 1813. After his return he had the marshals of France to contend with. He won some very clever victories in France, but nothing more brilliant than we see in the career of General Scott, except the battle of Waterloo. I will read as a matter of curiosity a list of the promotions of the Duke of Wellington.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] yesterday said something about hereditary titles and the heraldry of nobility. In referring to the promotions of the distinguished Duke, of course I do not wish to follow the example of England in conferring titles of nobility, but I wish merely to show that his promotions were given on account of military achievements:

"His commission of colonel was conferred on the 3d of May, 1796; that of major general, 2d of April, 1802; of lieutenant general, 25th April, 1808; of general in Spain and Portugal, 31st July, 1811; of field marshal, 21st June 1813."

These promotions followed his skirmishes in the East, and before his achievements in France

"He embarked for Europe on the 10th of March, 1805, the Trident frigate, after having received, from the officers of the army he had commanded, the merchants of Calcutta, and the native inhabitants of Seringapatam, highly gratifying and substantial tokens of admiration and esteem. The officers of the Army subscribed for a gold vase, to be inscribed with the name of his great victory, Assye; this was subsequently changed to a service of plate; the merchants of Calcutta presented him with a sword valued at a thousand guineas; and, a far more honoring tribute than these, the native people of Seringapatam presented him with an address, containing a prayer to the God of all castes and colors,' to bless and reward him for his just and equal rule in the Mysore. He had been previously, on the 1st September, 1804, created a Knight Companion of the Bath, and was consequently now Sir Arthur Wellesley, K. C. B."

Soon after he was voted a sum of £200,000 sterling. But here to-day, in the American Congress, you have stickled at voting fifty dollars a month to the widow and children of General Worth, one of the most gallant officers of your Army. That is American gratitude?

How soon you forget your great battles. I remember a place called Monterey. There was once a fight there, thought at the time to have brought some glory to the American arms. I remember a leader after long and continuous fighting, storming the Bishop's castle, with his bright sword and red plume flashing amid the smoke and fire of the furious conflict, himself heading the charge, and closing a great victory. That was General Worth. Will you count by dollars and cents the value of such glorious deeds, and pause at the proposition to take adequate care of the widow and orphans of such a hero?

But let us go on with the history of the promotions of the Duke of Wellington. For the battle of Talavera,

"On the 10th of February, 1810, the Commons voted Lord Wellington a pension of £2,000 a year, with succession for two generations."

Again:

"In 1811, Lord Wellington received the thanks of the British Crown and Parliament for the liberation of Portugal."

* * * * * * *

"On the 12th of August following, Wellington made his triumphant entry into Madrid amidst the acclamations of the inhabitants, and was immediately afterwards appointed generalissimo of the Spanish armies. On the 18th of the same month he was created Marquis of Wellington by the Prince-Regent of England." * * * *

"In the beginning of 1813, the Marquis of Wellington, upon whom the colonelcy of the royal regiment of Horse-guards had been previously conferred, was created a Knight of the Garter. He visited Cadiz, and sailed thence to Lisbon, where he was received by the population with great enthusiasm." * * * "Honors and rewards were thickly showered about this time upon the triumphant British general. One hundred thousand pounds for the purchase of an estate had been voted him by the English Parliament, and he was now created by the Spanish authorities Duque de Ciudad Rodrigo, and a grandee of Spain of the first class. The estate of Soto de Roma, of which the unhappily celebrated Prince of Peace had been despoiled, was bestowed upon him by the Cadiz Cortes, 'in testimony of the gratitude of the Spanish nation.' He accepted the gift, but the proceeds of the estate were devoted during the war to the public service." * * * *

"Their renowned commander was created, on the 3d of May of that year, Marquis of Douro and Duke of Wellington; and in June £400,000, making, with the previous grant of £100,000, half a million of money, was awarded him by the House of Commons. On the 28th of the same month, the Duke took his seat in the House of Peers, and subscribed to the parliamentary roll, the patents of all his titles having been first read by the officer of the House."

Well, sir, I could go on with a still longer list of these promotions. It is true that Wellington was an English general, but I apprehend that he was no better than an American general. He achieved these high honors by his military exploits alone.

"On the final evacuation of France on the 1st of November, 1818, he returned to England, and soon afterwards entered Lord Liverpool's cabinet as master-general of the ordnance. An extra grant of £200,000 was voted him in 1815, making in all £700,000 in money, besides the pension of £2,000 a year, and many lucrative appointments bestowed upon him by the Government—an amount of pecuniary reward as unexampled as the military services it recompensed."

I do not mean to say that the history of these promotions forms an argument conclusive in favor of the passage of this resolution, but is it anything extraordinary that we should ask for its passage? Is this the first time that an effort has been made to reward an American chieftain. Eleven thousand acres of land were donated to Lafayette by the Congress of the United States, and $200,000 in money besides. It is true that Lafayette afforded us very great aid in the great struggle which made us free. I do not offer this as an argument why this resolution should pass, but I ask, in connection with the fact, if it is extraordinary that this proposition should be made to an American Congress. I believe I stated that leaving out the battle of Waterloo, I would place General Scott and his battles beside Wellington and his battles. It is not my business to eulogize General Scott; I leave that to other hands; but I cannot forget the history of the country. From Queenstown to the City of Mexico his military achievements have been of the most brilliant, striking character, with few and unimportant reverses. It has been recorded by great men, that the career of General Scott in Mexico, or at least of his army, was unparalleled in modern history.

COMMANDERS-IN-CHIEF NOT EXPECTED TO EXPOSE THEMSELVES.

But some gentlemen say that General Scott was not in the battles at all, that he did not smell gunpowder, and that he was not on the field of danger. I know nothing about the truth of that, but I know that in modern times it is not expected that a commander-in-chief should expose himself, except at times of great emergency. In days of old, when it was a hand-to-hand, hip-and-thigh, and sword-to-sword conflict, then it was necessary and customary for the Cæsars, Alexanders, and Timoleons to mingle in the thickest of the fight; but in modern times, after a man establishes his character for courage, as Napoleon did at Lodi, and Scott at Lundy's Lane—when such men are intrusted with the chief command of armies, they are not expected to mingle directly in the fight. It was the boast of Napoleon Bonaparte, in his old age, that he very rarely had to go into battle. Said he, "I won my battles by my eye, and not by my arms." Lundy's Lane and Chippewa form a fair offset to Lodi. General Scott established a character of courage. It was not necessary that he should expose himself, as commander-in-chief, unless the peril of the occasion required it. I do not care if he was not in the battles. His commands, his strategics, carried out by his gallant officers, gained the battles. Common custom, common decency gives him the honor of the victories, while it takes nothing from any man—not a single laurel which may have been won in the thicker conflict. At the battle of Waterloo, Wellington and Napoleon were both out of danger most of the time, according to true history. It was their duty to be. The fate, not only of France, but of England and all Europe depended upon the decision of the contest. Why, in such an emergency, should the chief be exposed to danger? Napoleon had his place of elevation from which to take his observations, and his commands were given to his subordinates according as the aspects of the field authorized. Sir, an impetuous man is never fit for a chief command. Napoleon knew very well where to place Murat—never at the head of a division, but at the head of a charge. These madcaps are only fit to lead columns upon the plans and judgment of cooler heads. General Scott is entitled to the glory, great as it is, derived from our conquest in the recent war with Mexico, and no effort of historians or legislators can deprive him of it.

Sir, in addition to the merits of General Scott as a military man, he is entitled to the gratitude of his country for his literature. He has enriched the annals of our military department by books of tactics, industriously, skillfully, and scientifically arranged. Grateful France gives Napoleon infinite credit for every little scrap he wrote, whether upon the art of war or anything else. But, as I said before, it is not my business to eulogize General Scott.

OUGHT THIS BE MADE A POLITICAL QUESTION?

Disguise it as you may, the objection to this resolution is political. Gentlemen deceive themselves, no doubt honestly, when they think otherwise. It is said by General Scott's detractors that he cannot make political speeches, and that he is not a great civilian Well, I am not disputing that. Themistocles could not "play the fiddle, but he could make a small town a great city." General Scott cannot make political speeches, but he can win great battles—that is better.

I come now to consider the political aspect of this resolution. I tell the Democracy in all kindness, that they are making a small business of this, and of themselves, by opposing it. I speak it as a friend—not as an enemy; for I challenge any man in this Hall to compare votes with me upon all questions involving Democratic policy. But I cannot make this a political question. Let us inquire if it was made a political question in the Senate.

THE DEMOCRACY OF THE SENATE VOTING FOR THE RESOLUTION.

I here [unrolling a list of the senatorial vote] show you a gallant roll of the standard Democrats in the country, who voted for this bill in the Senate. I begin with Atchison, the President of the Senate; then Butler, of South Carolina; there is General Cass, a long distinguished chief; then I come to Clemens, of Alabama, the mover and father of this resolution—a young statesman, a gallant colonel in the Army in Mexico; a man whose genius has made him a peer among Senators, and whose genuine Democracy has never been disputed except by the slaves of faction. I come then to De Saussure, of South Carolina; is it possible that the South Carolina delegation in this House will vote against this resolution? I come then to the two Dodges, old and young in Democracy—a noble father and a noble son! I come then to Gwin, of California, and then to Hunter, of Virginia. I do not speak of Mr. Hunter as a Senator merely; I speak of him as a prospective Secretary of State—a leader not only of the Democracy, but a leader in the grand councils of the incoming Executive. Is any man ashamed now, upon the question of Democracy, to sit side by side with these men? Then, sir, there is Mason, of Virginia. What will the Virginia delegation do here? Are they a unit in opposition to this resolution? Do they stoop to make it a party question? Then there is General Rusk—a hero worthy of the soil he represents, and a Democrat. He voted for it, too. Then there is General Shields, not only a Democrat, not only a Senator, but a soldier with a bullet through his body, received at Cerro Gordo—the hero of the heights—living through extraordinary mercy, preserved by a miracle, to be permitted to utter the praises of his noble commander in the grandest council of the world. How nobly he does it, with the characteristic magnanimity of an Irish gentleman! What else do you want to make it a Democratic measure? Ah, but there is another side to this picture, which I will present to southern Democrats.

I beg them to view the other side of this picture. There were thirty-four Senators in favor of this resolution, and twelve against it. Who were the twelve? JOHN P. HALE was one of them. I speak of him, not as a Senator merely, but as a competitor of General Scott in the late contest. He voted against this resolution. I come next to the name of Mr. CHASE, of Ohio. He, too, voted against it. I am talking now to southern Democrats. CHARLES SUMNER, also voted against it. Now, the question is, are you willing to sit down with CASS and BUTLER, and SHIELDS and ATCHISON and CLEMENS, or will you squeeze yourselves down between HALE and CHASE? Let southern Democrats choose for themselves, and pardon me if I do the same for myself.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. How did Adams, of Mississippi, vote?

Mr. SMITH. He voted against the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. How did Mr. Seward vote? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. I did not inquire. [Renewed laughter.] I was only looking for Democrats. I wanted to show a Democratic side of the case; that was my argument, and I have not named them all. I find here, Mr. SOULE, another distinguished Democrat, voting for this resolution. And nearly all the Democratic States who voted for General Pierce, have voted, by their Senators, for this resolution!

Well, now, Mr. Chairman, in this aspect of the case, I ask the Democracy what they expect to make by opposing this resolution? What great political effect is this opposition to achieve?

There was something said about magnanimity yesterday. I understood the word magnanimity to be scoffed at, scorned, and scouted in this Hall; but still it remains in the vocabulary of our language, and has a meaning. I heard a gentleman here yesterday use the word "whipped," as applicable to General Scott. If that word (meaning, as it does, to lacerate with stripes) was carefully selected, I think it was ungenerous to use it. Was it liberal, I ask, to go through the vocabulary and select such a degrading phrase? Why not say "defeated?" Everybody understands that, and it would have been respectful.

Well, you have defeated General Scott in an open conflict, and what do you propose to do now? He is not asking anything at your hands. The Democracy at the other end of the Capitol, headed by the Military Committee and advised by a board of distinguished officers of the Army, who were selected at the Senate's request, are asking this honor for General Scott. He is your defeated competitor. How will you treat him? Will you imitate the ancients who put Regulus in a spiked barrel and rolled it down hill? Will you imitate the Romans who chained Jugurtha to the wheels of the triumphal car and dragged him through the streets of Rome and thrust him into a dungeon? Will you send him to a far-off island in the ocean, under a perpetual guard, as the British did the grand Napoleon? How will you treat him? Do you remember the anecdote told of Alexander and Porus, familiar to the school children of the day, but which may be forgotten by politicans: When Alexander defeated and overthrew Porus, the Indian king was brought a prisoner to the conqueror and asked how he desired to be treated? You all remember the answer: "Treat me like a king." The gallant response will never be forgotten. The reward of the gallant response will never be forgotten. He was treated like a king. How will you treat General Scott? Why, treat him like a hero, as he is.

Sir, in all the speeches that have been made here, on this subject, I have not heard a solitary substantial objection to the passage of this resolution. Ah! but gentlemen say he has got glory enough. He has got the history—the record—the "brevet of glory."

REWARDING THE DEAD.

Well, there is something in that. "The brevet of glory" is a beautiful and poetical phrase, for which I am indebted to my young friend from Virginia, [Mr. CLEMENS,] in an incidental remark. We know that when General Scott goes to the grave, he will be rewarded. We cannot look upon the monuments springing up around us in this city, in memory of the great heroic DEAD; we cannot look forward to what is to happen here on the eighth of January, (the inauguration of the Jackson statue,) without being convinced that when he is dead, he will be rewarded. But reward him while he lives. The eyes of the dead cannot see these lofty pillars of renown. The ears of the dead cannot hear the shouts of the living millions. Give him his reward while he needs it. He has now all the advantages of posterity. Posterity is to him, as it is to all, a dream, a fiction to be realized by imagination, if realized at all.

What a satire upon the practice of mankind to neglect merit, is found in the touching incident of the death of the young poet, Keats, who died of a crushed heart, from the scorn of a cold world. Despairing of an immortality which he had really achieved, in the bitterness of his last moments, he dictated his own epitaph:

"Here lies one whose name was writ in water!"

Sir, if you have any rewards to give, let them be given in time.

But you stickle at the pay. Oh! yes—the pay. Well, I do not believe the resolution, in its present shape, would carry pay with it. The pay, if any, must be provided hereafter; but that is a small matter. Many of you, gentlemen, who oppose this resolution upon the ground that it carries extra pay with it, voted last session to give five millions of dollars to a mere steamboat monopoly, to fatten a few New York SNOB PRINCES, and yet now you quarrel over the prospective pay which this grade will probably carry with it. Sir, if it carries the pay, it is right. Give him the money—give him the pay—give him the rank—let your economy be better directed.

I see, Mr. Chairman, from the impatient wag of your hammer, that my hour is about expiring. How much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. Only two minutes.

Mr. SMITH. Then I omit many things, and must pay my respects to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTTER.] He talked yesterday about the "heraldry of nobility," and titles, and mock legislation, and moved an amendment, to insert the word "lord," so as to make it read "Lord Lieutenant General Winfield Scott." Well, now, I merely want to suggest as an amendment to that, the better to suit the taste of that gentleman, to insert after the words "lord lieutenant general," the words "Louis Kossuth alias Alexander Smith." [Great laughter, and cries of "Bravo!" "Bravo!"] The gentleman [Mr. CARTTER] was a hero in the Kossuth contest in this House. Was that mock legislation or not? A member of Congress and a native of this country, advocating the rewarding of a mere runaway governor with honors unheard of and unprecedented before in this Hall, inducing the Congress of the nation to stand up uncovered in the gorgeous presence of that arrogant foreigner, to get a peep at his sword, and a far off-vision of the train of monkeys that made up his foreign suite. The same gentleman, on this occasion, speaks against a resolution conferring on one of his own countrymen a mere military badge of honor, which is dearer to a soldier's heart than anything except a victory! Sir, I think the gentleman from Ohio is a proper man to talk about the "heraldry of nobility," and "mock legislation."

ACQUISITION OF CUBA—CANADA.

SPEECH OF HON. HIRAM BELL,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 10, 1853,

In the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the annexation of Cuba, Canada, &c.

Mr. BELL said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I presume I shall not trespass upon the time of this committee beyond the usual time allotted upon such occasions. I rise now mainly for the purpose of entering my protest before this House, and before the public, in relation to some positions which have been assumed as admitted by honorable members of this House. And I should not consider that necessary, were it not for the fact, that upon former occasions, the popular acquiescence in opinions in relation to, and constructions of former acts of Congress have been considered as an assent to those declarations. We have been told by honorable members of this House, that the people of this country were for annexation of Cuba; that they were for progress; that they were for the extension of the country; and even some have gone so far, without a limit as regards time, as to express themselves in favor of taking the balance of Mexico. That may all be right; but I would inquire of honorable gentlemen who entertain those sentiments, and send them abroad, upon what pretext are we to acquire this territory? Why are we talking about the conquest of Cuba? Perhaps some gentlemen may say that they are not in favor of a war; why, then, are we—the representatives of this nation—sending abroad to the world an expression of the legislative branch of this Government, that we are in favor of taking possession of territory to which we admit we have no right, and to the acquisition of which we have not the shadow of a pretext? I ask you, Mr. Chairman, if that is a portion of the present Democratic creed? Are we in a state of war with Spain? No, sir. On the contrary, we are at peace, and professing the most amicable relations toward that Government. How, then, are we to have an opportunity of accomplishing what it is said upon this floor the people of this country are in favor of? Are we to hatch up some pretext for a disturbance with that country? Why, it would seem to look like it. And, sir, what effect would such a state of things have upon our national character, but to dishonor it in the opinion of all christendom? I stand here, as one of the Representatives of this House, of this nation, and especially of the State from whence I come, to protest against all such doctrines. I tell you, sir,—and in doing so, I would wish to send it abroad throughout the length and breadth of this and other lands,—that these are not the sentiments of the people of this country. They never have been the sentiments of our people, and I trust they never will.

We hear it said in high places that we are to acquire all this territory—that we are to aggrandize ourselves by the acquisition of that which does not now belong to us, and of which there is no possible evidence that we have any right to assume to claim. Why, they say it is our destiny as a nation—our manifest destiny! Why, sir, I have heard of spiritual rappers, and I believe they affect to reveal destiny; but I would like to know if, at this day, we are to risk the future policy of this Government upon the pretended revelations of this class of impostors? If not, shall we sanction these schemes of unlimited annexation of territory, under the plea of "destiny," which have at least as sandy a foundation as those taught by the delusions of the class just referred to? I hope not, sir. But, Mr. Chairman, if we were to pursue and adopt this policy which is suggested as our interest and as our manifest destiny—if we were to assume that we were to become the possessors of Cuba, would it not be well to cast about us before we settled down upon the fact that such is our manifest destiny as a nation, and ascertain how we are going to acquire it? Are we to acquire that island by conquest or by treaty, or other peaceful arrangements? The consideration of these questions requires us to look at the policy the Government must adopt to accomplish the proposed object by either means.

The first is, is it the interest or the duty of this nation to pursue the course of policy recommended by and carried out in the administration of Washington, and the fathers of this country, and continued from the organization of this Government down to the present time; or are we to change that course of policy which has rendered us so prosperous as a nation, and launch our boat upon the wide and boundless ocean of annexation and conquest? We must adopt one or the other. Why, sir, what, in former times, was considered the republican, the democratic, the national doctrines and interests of this country? Was a peaceful administration of the Government repudiated? Were colonial possessions sought? Were entangling alliances with any nations recommended as the policy beneficial to the Republic? No, sir. The opposite policy was inculcated, and practically carried out by the framers of the Government; and in the pursuit of that policy, this nation has grown to be what it is, where every citizen is proud to be known as an American citizen, wherever he may be found. In whatever quarter of the world he may be, those stars and stripes, with their ample folds, protect him, and secure to him his rights. I say the advocates of this new doctrine must adopt one of these two courses of policy. If they are in favor of abandoning the policy of Washington, and of changing the entire policy of the country, and seek by conquest the extension of our territorial limits, and as a consequence withholding the necessary protection and promotion of the interests of our people at home, who have the first claims upon our Government and its sympathies, and who are already under our control,—if they are prepared to say they are in favor of changing the policy, and abandoning the doctrines of Washington and Jefferson, and Madison and Monroe, Adams and Jackson, I trust they will be willing to abandon also all claim to the name they have so proudly heretofore sought to be known by, whether it be Whig or of the old line Democrat.

Again, I would request of those persons who advocate this new policy, to look a little at the results and effects of that policy. Will Cuba be acquired and annexed, and form a part of this Government, without a war? No, sir; the correspondence between the Ministers of France, England, and the Government of the United States has already settled that. Suppose, then, that there were an attempt to acquire it by a war, that war would not be terminated in a month nor a year, when this Government shall be involved with Spain and two of the most powerful nations upon the European continent in such a war. And those Governments have already informed us, through their authorized agents, that they will never consent to the relinquishment or control and government of that island to or by any other nation than Spain. Suppose, however, that all could be accomplished which those visionary gentlemen imagine, would it be the true policy of this Government to acquire this island either by conquest or by peaceful negotiation?

To answer this question I need only refer you, sir, to those who live nearest, to those who appear to be the best informed, and residing in the southern States, to candid men, who say that they consider that the acquisition of Cuba, whether peaceably or by conquest, would be an injury and a curse to this Government. Have they not reason to suppose so? Would Cuba come into this Union as a slave State, or as a non-slaveholding State? And that, sir, brings up the great question, the agitation of which has heretofore endangered the perpetuity of this Union, as we have been told, and which we have no reason to doubt, considering the authority from which it comes, and considering the evidence which we have all around us. We cannot shut our eyes, nor can we close our ears to the evidence on all hands which convinces us that the reagitation of similar questions must shake the nation to its center.

Why, sir, there is hardly any one who contemplates the subject, who looks at the latitude and location of that island, who knows the character of its inhabitants and their capacity, that would doubt for a moment, if it comes into this Union, that it would be a slaveholding territory, although it is urged here by many that we should acquire Cuba and seek to bring it under the control of this Government, because by that means we would have the power and the means of abolishing the slave trade.

That may answer as an excuse for some, with which to satisfy a portion of their constituents. But when I hear it urged by my honorable friend from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] as an argument to the South that they should go against the acquisition of Cuba, because, if that island should be acquired by the United States, the slave trade would be entirely abolished, and as a consequence, the means which they now have of keeping up their proportion of slave labor would cease, and slavery eventually be extinguished; and when I hear a directly opposite reason urged from honorable gentlemen from other portions of the country, I may well hold a doubt of the soundness of those suppositions or arguments, that if Cuba should be admitted, it would either be a free State or secure the abolition of the slave trade.

Mr. Chairman, I would not pretend to say but what the time may come when it may be necessary for this country to hold Cuba; and not only Cuba, but other islands of the ocean, and other countries. I do not know why we should have our attention so exclusively turned to the Island of Cuba. Why, sir, what is there in that island that should absorb our whole attention? If we could have her peaceably, and at our own option, and take her to-day, would it be a blessing to us? I think not. I am bold to declare that I believe that if we could have Cuba without war, with all the advantages and disadvantages to this Government, it would be a curse—an injury, and prejudicial to our institutions.

But, sir, I wish to read the opinions of a southern man, the editor of the Charleston Mercury, as described in his own language, of his opposition to the acquisition of Cuba, even if it could be acquired peaceably. His language is as follows:

"Besides, in what condition would Cuba be to justify her admission into the Union? There is a white population, native to the island, or permanently settled, amounting to near six hundred thousand, (double that of the white population of South Carolina, in a territory little larger than our State,) not one of whom ever exercised a political franchise, or ever took a share in public affairs, other than to submit to the power and shout around the chariot wheels of established authority. We propose to drive out all those who have ever held rule; and of those who have heretofore only had experience of unquestioning submission, we propose to make a democratic republic, and this in the face of two hundred thousand free blacks, and four hundred thousand slaves, freshly imported from Africa. Among all the recent abortive attempts at free governments in Europe, was there a single one commenced under such desperate auspices as this? Is it not absolutely certain that to preserve order in such a community, an army would be necessary? And where there was an army for the purpose of domestic peace and civil rule, could there be a State? Would we admit into the Union a State which had no power of self government, but was in the hands of the United States Army and Navy?"

Here, Mr. Chairman, is the opinion of a southern man, who is well acquainted with the character, the condition, the habits, and the feelings of that people. He says that they are unfit to be attached to this Government, and that those who lay any claims to intelligence and information, are of that class who would be banished from the island, whenever it changed its government.

It is now proposed by the advocates of that measure, that we shall take that class of population, and make them a part and parcel of this country—a class of people worse than slaves, more vicious and less informed—and that is claimed by some to be democratic doctrine. What, attach a class of people, that so far as they have any knowledge, are antagonistic in their principles, their prejudices, and their feelings, to every principle of this republican Government! They come in as copartners! That, sir, may be the democracy of the present day, but it was not the doctrine of our forefathers.

But, sir, there is a country and there is a people competent for self-government, that are prepared to take upon themselves the responsibilities of freemen, and which we may find for our interest to receive among us—I mean peaceably—and allow them to become a part and parcel of this country, and I care not how soon. I refer, Mr. Chairman, to the whole British possessions upon the north, containing an area of two millions two hundred and fifty-two thousand three hundred and ninety-five square miles. There is something worth looking at. here are two millions six hundred and fifty-two thousand of people, bone, as it were, of our bone, flesh of our flesh, deriving their origin from the same Anglo-Saxon source, a large class of them disciplined in that school which is calculated to train them up as independent freemen, and all anxious and ready to come into the possession of the enjoyment of those great principles which we are now enjoying. I say it may be for our advantage to acquire that country and that people, if we can peaceably. They are near three millions, scattered over a large territory, sufficient in extent to make several States, and possessing as healthy a climate, and a large part of it as rich a soil as any in the world. Then, sir, by the accomplishment of that matter, and the attaching it as a part of this Union, you banish all the vast expense of maintaining fortifications upon your northern borders, and save the millions of dollars now thrown away in keeping up your custom-houses upon the borders of the North; you give to yourself the free navigation of that mighty stream of the North, the St. Lawrence. You give to yourself the sole control and command of that channel, and of that bay at its mouth, with the great chain of lakes or inland seas which nature has formed for a ready and direct communication and navigation for the commerce of this northern territory to the ocean; and you welcome near three millions of people, who are like brethren, into this family, to form a part and parcel of this Republic, thereby adding strength and vigor to the body-politic.

Here, sir, is something worth turning the attention of this nation to. Great Britain can have no object in holding the rule over these northern colonies, except national pride.

Meet this question fairly frankly, and say to them, we are not going to war with you for this territory and these people; you have rights to all these. Would not the interests of these great nations be promoted and benefited by your withdrawing all claim to them, or over the territory, and permit these colonies, if they choose, to become a part and parcel of this Government, and link their destinies with this nation?

By the annexation of this territory on the north you would increase your navigation and commercial interest, and the value of every foot of soil in that country fourfold. It is a fact known to those who reside on our northern frontier, that land within Canada of the same quality as land within the United States, separated only by a line of the nature of the one which divides our townships, is only worth about one quarter as much as the land within the United States; and what portion of this Union has a greater interest in the accomplishment of that object than the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Vermont, Maine, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, and New York? Consider for a moment those great lakes to the north, inland seas, surrounded by territory under the control of our own Government, instead of the limit of a midway channel. The accomplishment of that object peacefully will strengthen this Union, and add to its power and influence. The annexation of that territory to this Union (to use terms of gentlemen) Destiny has ordained, and it will ere long take place.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the time will not arrive when it may become necessary for this nation to engage in a war for the acquisition or possession of Cuba, or any other island or territory, for the purpose of preserving and protecting our maritime interests or national rights. But, should that time ever come, whether brought about by European diplomacy or aggression upon our rights by any Power, whether upon this or other continents, I am free to declare that I should wish this Government to act under the circumstances as our national interests and honor should require; and if necessary to preserve these to acquire more territory—Cuba or other territory south or north, without regard to any local interests—I would say as an American citizen, let it be done. But now we are at profound peace with all the nations of the world, and have no cause to quarrel about the possession of Cuba, or any other territory. I am opposed to the agitation of this question at the present time, because I believe it will be a renewal of those exciting scenes witnessed within the past few years. I am well satisfied that no Union man, and especially no man who has felt that he was the advocate of those compromise measures which, it was said, were calculated to preserve the Union, can be in favor of the agitation of questions that will result in bringing about the sectional feeling that existed at the passage of those measures. The annexation, or the attempt to annex Cuba, must inevitably bring up those questions which were pending during the Congress preceding this one, and which were then intended to be settled by the series of measures called the compromise. It will not do to say or imagine that those questions will not arise again under similar circumstances.

I hold that it is the duty of every citizen of our Government, when he sees danger in the advocacy or bringing forward of a particular measure, to point it out at the earliest possible time; and I would, therefore, warn these people, and especially the advocates of the annexation of Cuba, that there is danger in the bringing forward of such a measure before the public mind of this country; for so soon as it is, the exciting question of slavery will be introduced. The slave population of the United States, at this time, have a representation upon this floor equal to that of the States of New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Iowa, Wisconsin, and California; or equal to that of Indiana and Illinois; or equal to the entire representation of the State of Ohio. And the annexation of Cuba would add to the slave representation in Congress equal to four additional members.

Now, however much we may desire—and I claim to be one of those who desire that the laws of Congress shall be faithfully administered and executed, affording equal protection to the rights of citizens of one State, as well as to those of another—that the southern States, their citizens and their property, under their local institutions, as guarantied to them by the Constitution and laws of this country, shall enjoy equal protection with those of the North; still, I say to the advocates of this measure, whether from the North or South, East or West, that the people of the free States never will consent to the addition of slaveholding territory, simply for securing the balance of power or the extension of territory. While they desire to protect their southern brethren in all of their rights, they will oppose the increase of slavery. And why? Because they believe that by becoming responsible as the guardians of additional slave territory, they will act in opposition to the spirit of the Constitution, to the interest of the nation, to the progress of the age, and contrary to their own convictions of duty, and the injunctions of God Almighty. My friend from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] asks whether they did not agree to let Texas in? Surely they did; and why? I trust they were governed by such motives as I would always ascribe to my friend from Georgia. They were not governed by their own desires, but were willing to yield something for the purpose of compromising difficulties, and preserving the rights of all parties.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If similar questions were hereafter to arise, would they not display the same compromising and national spirit?

Mr. BELL. I will endeavor to answer the gentleman's question. He asks me, because we have been liberal, and gone almost beyond the bounds of patriotism—because we have heretofore compromised our prejudices and feelings for the purpose of maintaining the integrity and good feeling of this country, that we shall do the like again. I am not prepared to say what I would not do to preserve this Union, but I would avoid testing the local prejudices of the different sections of this country. When you see breakers ahead, keep the craft near the shore. That is the policy we adopt as individuals, and which we should carry out as a nation. Whenever the question of the annexation of Cuba arises, it will not come alone: it will be accompanied by the question of the annexation of the vast territory to the north, and it may be that the equipoise of additions of territory will do away with apprehended danger. But, sir, I would avoid the alternative of making the experiment.

Mr. Chairman, my honorable friend from Georgia on a former occasion, if I understood him correctly, to quiet the fears that some honorable members might have as to the danger to be apprehended from the annexation of Cuba, said that the principle settled in the compromise act would apply and extend to the acquisition of other territory than that Congress was then acting upon. I enter my protest against any such construction. Nothing was settled by that act but what had reference to the territory then acquired.

Mr. STEPHENS. While I stated that the settlement covered only the territory, yet the principle out of which this controversy grew was settled, and it was that this Government should never interfere at all with the domestic institutions of a foreign State, within a Territory or a State, leaving it for the people in the Territory to manage them as they pleased. That was the principle settled in the compromise; and by adherence to this principle, it will be utterly impossible for a controversy to arise.

Mr. BELL. I understand the gentleman now as I did before. I did not aim to misrepresent him. But where does he get his authority for that assumption, that the Congress preceding this was more wise, patriotic, and had more enlarged views, or were more devoted and attached to this Government and its institutions, than that Congress which framed, adopted, and established the ordinance of 1787, for governing the territory northwest of the river Ohio? Let the fruits of that ordinance speak. Let that mighty Northwest, with its teeming millions of population and its wonderful improvements, speak as to the result and the benefits of that ordinance. There we have an evidence of the fruits and benefits of the wisdom of that ordinance, which said that no slave should live northwest of the Ohio river.

Mr. STEPHENS. That ordinance was not passed by Congress since this Constitution was framed. Not at all. Since the beginning of this Government the great principle in controversy between the North and South was never settled until 1850. The gentleman asks where I got the authority that it was settled. I got it in the act making a Territorial Government in Utah and New Mexico, in which it is expressly declared that the people of these Territories, when they desire to come into the Union, can come in with or without slavery, as they please. As I stated before, it was the first time since the formation of this Government when that principle has been placed upon the records of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. BELL. I repeat, again, that the settlement of that question was a settlement of the then pending questions only, and which will go to the credit of those men who sacrificed their personal predilections for the purpose of compromise. I say that the settlement, as to the organization of these Territories, by its language and by its terms and spirit, was only intended for the present time, and fixing the rights of the people of those Territories as prescribed and limited by the acts adopted. The very meaning of compromise is that a controversy is not settled upon generally recognized principles, but that there is a meeting half way of conflicting views and opinions for the purpose of terminating some particular question. But the gentleman said that the ordinance of 1787 was not passed after the adoption of the Constitution. Does that deteriorate from the wisdom, foresight, and principles of that Congress as recognized by the fathers of this Government? No! They were fresh from Congress Hall—the hall of independence, breathing as it were the spirit of liberty; and millions of human beings will hereafter, as they have before, bless that Congress for laying down the landmarks that forbid slavery within this territory.

But, sir, what says the third and fourth sections of the fourth article of that Constitution that my honorable friend has referred to?

SEC. 3. New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress.

The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

SEC. 4. The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of Government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

Then, sir, according to my construction of that instrument, Congress has full power over her territory to prohibit slavery or not, as the wisdom of that body may determine, and that right has never been changed or taken away by the action of Congress or the people, by any change in our organic law.

I have already addressed the committee longer than I intended. When I heard the remarks of my friend from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] of the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. LANE,] and the gentleman from California, [Mr. MARSHALL,] I only had it in view to rise and enter my protest, as one of the members of this House, against their construction of that compromise.

Mr. STEPHENS. Perhaps the gentleman was never a friend to it.

Mr. BELL. My honorable friend from Georgia knows that I had not the honor of a seat in this House at that time. Had I been a member here at the time—for I have nothing to conceal, and those who know me here will give me that credit, at least—I should not have voted for all of those measures known as the compromise acts.

Mr. STEPHENS. That is what I expected.

Mr. BELL. There is nothing new about that. But, sir, if the question was now pending whether that law, which was considered the most objectionable, should now be repealed, I should say no. As I have said to my constituents, give us peace, give us quiet, although there are some things in that act which I believe wrong, and contrary to principles of justice. But I would forego those objections, and I would not agitate the subject. I would not now repeal the act, but give it a fair trial.

Mr. STEPHENS. What are those great principles?

Mr. BELL. I have not time to answer my friend. They will show for themselves. When I said I have nothing to conceal, is it because the compromise acts appear to have become popular, and I could easily fall in with the popular cry. No; I will do what I believe to be right if I stand alone; and when I say I would not agitate it, but let it remain for the present, this opinion may run counter to the views of many of my constituents. But I tell you the views of the great mass of my constituents, and of the people generally in my State, are, let it alone until it has a fair trial. What I desire now is, that those who claim to be such warm friends of the compromise, as well as those who opposed them, shall, by the influence of their votes and voices, prevent the agitation of similar questions, which gave rise to so much excitement and recrimination of feeling.

Mr. Chairman, there are some other questions that have been discussed before this committee that I should like to say something about, but my time has nearly expired, and I can only refer to them briefly. I regret, sir, that some of the opponents of the measure proposing to confer the title of lieutenant general upon General Scott, have deemed it necessary in their opposition to attack or consider the private character of that old veteran hero. For it is hard to entirely separate, in this country, the public and private character of our citizens and officers; and the history and public character and services of General Scott, for the last forty years, have become a part and parcel of the history of this Government. His services and sacrifices are known to the people of this country, and the more they are canvassed and examined, the higher will they be appreciated by his countrymen. Although he has been defeated for the high civil office for which his political friends had placed him in nomination, yet there has been instances before of temporary defeat being the harbinger of final success.

Some honorable members have given vent to their indignation before the committee in attacks upon the present Administration, as well as General Taylor's, in regard to our foreign relations. But, when the official papers are brought forward, it appears that all the charges they prefer against General Taylor or President Fillmore's administration, if they have any foundation at all, are applicable only and apply to their own friends and their own party, and that the present, as well as General Taylor's Cabinet, have, with master wisdom, maintained our interests and foreign relations with a watchful care and truly American spirit. But why, sir,—since the elections are over, and there is now no longer any political capital to be made,—why all these unfounded charges, and of a character that should only be expected preceding a great political campaign for political effect? I will tell you.

The triumphant party in the last political struggle, now made up of not only the Democratic party proper, but of all the discordant elements in professed political creeds in the country,—brought together upon the celebrated Baltimore platform, and in which each section claims a plank, and brought upon that platform by the cohesive power of the love of office, and not by any great principle that they held in common,—this new party are about to take upon themselves the entire responsibility of the administration of this Government, executive as well as legislative, the latter of which they already have. This party of the last canvass, having advocated as many different political doctrines as there are different sections or localities of the country, know well that all of their different and antagonistic political theories cannot be adopted and carried out by the incoming Administration. Hence the necessity of getting up new issues and talking about any and everything, but especially to make some charge against the Administration, to turn the attention of the people from the acts of the Democratic party, or in other words, the Pierce party, until after there should be a division of the spoils, and prevent a disruption of their party. Such a game, however, will not take this time. I would just say to our Democratic friends on the other side of the House, employing the terms used by some, that "destiny" has settled the question that their party is to be divided and broken up about as soon as it was formed, and before half of four years shall roll around.

Mr. Chairman, some honorable members upon the other side of the House have spoken about the defeat and disbanding of the Whig party. It is true, sir, we have been defeated, but not conquered. No person is deserving the name of Whig, unless he can bear defeat in defending his principles. I believe it to be the duty of the Whigs, as well as every other citizen, to sustain an Administration, whether of our friends or opponents, in all measures we think are calculated to promote the interest of our common country; as well as to oppose all that we believe prejudicial. The Whig party dead? No, sir—No, sir! As long as the principles of Washington and our revolutionary sires are revered and esteemed—as long as our republican form of Government shall last—the Whig party will continue to exist, to support and maintain those principles—sustain and support the Republic and our glorious institutions.

LIEUTENANT GENERAL, &c.

SPEECH OF HON. C. SKELTON,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 10, 1853.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1854—

Mr. SKELTON said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I propose, upon this occasion, to avail myself of the latitude usually allowed in this committee, for the discussion of subjects not immediately under consideration. My apology for thus departing from what I conceive to be the correct rule with regard to the business of this House is, that the propositions which I design to discuss on this occasion are about to be thrust before this House without an opportunity of discussing them when they are presented. I am, therefore, placed in this position, that I have either to avail myself of the latitude allowed in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or to forego entirely an expression of sentiment upon questions which I believe to be of vital importance to the best interests of my country.

Sir, we have for some days past had a proposition pending before this House, by a motion for a suspension of the rules, to introduce a bill from the Senate, which has passed that body by a large majority, granting the title of lieutenant general to General Scott. I propose, sir, if my time will admit of it, briefly to glance at that proposition, and one or two other propositions now pending before the Senate, and which are likely to be presented to this House before the close of the present session—propositions which stand connected together, embracing one general principle of policy, and tending to and aiming at the same end. I speak of the bill granting the title of lieutenant general, of the bill pending in the Senate creating a retired list in our Army and Navy, and of another proposition which has been recently introduced into the Senate to increase the salaries of our foreign ministers. One or all of these propositions, I propose very briefly to discuss—all of them if my time will permit.

Mr. Chairman, in discussing the proposition to grant the title of lieutenant general to General Scott—for it is understood that the office or the honor will be conferred upon him if the bill shall pass this House—I do not propose to enter into any consideration of the merits or demerits of General Scott as a military commander. A question in regard to the merits or demerits of General Scott is not one that I believe would be appropriate to this House at the present time. General Scott is an American general, known to the American people. He is an individual to whose reputation the future historian of our country will do justice, and, for that reason, whatever remarks I may make will not be considered as personal to General Scott, either asserting or denying his merits or demerits. I object to this proposition as a precedent—as a great leading measure in the policy of this great American Republic. The only argument that I have heard urged here in favor of granting this honor to General Scott is, that all the other American generals who were engaged in the late war with Mexico have been rewarded by higher titles, and that he alone has not received any higher title or honor from the American Government. Well, sir, just look at that proposition, and see where it will lead you to. General Scott has heretofore received the highest military title that is known to the laws of the United States. Why, sir, with the same propriety you might urge the granting of a higher title to a faithful President. When a man is elected to the Presidency of the United States, he has attained the top of the ladder; and if you desire to create new titles and honors for the reward of eminent services, you will be compelled to add to the title of President that of Emperor. Our republican institutions, sir, know no titles of honor. We give names to our military officers because names are necessary; hence, we call General Scott major general. He has now the highest military position that can be conferred upon him by the American people—that of Commander-in-Chief of the American forces.

But, asked a gentleman upon this floor, the other day, if you do not confer additional titles and honors, and do justice to our military commanders, will our military commanders fight the battles of our country? I ask that gentleman if General Scott has been fighting for the title of lieutenant general? Would General Scott have fought the battles of his country better if he had been sure that title would have been conferred upon him? Is it for empty titles that our generals fight? Sir, if so, the sooner we get rid of them as a class the better. They are not republicans if they fight for titles of distinction, for empty titles and honors. The American nation knows no honorary titles. We abhor them as anti-democratic, and in contravention with our republican institutions.

Sir, is it necessary that this title should be created at the present time, to improve and to benefit the military service of our country? If it was—if a useful purpose to the interests of the country could be accomplished by it, I should be willing to entertain the proposition and to consider it. But, sir, we are in a state of profound peace. General Scott has all the power as commander-in-chief that can be conferred upon him even with higher titles and honors. Hence, the proposition, stripped and presented in its true aspect, is one simply to flatter the vanity of a man who is now at the head of the American Army. Sir, it is beneath the American nation to flatter the vanity of any man. Render to every man the meed of just praise for his deeds of daring and bravery, but withhold that which creates vanity and elevates a man above his true position and his country.

But, sir, this proposition embraces a very important political principle. Our country is but in its infancy. Our republican institutions and our Government, although we possess immense power and resources, are yet in their forming stage. Shall we as an American people be true to our principles of integrity, humility, honesty and republicanism; or shall we go abroad to the rotten nations of the Old World and take pattern after the monarchies of Europe that have for ages oppressed and crushed the laboring masses of the nations? This is the question presented to the American people: Shall we administer our Government with simplicity and economy—giving to every man a just meed of praise, and empty titles to none; or shall we go on worshipping military glory and military heroism, and departing from the straightforward, upright path of republican simplicity? Why, sir, who will hesitate a moment to condemn these things? How have we got them? From whence have we obtained them? The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SMITH] gave us a succinct history of the life and services of the great English general, the Duke of Wellington, showing with what rapidity the British Government heaped titles and honors upon him, and not only titles and honors, but emoluments and wealth sufficient to have broken the back of any man save General Scott or Lord Wellington.

Sir, the British Government piled upon Wellington an immense revenue, drawn from the hard earnings of the laboring masses of England, to fatten and pamper him in luxury and idleness. Now, sir, shall we follow in the footsteps of these our illustrious predecessors, or shall we mark out for ourselves a path of American republicanism—a path in which we have no honorary distinctions of this kind?

Why, sir, what was the notion of our forefathers who framed our glorious Constitution, upon this subject? We find a clause in that Constitution to this effect: "No titles of nobility shall be granted by the United States." What means this? Why did our forefathers thus frame the Constitution of our glorious Union? Was it right? Yes, sir, it is one of the wisest provisions, in my opinion, of that most memorable instrument which the history of the world has ever seen. Sir, we should adhere to the native simplicity of that instrument. General Scott is commander-in-chief of the American forces. Millard Fillmore is President of the United States. We know Millard Fillmore only by the title of President of the United States. Why not call Millard Fillmore "lieutenant President of the United States," or "lord lieutenant President of the United States," or "lord lieutenant of the United States," or, if it will flatter your vanity still more, why not call him "Emperor" of this great and mighty empire? Why should we not do all these things? Simply for this reason: that it is in contravention of republican institutions, and that its tendency is to overthrow and destroy liberty.

Why, sir, this proposition not only confers an empty title at the present time, but it places our military force in such a position that in future it will be attended with future additional expenditures of the people's hard earnings. That is another objection which I have to it. Will any gentleman here contend that the organization of the American Army would be promoted by such a title? Is there any gentleman upon this floor who will contend that it is necessary in order to establish discipline and command the obedience of the American forces? No, sir. The organization of the Army would not be at all improved by it, and hence we are only being guilty of the folly of creating an empty title and increasing the expenditure of the people's money.

These pensions and titles, in my opinion, are destructive of the liberties of any nation. They have, it is true, to a certain extent, been granted by this Government. We are now in the early history of this Government, but we are nevertheless tending to the same path which has been traveled by the monarchies of Europe. Look at the pensioned nobility of those countries. Look at the pension lists that are now loading down the productive energies of the great mass of the laborers of Europe. Look at the people of the French nation especially—worshiping military glory and casting their liberties from them—throwing their republican form of government from them, merely for the sake of having a nephew of their great military lord reign over them. And are we not tending in the same way? Are these propositions not of the same stamp? May they not be placed in the same political category? We are traveling in the same path, and I ask the American Congress to pause before they take another step in this downward course. What, sir, does any sensible man want with honorary titles—these empty baubles? Do they add anything to his fame as a hero, a statesman, or a patriot? Cannot the American people judge of a man by his merits without his titles? If they cannot, then titles are pernicious; and if they can, then they are useless, and should not be conferred. We are too apt to be dazzled with the blaze of military glory.

There is something attractive in the fact of a man going on to the battle-field, and exposing himself to the deadly shot of the cannon and musket; there is something terrific in the thought of a man meeting man with the steel, in deadly conflict, to shed each other's blood. It is a manifestation of bravery and daring which attracts and dazzles; but look at it—look at it stript of the charm which is thus thrown around it, and what do you see? Is the military the only field where bravery may be manifested? Is that the only place where true courage can be displayed? No, sir; the martial music, the shouts of triumph, and the approbation of the country which always follow a successful campaign, stimulate a man on to the battle-field. The disapprobation of his comrades, when he shrinks from fighting bravely, and many considerations of this sort, inspire in him a sort of artificial courage, when true courage may be absent.

But if I want to find a truly brave man, I will go—not to the battle-field, where there are so many witnesses, and where a man is sure to meet with the plaudits of a mighty nation—where his deeds are sure to meet the approbation of his fellow-citizens throughout the land;—I would go where I have seen men go, to the place where the "pestilence wasteth at noonday"—where contagious disease rages through families, and even throughout whole countries. Let a man go there, and let him, unobserved, save by the victim who falls in silence—struck down by the dread destroyer—let him expose his life there, day after day, and night after night, without any of his companions to stimulate his courage to bravery, and without the incentive of a hope of glory as a reward, and there you will find true bravery. There is a bravery which is not artificial—which is not excited by the shouts of the multitude, but prompted by the inward workings of a courageous heart—and by the feelings of humanity. But, sir, do such men receive the titles, honors, and distinctions of our country? No, sir, I have seen such men go down to their grave in neglect and want; their bravery and usefulness forgotten, save by those who have shared in the benefits of their kind offices.

It is these considerations which make me object to this principle of making military glory the only passport to position in society. There are other positions where men manifest their bravery. Look at the poor mechanic, who supports his family, depending upon him for subsistence, toiling on, day after day, and night after night, draining his very heart's blood for the purpose of supporting those by whom he is surrounded—refusing and rejecting the temptations to dishonesty to satisfy the wants of his starving children. There, there, sir, is true bravery. I have seen the mechanic, year after year, toil on; I have told them myself, "You are sinking prematurely to your graves." "No matter," was the reply, "the only question which presents itself is, Shall I sacrifice my life to educate and support my family, or shall I dastardly shrink from a duty which is by nature imposed upon me?" and I have seen them sink.

Now, what do you propose to do? To overlook all the merits of all the civilians, laborers, and statesmen—to overlook all these, and all others, and to recognize only one class of persons in the American nation, as deserving the honors and distinctions to be bestowed by the American people; and that one class—the soldiery. What would you think of Benjamin Franklin, or George Washington, appearing before the American Congress, and asking for a title? What would you think of it? What did you think of Washington, when the title of King was offered him by the American Army? And what did he say upon that occasion? He spoke like a true and honest man. He spoke like a sensible man and true republican. "No, sir," said he; "you purchased your liberties by a contest of seven years, the most frightful that ever man went through. You have now attained your liberties, and you are about to do—what? You are about to destroy them for the purpose of conferring upon me the title of King Washington." He knew full well that the simple title of George Washington would descend down through the historic pages of time, and be more honored, more venerated, and more elevated than any emperor, king, or monarch, on whom the sun has ever shone. It is his. It is his alone. It belongs to America. It belongs to the Father of his Country. The titles of emperor, king, and monarch, have been conferred upon thousands, but that title which signifies so much in that great man is simply George Washington.

Now, will General Scott be satisfied with the title of Winfield Scott? Has he ennobled that name? Has he elevated the title of Winfield Scott to a position in the history of his country, that will be significant of deeds of daring and bravery? Then he should be satisfied with the name of Winfield Scott. It is his alone, and cannot be asserted by any other man after him, nor can it be asserted by any man who has preceded him. Why, sir, when we propose to confer this title upon George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, and a host of others, it shows up the whole thing in its naked deformity, and becomes too ridiculous to be discussed by the American Congress. If it had not been that the proposition has not been really entertained, and has been really asked—and when I say it, I feel my cheek tingle with shame—has been voted by the American Senate—I could not have believed that that august body would have stooped to such consummate folly as to confer an empty title upon a military hero. Let those who aspire to distinctions and honors endeavor to merit them, and let them be satisfied with the praise which will ever be conferred by a grateful American people.

So much, then, for the first part of my subject, which I proposed to discuss at the commencement of this rambling discourse.

Following upon the heels of this proposition comes another of similar import, marking out the future course of our country in regard to those matters of war. It is one which more eminently than the one I have just noticed, marks the downward tendency of this Government. It is to select from the Army and Navy a number of officers to be pensioned by the Government during the remainder of their lives, out of the hard earnings of the American people. Look at the proposition. There it stands. A petty aristocracy, set apart from the great mass of the American people to consume the hard earnings of the laborious multitude. Will the people of the country ever tolerate such a proposition? I admit that there is one merit in this proposition, and only one that I can see. But I think I can propose a remedy for the evil which would be far better than that provided in this proposition. It has been, I believe, universally admitted upon the floor of this House and upon the floor of the Senate, that we have a large number of American officers now in the Army and Navy who are entirely useless in service and absolutely an incumbrance to the officers in the Army. I say this has been universally admitted. It is notorious to everybody that there are a large number of officers upon the retired list who are receiving their half-pay, in order to be ready to go forth to command the soldiers in our Army if the exigencies of the country should ever require it. But these men, as I said before, are unfit for command; many of them made so by their indolent habits; many by their habits of licentiousness, and many by their habits of drunkenness. They are neither fit to command in the Army, nor are they fit to command a national vessel upon the high seas.

Now I admit that some proposition should be brought forward by which the American people should be rid of these officers—these burdens upon them—those festering sores upon the Army, for all purposes of national defense. But shall we pension men who have disqualified themselves for the discharge of their duties? Shall we retain them in the public service for their lifetime, because they have made themselves drunkards, and thereby rendered themselves unfit for the discharge of their duties?

Why, sir, what do we do in the other portions of our public service? Do we employ men here upon the extension of this Capitol at seventy-five cents a day, and when the appropriations run out, place them upon half pay, in order to keep them for whatever may spring up? You have refused to make an appropriation to keep them at work, much less to give them half pay. Why is this? Is it because the sympathies—and I say it with regret—of the American Congress are in favor of the officers and grandees of the nation, and not in favor of the working classes? We have not been able to wake up a single spark of sympathy for the poor toiling laborer, who gets not one half enough to supply his natural wants when employed.

Why, the men who draw out from the Treasury thousands upon thousands annually, when they become disabled, and unfit, from drunkenness and licentiousness, to discharge their public duties, what then? Why, provide a retired list, and set themselves up as an aristocratic class over the heads of the laboring mass of the American nation. Out upon such democracy! Out upon such republicanism! If this is to be the future path of our nation; if this is to be the future policy of our country, I proclaim here to-day, that the choice between republicanism and monarchy is not worth the choosing. If we are to be cursed by an idle, licentious nobility, and robbed for the purpose of fitting them for that position, it will be no better for the American nation than if we had a king to rule over us.

It is for this reason that I have considered it my duty, when these measures are presented to the American Congress, to express not only to that Congress, but to the nation, and particularly to the district which I wish to represent honestly, what is going on in the American Congress, and what I believe will be the effect of this disastrous and criminal course of procedure. Why, sir, I know something about them, because I have the honor of appointing a gentleman to a seat in the Military Academy at West Point, and I happen to know that a great many of the people of my district were anxious to get their sons into that establishment, and consider it a very great favor to get a son educated at the national expense, who, when he graduates, comes out an officer.

But, sir, I took one from the mechanic's bench, and placed him in that institution, and I hope he will reflect honor and credit upon himself and his country some day or other. But when he comes out, he will receive better pay than he could have realized as a mechanic. He will be able to lay by more money than he would be able to do, were he to continue a mechanic, and yet not be compelled to work half as hard. And in addition to that, sir, he is placed in a higher circle of society, by the false notions—which I regret to say, prevail in this American Republic—that an officer is more respectable than a mechanic. I say by the false notions of society he is placed in a higher social circle, and paid better wages; and then, sir, if he disqualifies himself by drunkenness or idleness or any other means, for performing the duties assigned to him by the nation, shall we place him, after educating him, after having paid him well for his services, after he has squandered his income, which ought to have given him a competency in his old age,—shall we then pension him upon the American people, in a class of noblemen, educated for the American Army? No, sir. Out upon such republicanism! Out upon such injustice! It is downright robbery of the American people, to speak in plain English.

But, sir, are these the men we are to depend upon for the defense of our liberties? Are these the men that are to defend our territory from foreign invasion? No, sir, these are not the men.

Suppose to-morrow war is declared by any foreign Power, and where will the United States Government look for the defenders of our liberties and honor? Why, sir, they will look to the farmers and to the mechanics' workshops. They will look to those classes of American citizens, and those will be the men who will be compelled to fight our battles, and defend our liberties; and allow me to say, sir, that these are the only classes of men upon whom we can rely on such occasions.

What are standing armies? What is this military nobility? Look at the history of the world. They have always been ready to sell their country's liberties to the highest bidder; but not so with the great mass of the American people, who all have a common stock in that liberty. We all fight for ourselves when we fight for our country, and we will refuse to sell our country's liberty, because we sell our own therewith. But not so with the professional soldier.

Sir, the policy I would pursue, and have the Government pursue, would be to detract from no man's real merits. Reward merit wherever you find it. Judge a man by his deeds and leave empty titles to kings, fools, and knaves, and not insult a free independent nation like this by conferring these empty symbols upon the American people.

Our Government was established for the advancement, the prosperity, and the happiness of the people. It was not established for the benefit of a ruling military dynasty, nor for a military nobility, nor do we want to convert our happy Republic into a military Republic, to cut the throats of our neighbors, and to destroy the liberties of our own citizens.

Sir, when we turn our eyes from the true path of prosperity for our country, we become derelict to our duties as American statesmen. We should promote intelligence, virtue, industry, honesty, integrity, and all the virtues which tend to ennoble a people. We should develop the industrial resources of our country by wise and judicious legislation. We should maintain peace with all the nations of the earth, as far as can be done compatibly with the honor and interest of the American nation. But when, at any time, our rights and liberties shall be invaded by a foreign or domestic foe, we should then be ready as one man, and an united nation, to hurl the tyrant, who would invade our liberties, from this continent.

I am no soldier; I admit: but let any foe plant his foot upon our soil, and I guaranty to this House, that every man would shoulder his musket for the purpose of defending his home, his fireside, his children, and to protect the honor of his glorious ancestors.

If you want a proposition for strengthening and improving the military arm of our country, I would propose that we reward merit by throwing open the ranks of promotion to the common soldier. If you want to stimulate men to deeds of bravery, whenever you find a brave man upon the decks of your vessels-of-war, let him be promoted; let him be advanced to position. Sir, this proposition would give greater power and energy to the American Army, and to the American Navy, than ten thousand lieutenant generals to domineer over the great mass of the soldiers that fight our battles. How did Napoleon Bonaparte acquire his distinction, and his mighty power, as a military hero? Why, he rewarded merit. Monarch and Emperor as he was, when he found a brave and worthy private man in the ranks of the Army, or the Navy, he immediately selected that man for promotion, and advanced him, step by step, as far as his merits would warrant his promotion. But when a man degraded himself by cowardice, or drunkenness, or vice of any kind, then Napoleon cashiered the man.

But, sir, what stimulus is there to the soldier, the marine, or the sailor, on board your national ships, to fight the battles of the country? He may fight as bravely as Julius Cæsar, or any other brave man, and he is a sailor and marine still. He never can have his shoulder braced by a gold epaulet, or his cap by the towering feather that crown some of our distinguished men at the present day. Never, never. His country closes its ears to the demands of his merits. But if he enters as a midshipman—a more respectable position, according to the silly false notions of society—then the rank of promotion is open to him, and he is sure of promotion; and according to the proposition pending in the Senate, he is sure of pay for life, be he ever so degraded, or mean, or vile.

There is another proposition, Mr. Chairman, which I shall be obliged to glance at very briefly, as I do not wish to occupy the attention of the House in an unnecessary debate.

As I remarked before, following upon the footsteps of its "illustrious predecessor," the bill for conferring the title of lieutenant general, comes the retired list, and then the bill for increasing the salaries of our foreign ministers. Why, sir, I have recently read in the public journals that a man cannot sustain himself with dignity as a foreign minister on $9,000 a year, and $9,000 outfit. A man cannot shine with that sum, like the ministers of foreign courts. What does all this mean? Is it necessary, when you send a man to a court of Europe, that you should send a golden calf? If that is so, make a golden calf, and set him up there. It would be less expensive, as he would eat nothing, or drink either. Or is it better that you should send a man with brains; a man of intellect; a man of force of character, who can meet the diplomatists of Europe with superior intelligence? What is it to command respect throughout the world? Is it the golden calf—the towering feather—and the shining epaulet? Is it the drunken bacchanalian feasts, given by our foreign ministers on European shores? Is it these things which command respect? No, sir. Men are not quite such fools as they appear to be, in some particulars at least. Show me a man of superior intellect, and I will show you a man who will command respect wherever he goes.

Look at one of our humble citizens, who went over into Germany. I refer to Count Rumford. Though he was poorly clad, though he made no professions, though he had no title, nor towering feather in his cap, nor shining epaulet upon his shoulder, the King, seeing that there was merit there, immediately selected him as one of his Prime Ministers, and placed him in an elevated position, in order to retain his services. And, sir, at this day the humble name of Rumford, who went from one of the eastern cities to Europe, and afterwards became a count, is more honored throughout the world by the glorious achievements of his superior intellect than all the titles which could ever be conferred upon him would make it. Such men's names are passports everywhere. Commanding intellect, intelligence, and virtue will command respect everywhere; and I would say to those of the American people in humble positions, to the American mechanic, who is looked down upon with contempt by his more lofty neighbors, Stand erect as men, and if you discharge your social duties with fidelity and integrity, you equal as a man the best in the nation who may glitter in gold and purple, and roll in a lordly carriage. I do not want to be understood as disposed to the founding of artificial distinctions in society, and arraying one class against another; but I do wish that the industrious, virtuous, and intelligent shall be elevated to positions of respectability and authority, where their merits demand they should stand. But shall we increase the salaries of our foreign ministers, that they may ape the fooleries of foreign courts? Do you not see the consummate folly of such an attempt? Can you find intelligent—really intelligent men capable of competing with Emperors and Kings in displays of jewelry and fine linen, and costly banquets? Can we expect it? No, sir; double their salaries, if you please, and you will still find your ministers misrepresenting the people of this nation, and commanding no more respect than they did before.

Look at Franklin at the Court of France. I recollect an anecdote of him which, though old and heard by all, is still worthy of repetition, because it illustrates the point. A gentleman of an aristocratic cloth passing alongside of him, observed to a lady who accompanied him, "There is the American Minister!" "What!" says she, "that shabby-looking old gentleman?" "Yes, madam; and be careful how you speak of him, for he governs the thunder and lightning, and may strike you."

Mr. CARTTER. Good!

Mr. SKELTON. Benjamin Franklin at the Court of France, clad in his humble garments, gave no feasts to make himself and associates drunk. That man moving in his humble sphere, representing, as he did, an humble nation, has never been equaled by any foreign minister since, and he never will be until you select the best minds to represent us at European courts. Do this, and leave the vain display of glittering jewelry and gaudy dress to kings and fools. Be it our ambition to excel in virtue and intelligence; and when they talk about the degradation of an American nation being represented by an humble citizen, what will be said? Look across the broad Atlantic to that happy land, at its commercial marine, its manufactures, its intelligence, and enterprise. Our prosperity, under the influence of these plain, unassuming republican principles, has been unparalleled in the history of the world. Aristocrats may sneer and laugh at our simplicity and our plainness as much as they please, we will point them to our nation wherever we go with just pride and say, Ridicule, if you please, but you shall feel our power if you insult us as a nation. The time will soon come, if we are true to our instincts, true to our principles and our republican institutions, when we may dictate terms to the world.

Look at the rapid growth of our nation. We number 24,000,000, though not three hundred years old. In fifty years, if we increase in the ratio, that we have heretofore, our sons will see this mighty nation spreading from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, from the frozen shores of the North to the Isthmus at the South. And this mighty Republic will be inhabited, by what? Not by a military republican people, not by an aristocracy, not by an indolent, proud, licentious people, but by an industrious, intelligent, virtuous and prosperous nation, who will be able to dictate terms to the nations of the world on any subject. That prospect makes my heart glow. That prospect, when compared with the proposition to clothe with purple and fine linen our representatives at foreign courts to misrepresent the simplicity of our republican institutions, makes it dwindle into insignificance, and as scarcely worth a reflection of ridicule. What is the principle upon which our Government is based? It is the principle incorporated in our glorious Constitution and in our glorious religion: the principle that he who would be chief must serve; that he who would be the ruler must be the servant of the people. And shall we clothe our servants finer than we clothe ourselves? Shall they fare more sumptuously than their masters? Shall the subject be above the monarch, because in this country we are all monarchs, and not speaking boastfully either? Power emanates from the people, and rules are established for their benefit. That proposition no one will dispute. Let us have an eye single to that point. Let the rulers bear in mind that they are servants of the people; and I would ask Congress to remember that all of us are only the servants of the people to carry out their will, and to promote their interest and advance their institutions.

Why, sir, the whole history of the world shows that the human race, from its creation to the present time, has lost sight of man as man in his true dignity, and fallen down and worshipped idols. At the present day, we are man-worshippers as well as golden-calf-worshippers. And I think the time has arrived when man should arise in his true dignity, assert and maintain his rank as man everywhere. We have a mission, Mr. Chairman, and that mission is to raise up the downtrodden throughout the world, to spread civil and religious liberty everywhere. I say that this is our true mission. We should keep it in view, and the time will rapidly roll round—more rapidly than we can scarcely imagine—when, under the benign influence of our institutions, an impulse will be given to the human mind which has been unparalleled in the history of the world. Our progress within the last forty years has been greater than all of the nations of the earth put together for six thousand years. Our free institutions, and the elevation to the true standard has given an impulse to the human mind that will spread as the lightning's flash, and we are destined, if we are true to our mission, to extend this impulse throughout the globe. If we are true to our mission we will arise as the morning sun in its glory, and emperors, kings, and nobles, shall sink into insignificance on the page of history, and be looked upon as follies that bewildered and estranged the human intellect from its true path. May God in his mercy and wisdom direct and preserve this Government and people to the accomplishment of our true and glorious mission.

FRAUDS ON THE TREASURY—GARDINER CLAIM.

SPEECH OF HON. A. JOHNSON,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 12, 1853,

On the Bill to prevent Frauds on the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall commence what little I have to say upon this subject by asserting—for it has really become a debatable question—that there are such things as right and wrong, and that the question of law-making is to sustain legally, what is morally right; and to prohibit legally, what is morally wrong. I know there are various opinions among men, and even among moralists, as to what is abstractly right or wrong in itself. There are some things declared offenses in law which are not offenses morally in themselves. And again, there are other things not made offenses by law which are offenses in sound morals. The great object in making laws should be to sustain, develop, and carry out what is admitted to be morally right. We find more or less violation every day of what we in our minds and hearts consider sound morals, and we find no law to prohibit the violation of those morals. Now, I think, where there is moral wrong, there is political wrong, and it should be made legally wrong. The object of this bill is to prohibit what is considered in one sense political wrong, and to carry out what is morally right.

The second section of the bill proposes, upon the conviction of any individual connected with the heads of the Departments, or of any functionary of the Government, in any of the courts of justice, of aiding or prosecuting any claim against the Government, for a fee direct or remote, or for an amount specified or an amount contingent, it shall be made a misdemeanor, indictable and punishable by fine and imprisonment, as the court shall direct. This was considered by the committee—and I think it is considered by the people of the country generally—as a moral and political wrong.

The third section of the bill provides that if any member of either House of Congress, or any officer in the employ of either House of Congress, shall be guilty of prosecuting any claim against the Government, for a fee, remote, direct, or contingent, it shall be a misdemeanor, indictable and, upon conviction thereof, punishable with fine or imprisonment in the discretion of the court. I think it will be conceded that the practice ought to be prohibited; that it ought to be stopped. We see Congress besieged every session, and we see the Departments continually granting claims against the Government, and we know the appliances that are brought to bear to procure the settlement of the claims before the Departments, or their passage by the Congress of the United States. It seems to me that the position or character of a Representative in Congress is a very different one from being an agent to prosecute claims against the Government.

In the first instance, the Government can pay no claim unless there is an appropriation made; and if a member of Congress accepts a fee or a present, I care not upon what principle, he becomes involved in a position inconsistent with his public relations. He may say that he, as a lawyer, has a right to practice before courts of the United States, and aid in getting claims through such tribunals. But is that position consistent with the duty of a Representative? The people send a Representative here for the purpose of guarding their interests, and at the same time doing justice to all those who may have claims against the people through the Government. The people send Representatives and Senators here as guardians of the Treasury, and the holders of the purse-strings, to make such appropriations as are just, and to withhold all that are unjust.

Now, while a Representative is acting in his character as such, while he is standing as a sentinel upon the watch-towers over the people's interests, while he is protecting the Treasury, can he change his character and divest himself of all interest and become an agent for prosecuting claims against the Government which cannot be paid unless he, acting in the character of a Representative, appropriates money for such payment? We find that interest and prejudice are so closely blended, that they cannot be separated in matters of this sort. And when a member of Congress is acting in his capacity as such, he should not run the risk of being swerved from his duty as a Representative, by becoming an agent for the prosecution of claims against the Government for particular individuals. For instance, we agree to pay a certain amount of money, by treaty stipulation with some other Government, or even with an Indian tribe. It is ratified by the Senate,—for the Senate is a part of the treaty making power,—and here, for instance, a member of Congress may be interested in a claim which a tribe of Indians or a foreign Power may have against the Government of the United States. The treaty is made, providing for the payment of certain amounts of money, upon certain conditions; it is submitted to the Senate of the United States for its ratification. And here we may find a man, who is acting as an agent for claimants against the Government, acting at the same time upon a treaty, providing for the payment of a large sum of money for the satisfaction of those claims. For instance, you may establish a board of commissioners—as I intend to give a case only for illustration—by which the amount set apart in the treaty may be awarded to particular individuals. Now, in the character of Senators, they may come before the board, and there act, as they say, in a judicial capacity. They ratify the treaty, establish a board of commissioners to whom is confided the duty of awarding millions of dollars—which is intrusted to them—among those who have claims against the Government, and, immediately after the ratification of the treaty, step out before this board of commissioners created by that same treaty, and prosecute against the Government claims which you have provided for in the very treaty they have ratified.

Now, how do you find the practical operation of this thing? Notwithstanding you provide by treaty for the payment of money, there is another power to be exercised before the money can be paid. After having prosecuted the claims to award before the commissioners, the money must be appropriated by the appropriating power, before it can be paid over to the parties to which it is awarded. Then we immediately see the impropriety of members of Congress acting as agents, as their duties as Senators and Representatives come in direct conflict with the duties of a claims agent. They cannot protect the interests of the people in their capacity of Representatives, and at the same time prosecute a claim against this Government. It is a conflict of interest and duty which cannot be reconciled. I know it may be said that we can step out of the House of Representatives, before a board of commissioners, and divest ourselves of all interest in the first character. Can we return from the successful prosecution of claims before that board, to a vote in the Senate, and say we are disinterested?

This whole matter is morally wrong and politically wrong, and it ought to be made legally wrong, and should be punished as contemplated in this bill. It seems to me that it is improper for a member of Congress to form any such connection with claims of this sort. Such a connection is improper, because it is immoral, because it is unsound in politics; and if it is unsound in these two points, it ought to be made so legally.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am going along with this question. There seems to be some two or three other questions connected with it. My intention is, in the main, to discuss the bill and the propriety of its passage; but in this discussion there has sprung up a question not altogether legitimate, and I claim the privilege, which others have indulged in, of diverging from the true line of debate.

When we come to examine this Gardiner claim, which is the root out of which this bill has sprung through this special committee, we find the basis of this claim rests upon the twenty-sixth article of the treaty made in 1831. That treaty provided for and secured certain rights and privileges to our citizens in Mexico. Three of those privileges were, that where our citizens lived upon the coast or in towns, in the event that a war should break out, they should have six months' notice to leave the country and take away their effects. If they lived in the interior, pursuing the business of merchandise, they were to have twelve months. If they lived in the interior or other portions of the country, pursuing any other occupation, so long as they behaved themselves and acted in subordination to the existing authorities, they were permitted to remain and be protected in the enjoyment of their lives, their liberty, and their property.

Under this article of the treaty of 1831, many claims sprung up on the part of the citizens of the United States against the Government of Mexico. They increased. Depredations were committed of various kinds—spoliations, if you think proper to call them so—and claims, in behalf of citizens, accumulated to a very considerable amount.

In 1839, there was formed another treaty with Mexico, which treaty provided for the establishment of a Board of Commissioners to sit upon, and adjudicate the claims of citizens of the United States against the Government of Mexico. That Board was a mixed one. A part of it was created by the United States, and a part by Mexico; and the claims which they might award, were to be paid upon certain conditions. In relation to the claims which could not be agreed upon, there was an umpire to be selected who was to determine upon their validity.

We find that the Board established by the treaty of 1839 resulted in a failure. There were some awards made, it is true, but in many cases there were none. Some of the awards made were not paid, which circumstance resulted in the calling of another convention, and the making of another treaty in 1843, and the creation of another Board. This Board did but little; and there was another convention, which was to have been ratified on the 20th of November, 1843. That ratification never took place. During all this time these claims were increasing, and our citizens were without redress. The difficulties between the two Governments were thickening, and a war was expected.

We find in 1840 that this Mr. Gardiner went to Mexico as a kind of itinerant dentist, plugging and filing teeth for a livelihood. He wandered around until 1843; and the last seen of him was in the city of Mexico, in the year 1844. He was seen there by General Thompson, and by some others. He stated, and it is so stated by others, that he repaired to the interior, where, he alleges, he commenced mining operations to an amount of $300,000. All this time the difficulties between the Governments were constantly increasing, and war was expected. Mr. Thompson returned home, and Mr. Slidell was sent out. War was declared, as you will remember, in 1846. Gardiner commenced mining operations with little or no capital, and in two years' time he had invested, as he assumes, some $300,000. There are contradictory statements in regard to this matter; but it must be manifest to all reasonable and impartial persons who will make themselves familiar with the history of this whole transaction, that Dr. Gardiner had little or no capital to vest in mining operations at that time; and if he had, it is not reasonable to suppose he would have done so, in view of the belligerent attitude about being assumed by the two Governments.

We now come along to 1846; war was declared, this Gardiner was expelled from Mexico, his property lost, and his mines taken from him; and he now comes forward and sets up his claim, under the twenty-sixth article of the treaty of 1831. The war continued; and on the 2d of February, 1848, there was another treaty made. Mr. Gardiner was an observing and a shrewd man, and he saw, as every one who knows anything about such matters knew, that whenever a treaty of peace should be made, Mexico would be compelled to pay money to the United States, and be compelled to provide for the payment of claims, on the part of our citizens, against that Government.

By the treaty with Mexico of the 2d of February, we provide—after agreeing to take so much territory and pay $15,000,000—for the indemnification of citizens of the United States against the Mexican Government to the extent of $3,250,000. By this same treaty, another Board of Commissioners was created, to consist of three members, and to hold its sessions in the city of Washington. Mr. Gardiner, having returned from Mexico to the United States, met here and renewed his acquaintance with Mr. Thompson. He stated his case to him, and they at once commence to conjure up or make out this claim—which did or did not exist—to be brought before this Board. The claim was presented, and as the declaration will show, for the sum of $500,000. I will not say that Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, was cognizant or guilty of anything wrong, but I will state as a fact, that when he came forward with the claim, as the documents will show, he had a programme for the taking of evidence, and as to what had to be done to establish the claim before the Board, and that, too, before he returned to Mexico, and before the declaration was made out. Both Mr. Thompson and Mr. Gardiner had been in Mexico and understood the condition of the two Governments, and were aware that Boards had set at various times upon claims between the United States and Mexico. When Gardiner returned with his proofs, a declaration was made out and filed before this Board.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee, whether Mr. Thompson did anything more than give instructions conformably to regulations previously established by this Board?

Mr. JOHNSON. I state facts, and it is for others to draw inferences. He drew a chart, or written instructions, by which this claim was to be made out. I am fully aware that lawyers sometimes give instructions as to how a case is to be made out, and what character of proof is to be taken for that purpose; but in that instance, other things conform to the case. In this instance, however, the programme is made out, and the case is made to conform to it.

Mr. STEPHENS. Is it not the practice in all of the Departments of the Government—the Pension Office, for instance—where claims are to be presented, to establish rules of evidence by which claims are to be supported? Did not this Board do so in this case, and did Mr. Thompson do anything more than give instructions conforming to those regulations?

Mr. JOHNSON. I stated, when I first alluded to Mr. Thompson, that I would not charge that he was cognizant of, or intended to do, anything wrong, but would only state a fact.

Mr. STEPHENS. Certainly; and I ask the gentleman to state another fact.

Mr. JOHNSON. And that fact was that the affidavits were taken, and the case made out, in compliance with those instructions.

Mr. ORR. I will in this connection ask the gentleman a question, as he is familiar with the testimony in the case. Was it not proven before the committee that Dr. Gardiner exhibited to General Thompson the affidavits of certain persons in Mexico previous to the preparation of these instructions, and that those instructions were gotten up for the purpose indicated by the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. JOHNSON. I think that the gentleman will find that fact stated by General Thompson himself, and by no one else.

Mr. ORR. General Thompson is an honorable man, and it is due to him that his statement of fact should go out. Evidence of parties in Mexico was brought here by Dr. Gardiner, and the instructions given by General Thompson, as I understand him, were to put the affidavits referred to in form.

Mr. JOHNSON. They were instructions to him to make out his case. Here is the published testimony, and it is for the public, and not for me, to draw inferences. We find that in compliance with those instructions the case was made out and presented to this Board, and that an award was made to Dr. Gardiner of $427,000. About these facts there can be no mistake; and I tell gentlemen now, that before I am done I shall come to the touchstone in this matter. You may talk about high-minded, pure men, who lift themselves above all that is low, and groveling, and disreputable, but there is a point in this case that will put them to the test. One thing has been ascertained since this claim has been allowed, and that is, that it is a fraudulent one, based only upon perjury and forgery. We know that perjury and forgery were the means by and through which the amount of money I have specified as being awarded to Dr. Gardiner, was taken out of the Treasury. Now, this fact, no one will controvert. The committee were of the unanimous opinion that it was a naked fraud upon the Treasury, sustained only by forgery and perjury. Then, if Mr. Thompson and Mr. Corwin are the recipients of money extracted from the Treasury by means of fraud and perjury; if they are the high-minded and honorable men they are represented to be, they will, upon every principle of sound morality and justice—upon the doctrine that the recipients of stolen goods shall, so soon as the fact is ascertained, restore them to their rightful owners—replace that money in the Treasury. Everybody acknowledges it is right that this money, which has been filched from the Treasury by fraud, so far as we can reach it, should be enjoined; and if a certain portion is enjoined in the hands of Corcoran & Riggs as money belonging to the Government, is it not equally right that another portion of the same money which has passed into the hands of Corwin and Thompson ought to be enjoined? I know that legally you cannot reach it, but I say that they are morally bound to return it. There is the touchstone. You that talk about honor; you that talk about having no knowledge of a fraud being intended at the time the claim was being prosecuted before the Board, know now that it is a fraudulent claim, and that you have stolen goods in your possession, which I know you are morally bound to restore to the rightful owner, to the last dollar. This tests the whole thing, and why debate it? They plead ignorance of the fraud whilst the claim was being investigated; they did not know it was a fraud, but they know now that it is. They know now where and how the money came; and, as honest men, worthy of public confidence and entitled to occupy a high place in the Government, they are bound to restore it.

Mr. GOODENOW. Major Lally ought to be involved in the same category.

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman from Maine says that Major Lally ought to be involved in the same category. I say that all, though there were a captain's company, the recipients of the proceeds of this fraud, ought to disgorge. If they retain it, I say in my place here, that in sound morals they are as filthy as a cage of unclean birds.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CHAPMAN] knows that I will make no unkind allusion to him. Since we formed each other's acquaintance here, our personal relations have been of the most amicable character. I am proud of his acquaintance. I have found him a shrewd and active business man. He has talents and business tact, and if I was not convinced of this before, I was on yesterday by the defense he made in this case. You saw his conciseness, his method, and the dependence of one part of his argument upon another. If you admit his premises, and follow him along to his conclusions, you will see that it is one of the prettiest and fairest cases in the world. It did his head credit; and I will not doubt his sincerity in the basis upon which he placed it. During the delivery of his speech I imagined myself in a criminal court, listening to the defense of a criminal, and that the gentleman was trying to make it appear not that his client was guiltless, but that the prosecution was malicious. It seemed that he wanted to mitigate the sentence of the court or the judgment of the jury, by pleading that the prosecution was a malicious one, without at all looking to the merits of the case.

And we find, too, that is done very adroitly in this connection, by associating the idea of malicious prosecution as regards Mr. Corwin. Says he, "I am not his foe nor is he my foe; can the member from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] say as much?" Do you not see the course which he intended this thing to take, so as to impress upon the public mind the idea that there was enmity and ill-feeling existing between these two gentlemen, and that the whole proceeding here was malicious on the part of the member from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS?] Is it not evident that he desired to give that direction to the public mind? I do not know what the relations are between those two gentlemen. I have met and received them both as gentlemen, and I know nothing of their personal and political differences. I have looked upon them heretofore as equals, so far as those matters were concerned. Nor do I intend to inquire into their personal difficulties. But I can say for myself, as the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CHAPMAN] did, that I am not Mr. Corwin's foe, and I hope he is not mine. I have no reason to be his foe, as I have never received anything from him but kindness. I have met with him and passed the usual civilities of gentlemen, and nothing unkind has passed between us. The reason I make this remark is that I am in as favorable a condition to speak of this transaction as the honorable gentleman from Connecticut. Then why do you not acquit your man upon the merits of the case, not by innuendo, by indirection, and by making a false issue before the public mind, and there rest your case? What was the other ground upon which the gentleman relied? It was this, that the proceedings were ex parte. Ah! A malicious prosecution, based upon an ex parte examination of the witnesses. How does that fact stand? Was not Mr. Corwin before that committee? Did he not have the witnesses summoned, and did he not cross-examine them?

Mr. CHAPMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee misunderstood me if he understood me to say, so far as Mr. Corwin was concerned, that this was an ex parte examination. I made no such intimation; but I said, in express terms, that so far as Dr. Gardiner was concerned, it was due to him to say that it was ex parte, with the single exception to which I have adverted.

Mr. JOHNSON. I intended to come to that. The impression was made by what the gentleman said, that it was an ex parte proceeding. I do not know what his intention was.

Mr. CHAPMAN. The intention was to make myself distinctly understood.

Mr. JOHNSON. Perhaps it is owing to my obtuseness, and not his want of clearness, and I will let it go in that way; but the impression calculated to be made by his speech was, that it was an ex parte proceeding, and that the witnesses had not been cross-examined. Well, so far as Mr. Gardiner was concerned, there was no ex parte proceeding. Mr. Gardiner was not on trial before that committee, and this bill contains no provision that would punish Mr. Gardiner, so far as I know. Mr. Corwin was the man with whom the committee had to do; and his connection with the Gardiner claim was what the committee were investigating. The gentleman from Connecticut nods his assent. This is the true state of the case. Mr. Corwin was present at the investigation, cross-examined, and had most of the witnesses summoned himself. So far as Mr. Gardiner is concerned, he is not upon trial at all, but we are to get at Mr. Corwin's connection with the Gardiner claim. That is what we are trying to do; and how does the matter stand so far as Mr. Gardiner is concerned? He was not on trial, and he was not before the committee, but he was heard by his counsel. About the close of the investigation, Mr. Gardiner writes a letter to the committee, in which he speaks of the investigation as being an ex parte proceeding, and claims the right of being heard. Did not the committee notify him that he could be heard and fix a day for him to come? Did Mr. Gardiner come?

Do you not see that the two main grounds upon which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CHAPMAN] relies, show that his argument is a specious one, made in true lawyer style, to acquit his client upon special pleading, when there is no merit in his case? That is the position which he occupies. We find in this connection that there has been something said by gentlemen about the committee going beyond the record. What does this resolution say?

"Whereas a strong suspicion rests upon the public mind that fraudulent claims have been allowed by the late Mexican Claim Commission, with one of which it is suspected that Thomas Corwin, Secretary of the Treasury, has been improperly connected: therefore," &c.

How does the fact stand? We are not to investigate whether Mr. Corwin knew that it was a fraudulent claim, (which we will come to directly,) but we are to investigate whether Mr. Corwin was improperly connected with the Gardiner claim. That is the point. Does not this investigation show that he was connected with it, and that he got a part—eighty-odd thousand dollars of it? I think it does. Is not his connection, then, with the claim improper? We say that it was an improper connection, that it was mere speculation, and that it was morally wrong.

In the bill before us, what do we propose to do? We intend to say that legally such a connection is wrong, not binding him more than anybody else, who has been guilty of the like offense. The offense was an improper one. Why was it so? Mr. Corwin was a Senator of the United States, placed there by the people to guard the people's Treasury, to take care of their money, and also, as one of the Senate, with the President of the United States, to make treaties with foreign Governments. We find when this very treaty was concluded between the Government of the United States and Mexico, on the 2d of February, 1848, that Mr. Corwin was in the Senate himself, and acted in his capacity as Senator. We find in this very treaty, as I remarked before, that three millions and a quarter were set apart to pay the claims of citizens of the United States against Mexico. We find that by this very treaty a Board of Commissioners was established. We find that while Mr. Corwin was Senator, when he was acting upon the treaty which made an appropriation of three and a quarter millions to pay these Mexican claimants, he received a fee to prosecute claims before the very Commissioners which he assisted in creating, and got a portion of the money appropriated out of the Treasury.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I wish to know of the gentleman whether he considers that the committee were bound to inquire into anything beyond what had been practiced by all of the members of Congress? whether he did not think they were bound to show that there was something peculiar in the case of Mr. Corwin from that of others?

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman from Ohio desires to know if Mr. Corwin acted differently from other members of Congress. If the gentleman will read the resolution, he will there find what we were appointed to do, and that was to ascertain Mr. Corwin's connection with the Gardiner claim, and whether that was an improper connection. We have found out what his connection was with that claim, and it is for the country and the House to determine whether it is an improper one or not. I consider it such, from the fact of his being a Senator at the time the treaty was made, voting for the appropriation to carry out the provisions of that treaty, and prosecuting a claim against the Government provided for by that very treaty; and I think that the country will so determine it.

I do not intend to find fault with the report which the committee make here, but I wish to refer to it. The committee go on, and do what? They have ascertained Mr. Corwin's connection with the claim. They have shown what it was, and the country understands it. This committee after going on, and summing up the whole case, state that, "No testimony has been adduced before the 'committee proving, or tending to prove, that the 'Hon. Thomas Corwin had any knowledge that 'the claim of the said Gardiner was fraudulent, or 'that false testimony or forged papers had been or 'were to be procured to sustain the same."

Now, do we not see how clearly that misses the case? The resolution required them to ascertain the improper connection. Does the improper connection depend upon Mr. Corwin's knowledge of its fraudulency? That is the point. The committee did not say that the connection was a proper one, but that he had no knowledge of the fraud. This connection was improper without a knowledge of the fraud, and if he had a knowledge of the fraud, it was but an aggravation of the improper connection. That is the whole of it, and you may turn as you please upon this question, he stands improperly connected with this fraudulent claim, successfully prosecuted against the United States, and the money was obtained from the Treasury.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BARRERE] seemed to strike a happy vein of argument yesterday upon this question; and it was that Mr. Gardiner was a bad man, and that Mr. Corwin was not responsible for it. He illustrated it by telling a story which Mr. Clay related of Mr. Grundy, that if Mr. Grundy was responsible for all the criminals he had defended he would have a great amount of sin for which to answer. That may be all true, but it is not Mr. Grundy defending a criminal in this case, but it is Mr. Corwin aiding a man in prosecuting a claim against the Government. He appears for the plaintiff and not for the defendant—for a man who is trying to commit a fraud upon the Treasury with the knowledge of its being a fraudulent claim, as I believe. We say it is wrong in that connection, and still more if he knew it to be wrong. The cases are not analogous at all.

The gentleman from Ohio presented one or two other really strange ideas. He set out with saying that he should vote for the bill, thereby admitting that this thing should be made an offense legally as it was morally, because we proceed upon the idea in this, and most other countries, that to have anything like a perfect system of jurisprudence, law must be the perfection of reason, and, I will add, of sound morals. The morals must precede the law, and the law should be made to sustain the morals. If it is not morally wrong to do this thing, I tell the House and the country, that it is wrong to pass a law making it a legal offense. If it is morally wrong, pass the law and make it legally wrong. If it is not morally wrong, pass no such law; for if you do, you at once make law and morals antagonists; you have them running counter to each other. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BARRERE] seems to argue morals on the one hand, and law on the other—that what is right in law is wrong in morals, and that what is right in morals, is wrong in law. He seems willing to justify Mr. Corwin's connection with the claim morally, but he is willing to make it an offense legally. I cannot reconcile that sort of argument. It reminds me of a position assumed at one period of time by Professor Hoffman. He wrote as long ago as 1598—just two hundred years before the Virginia resolutions were adopted—that philosophy was the mortal enemy of religion, and that truth was divisible into two branches, one philosophical and the other theological, and that what was true in philosophy was false in theology, and vice versa. Now, the gentleman from Ohio seems to occupy this position, that that which is right in morals, is wrong in law, and that that which is right in law, is wrong in morals. I confess I cannot swallow that proposition. It seems to me that morals should constitute the basis of law.

Mr. BARRERE. I believe they have laws in some of the States that the citizens shall catch fish in certain streams only at certain seasons of the year. It is, therefore, legally wrong to catch fish in those streams at other seasons, but I do not think that if there was no such law, it would be morally wrong.

Mr. JOHNSON. It might be morally wrong in some places and not in others. That would depend just upon the locality and the circumstances of the case. [Laughter.] But the gentleman goes on to justify Mr. Corwin on the ground that the fee was a contingent one. Now, I expect they have got a law in his State that no lawyer shall take a contingent fee; in other words, that if a lawyer brings suit for a certain amount on condition that he shall receive a certain proportion of it, he shall be stricken from the roll of lawyers. They would find him guilty of champerty.

Mr. BARRERE. The gentleman has misunderstood me. I did not take the position he supposes with regard to the fee being a contingent one.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the gentleman will find it difficult to understand his own position, when he sees it on paper. In the States we consider champerty immoral, and we pass laws making it a legal offense, because it is immoral. We say that it is morally wrong for a man to go about getting up suits in a neighborhood, and taking contingent fees, and we pass laws to punish him. But the gentleman tells me, with his profound understanding of theology and philosophy, that taking a contingent fee in a claim against the Government is a different thing from taking a contingent fee in a case before a court of justice. Now, if champerty is immoral in the States, and a punishable offense under State laws, I ask how, in the name of morals and common sense, it becomes right and moral in Secretaries, members of Congress, and other persons here? Such is the state of things here, that practices which are considered immoral in the States, and are consequently made indictable offenses, can be practiced with perfect impunity here, and no one must inquire into them. It is time that we had arrested this thing. The attention of the country is directed to it. It is high time that the indiscriminate plundering which is going on about the Departments, and about this capital, was put a stop to.

Sir, I have not time to go into the testimony in this case. I had intended to have done so. But you will find, on looking over the whole of it, that the case was shrewdly anticipated by Dr. Gardiner and his coadjutors. He saw the various conventions, and the claims against the Mexican Government; he saw the difficulties thickening; that war would be the result; that a peace would be made, and that the Government would have to indemnify our citizens; and he commenced, with Mrs. Chase, Mr. Larned, and others, making up a basis upon which to rest this spurious claim. He carried on the case shrewdly, until he succeeded in getting it before the Commissioners. It is a fraud, and a fraud by which a large amount of money has been extracted from the Treasury of the country; and the recipients of the money thus fraudulently extracted, should restore it back to the coffers of the Treasury, if they are honest men and men of sound morals.

But, upon a further examination of this case, we find the witnesses differing with each other in their statements of facts. Mr. Payne, who was one of the Commissioners, says that they suspected it was a fraudulent case from the beginning, and that it excited the closest scrutiny. What does Mr. E. W. Johnson, who was Secretary to the Board, say? He says that the Commissioners suspected the case, and that Dr. Gardiner was called in again and again, and that his counsel were called upon to explain time after time. Who were his counsel? Why Robert G. Corwin and Thomas Corwin. The Board suspected that it was a fraudulent case; the Secretary of the Board suspected it; but these gentlemen did not find it out; and R. G. Corwin swears he never knew of it being suspected till suit had been brought against Dr. Gardiner. The inference is, that they either did find it out, or that Mr. Corwin has more credit for sagacity and talent than he is entitled to. The gentleman from Ohio pronounced a splendid eulogy upon Mr. Corwin yesterday, and spoke of him as being a man of great and shining talents, and of gigantic intellect; and yet with all his sagacity and experience and knowledge of men, he failed to find out that this was a fraudulent claim. The committee by saying that he had no knowledge of its being a fraudulent claim, say that he is a man of extraordinary obtuseness, and is not entitled to credit for sagacity. He either knew that it was a fraudulent claim, or else was too obtuse a man to find it out. If Dr. Gardiner's counsel failed to discern that the claim was a sheer fabrication from beginning to end, it argues but little for their heads and detracts much from their reputation for talents and sagacity; and if they had reason to believe that the claim was spurious, and was sustained by forgery and perjury, it makes them parties to the whole transaction—equally criminal with Gardiner himself, and deserving the withering condemnation of an outraged and betrayed people. The gentleman may take either horn of the dilemma. W. E. Johnson says that the counsel were sent for again and again to explain the claim. So far as the other witnesses are concerned, you might go on still further. Mrs. Chase and General Waddy Thompson seem to be at issue in their testimony. Mrs. Chase says that General Thompson is mistaken in attributing certain expressions to her in relation to Dr. Gardiner; that she never made use of them.

I find that my hour is within a few minutes of being out, which will prevent me from a more minute examination of this case; but I cannot conclude without making an earnest appeal to the House to come forward and sustain this bill, as one step towards arresting and condemning this system of high-handed plundering and swindling, which has been and is being carried on, about Congress and the various departments of Government. Sound morality, common honesty, justice, an eviscerated Treasury, all demand that something should be done to separate these vampires from the body politic. There must be something done to restore public confidence, for it is going very fast, if not already gone. The Government and the functionaries of Government are beginning to stink in the very nostrils of the nation; it is now dead and rotten in many of its parts, while the disease is rapidly making its way into the others less accessible. Its putrid stench is sent forth upon every wind and is arresting the attention of the voracious vultures throughout the land, and they have gathered, and are still gathering, around the carcass, ready to begin their foul work.

They come "from the mountain tops, with hideous cry
And clattering wings; the filthy harpies fly:
Monsters more fierce offended Heav'n ne'er sent,
From Hell's abyss for human punishment."

THE GARDINER CLAIM.

SPEECH OF HON. E. B. OLDS,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 6, 1853.

The report of the Select Committee to prevent frauds on the Treasury being under consideration—

Mr. OLDS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: When I left my home in Ohio, to return to this capital, I had not the most distant idea that I should feel called upon to trespass upon the time of this House by again adverting to the Gardiner claim. I felt, sir, that in calling for the Committee of Investigation, I had but discharged a duty which I owed my constituents and the country; and even though the committee might acquit Mr. Corwin of the real charges alleged against him, still I felt that I had but discharged my duty, and that I might rather rejoice, than feel mortified at such acquittal. And even now, sir, I regret exceedingly that a sense of duty to myself, and duty to the constituency that I have the honor to represent in this Congress, compels me, in consequence of a remark made the other day, during my temporary absence from the Hall, by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] to ask the kind indulgence of the House, whilst I review, somewhat in detail, this most extraordinary transaction.

I was aware, sir, that an effort had been made, by pensioned dependents, by hired letter-writers, and by paid telegraphers, to forestall public opinion upon the report of the investigating committee; but knowing that sooner or later, the real facts of the case would be spread before the public, I was willing to wait for, and abide by the verdict that should be given upon that report by the American people.

I had supposed that the thousand and one false reports respecting the action of the committee, and the honorable acquittal of Mr. Corwin, which were scattered broadcast over the country, were designed to operate upon the elections then pending over the United States, and more especially upon my own election; for in my Congressional district, these false reports, with all manner of unfair and unjust comments, in handbill form, just upon the morning of the election, came upon us as did the frogs upon the Egyptians, and it might literally be said that they "came into our houses, into our bedchambers, and into our very kneading-troughs!" But I had no idea that even the men who gave them circulation, and carried them from door to door, and distributed them from hand to hand, supposed for a moment that they contained one word of truth. I had thought, sir, that when the occasion which gave them circulation, the election, had passed, an American representative would no longer be assailed for having boldly, fearlessly discharged his duty. But I find, sir, from the indication given by the gentleman from New York, that this false impression, this impression produced by these pensioned dependents and hired letter-writers, is to be seconded and continued by the efforts of honorable gentlemen upon this floor; and that, by such a course, if possible, the tables are to be turned upon me.

If gentlemen are not satisfied with their efforts to forestall public sentiment, and with their spurious acquittal of Mr. Corwin, but are desirious of turning the war upon me, I am ready and willing for the conflict.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] in reply to my colleague, [Mr. SWEETSER,] is reported in the Daily Globe as using the following language:

"The gentleman from Ohio, in order to evade or avoid these unanswerable facts and conclusions, attempted to abuse the present Administration for its extravagant expenditures, as if their doing wrong would justify him for refusing to do right. Now, if that gentleman will look back and observe the history of this Administration, he will see that in no one single instance, though a large majority in both Houses of Congress are nominally opposed to it, yet has there been no one instance in which they have reversed or condemned its action. The gentleman himself, or rather a colleague of his, did, indeed, in connection with the Gardiner claim, attempt to throw odium upon this Administration; but it was turned back upon him by his own party."

Mr. Speaker, the honorable gentleman from New York, when he gave utterance to the language just quoted, should have known that it was unfounded in fact, and unwarranted by the report of the committee. He is himself the editor of a public newspaper; and if his duty as Congressman did not require him to read the report of the Gardiner committee, certainly his duty as the publisher of such newspaper demanded that he should inform himself of the facts, that thereby he might be able to enlighten and not mislead the public.

I wish, sir, that I could believe that the honorable gentleman had spoken in ignorance, rather than with a desire to pervert and misrepresent the facts connected with the Gardiner fraud. I say, Mr. Speaker, that I hope the gentleman has really spoken in ignorance, and that it may prove true that he has never seen or read the report of the Gardiner committee. I am told, sir, that few or none of the Whig papers have published it in full.

I should like very much to know whether the honorable gentleman, when he used the language referred to, had ever seen the report published in any form, other than the garbled extracts, scattered broadcast over the country just prior to the Ohio and Pennsylvania elections. Has the honorable gentleman, himself the publisher of a Whig newspaper, ever given that report publicity in his own paper? Mr. Speaker, I will venture the prediction, that even now, notwithstanding the gentleman would have the country believe that the Gardiner committee have honorably acquitted Mr. Corwin, he dare not publish, without note or comment, the report of that committee, with the accompanying testimony, in the New York Express.

Sir, until he has the manliness to do this, let him not attempt to tell this House and the country that I "attempted to throw odium upon the Administration, but that it was turned back upon me by my own party."

Mr. ORR, (interrupting.) I rise to a question of order. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the remarks of my friend from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] are not in order when the House is considering the bill now before it.

Mr. OLDS. My remarks apply to the opinion of the committee in reference to this transaction.

Mr. ORR. The House is now considering specifically a bill, and the remarks of the gentleman are not applicable to that bill.

Mr. OLDS. This bill is to prevent similar transactions in future.

Mr. ORR. My reason for making the point of order is, that if the gentleman from Ohio goes on with his remarks, some other gentleman upon the other side of the House must be heard upon the other side, and the merits of the particular bill before the House will not be at all enlightened by the discussion.

Mr. OLDS. I trust they will, before I get through.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the bill before the House is reported from a committee appointed to investigate the very transaction to which the gentleman from Ohio refers.

Mr. ORR. What is the bill before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is a bill to punish offenses such as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] is now discussing; and the Chair thinks the gentleman is not exceeding the limits generally allowed in debate.

Mr. ORR. I do not perceive the pertinency of the gentleman's remarks to the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is arguing the necessity of the bill, and that his remarks are pertinent.

Mr. OLDS. Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] may see his error, and that the country may know in what manner the Committee of Investigation have acquitted Mr. Corwin, and turned back upon me the odium of Gardinerism, I shall direct the attention of the House to the phraseology of the resolution under which the committee was raised. It is as follows:

"Resolved, That a committee, consisting of five members of this House, be appointed by the Speaker to investigate all the facts touching the connection of the said Thomas Corwin, the present Secretary of the Treasury, with the said Gardiner claim; what fee, if any, he was to receive for his services as agent or counsel for said Gardiner; what interest, if any, other than his fee, he purchased and held, either directly or indirectly, in said claim, and the amount paid or stipulated to be paid therefor; at what time he ceased to act as the counsel or agent of the said Gardiner; to whom and for what consideration he disposed of his fee interest; to whom and for what consideration he disposed of his one fourth interest in said claim."

This, sir, is the language of the resolution. It constituted the committee, and it pointed out distinctly and specifically the duty required by the House to be performed by the committee.

First. The committee was required to investigate Corwin's connection with the Gardiner claim generally.

Second. The committee was to ascertain his (Corwin's) fee interest in the claim.

Third. The committee was to ascertain what interest he (Corwin) had in the claim, other than his fee interest.

Fourth. The committee was to ascertain the amount paid, or stipulated to be paid, for such interest.

Fifth. The committee was to ascertain at what time he (Corwin) ceased to act as the agent or counsel for Gardiner.

Sixth. The committee was to ascertain to whom and for what consideration he (Corwin) dispesed of his fee interest, and to whom and for what consideration he had disposed of his one fourth interest in said claim.

These, sir, were the specific duties referred by the House to the committee; all the facts touching these specifications the committee were required to investigate and report to the House.

If, as the gentleman from New York charges, the committee have exonerated Mr. Corwin, "and turned back upon me the odium" of Gardinerism, it must be found in their action and report upon these specifications.

Pardon me, then, Mr. Speaker, for trespassing upon the time of the House, in applying to each inquiry and specification the finding of the committee; for by this course, without the intervention of pensioned letter-writers, we shall be able to understand who has been exonerated, and upon whom the committee "have turned back the odium."

First. The committee was required "to investigate Corwin's connection with the Gardiner claim" generally.

That duty, sir, the committee performed; that investigation the committee made. But do they exonerate Mr. Corwin from all connection with the claim, and thus roll back upon me the odium of being Mr. Corwin's slanderer? No, sir; on the contrary, the committee say, that—

"In May, 1849, the Hon. Thomas Corwin, then a member of the United States Senate, was employed as counsel in the Gardiner claim by General Waddy Thompson, the original counsel of Gardiner, upon an agreement that Mr. Corwin should have for his fee five per cent. on whatever sum should be awarded to Gardiner by the commissioners. In February, 1850, Thomas Corwin, in company with Robert G. Corwin, Esq., purchased one fourth part of the claim of Gardiner, and this fourth part of said claim was assigned on the 13th of that month to W. W. Corcoran, Esq., who loaned money to the Messrs. Corwin to purchase it, and held the claim for Messrs. Thomas and Robert G. Corwin, in equal shares, as collateral security for the payment of the loan. The Messrs. Corwin paid $22,000, and relinquished their fees on the one fourth of the claim purchased by them, and paid a part of Edward Curtis's fees—what amount does not appear—as the consideration for the purchase."

Call you this, sir, exonerating Mr. Corwin from all connection with the Gardiner claim? Call you this "turning back upon me the odium" of Gardinerism?

Secondly. The committee was "to ascertain his (Corwin's) fee interest in the claim."

On this specification the committee say, "that 'Mr. Corwin was employed as counsel in the 'case by General Waddy Thompson, upon an 'agreement that he (Corwin) should have for his 'fee five per cent. upon whatever sum should be 'awarded to Gardiner by the commissioners." Is this exonerating Mr. Corwin from having a fee interest, and "turning back upon me the odium?"

Third. The committee was "to ascertain what interest he (Corwin) held in the claim other than his fee interest."

The committee say, that "in February, 1850, Thomas Corwin, in company with Robert G. Corwin, purchased one fourth part of the Gardiner claim."

Call you this, sir, exonerating Corwin from being a part owner of this most fraudulent claim? Call you this turning back upon me the odium?

Fourth. The committee was directed "to ascertain the amount paid, or stipulated to be paid therefor, and the conditions of said purchase."

The committee say: "The Messrs. Corwin paid $22,000, and relinquished their fees on the one fourth of the claim purchased by them, and paid a part of Edward Curtis's fees." The committee; in speaking of the final distribution of the claim, further states, that "the sum of $94,582 was paid to counsel, and $107,187 50 was paid to the assignees of the one fourth of the claim originally sold to Thomas Corwin and Robert G. Corwin."

Call you this, sir, exonerating Mr. Corwin, "and turning back upon me the odium" of Gardinerism?

Fifth. The committee was directed "to ascertain at what time he (Corwin) ceased to act as the counsel or agent of the said Gardiner, and to whom and for what consideration he disposed of his fee interest, and to whom and for what consideration he disposed of his one fourth interest in said claim?"

In reply to this specification, the committee say:

"The Hon. Thomas Corwin resigned his seat in the Senate, and accepted the appointment of Secretary of the Treasury, in the month of July, 1850. In the same month and previous to his going into the Cabinet of President Fillmore as Secretary of the Treasury, a sale of his fee interest in, and also of his half of the one fourth part of the Gardiner claim, was negotiated through the intervention of Governor John Young, of New York, to George Law, Esq., of New York."

Inasmuch, sir, as Mr. Corwin and his friends claim his acquittal upon the score of this pretended sale, it merits a more extended comment. I am unable to perceive, even admitting the sale to be genuine, how this makes his acquittal. The resolution of inquiry implies, just what Corwin claims, that a sale of his interest in these Mexican claims was really consummated. This is what public rumor charged, and this was my own belief at the time I called for the investigation.

But, sir, let us examine this pretended sale, and see what it really amounts to.

In July, 1850, Mr. Corwin accepted a seat in Mr. Fillmore's Cabinet; prior to which a verbal contract or sale was made of his interest in this, as well as his other Mexican claims; but, sir, it appears from the report of the committee, that this sale made in July, 1850, was not consummated until November, 1850—full four months after Mr. Corwin had entered the Cabinet of President Fillmore. The committee say:

"The assignment of his fee interest and his interest in the one fourth part of the Gardiner claim, and all his interest in all other claims before the Board of Commissioners, (thirty-seven in number,) was executed by Thomas Corwin to Jacob Little, of New York, in November, 1850, and the money for the purchase was then paid by George Law, to whom the assignment to Jacob Little was at that time transferred. The money for the sale, $80,357, was received by Thomas Corwin, and on the 23d of November was deposited by him to his credit with Messrs. Corcoran & Riggs."

Mr. BROOKS. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman further than to request that he will extend the quotation he has just made.

Mr. OLDS. I wish, Mr. Speaker, that my time would permit me to read the whole of the report of the committee, and every word of the evidence upon which that report is predicated. It should be read, sir, not only by every member of this House, but by every citizen of the United States. The gentleman can do much towards accomplishing this object by giving the report and testimony a publication in his newspaper. Dare he do it?

Why, sir, was the consummation of this bargain, made in July, the consideration of which amounted to more than $80,000, delayed until November, a period of full four months? Does not this transaction, sir, carry upon its very face the evidence that the bargain made in July was a pretense, a mere farce? Why, sir, this sale covered Corwin's half of the one fourth interest, and his half of the fee interest. For these two interests he had only paid a little over $11,000; and yet, with all the uncertainty that hung over this claim at the time that Corwin purchased it, still hanging over it, it is pretended that Jacob Little, a cunning, crafty Wall street broker, and George Law, one of the shrewdest speculators in all the country, stipulated to pay the enormous sum of more than $80,000.

Why, sir, if anything more were necessary to show that this pretended sale was a mere farce, it will be found in the following extract from the speech of Robert Corwin, made in Lebanon, Ohio, Mr. Corwin's own town, and published in the Cincinnati Gazette, and other Whig journals in Ohio. Robert Corwin says that:

"In July General Taylor died, and the administration of the Government devolved on Millard Fillmore, who, in looking about him for his constitutional advisers, solicited Thomas Corwin to accept a post in his Cabinet as Secretary of the Treasury.

"In this request he was joined by Daniel Webster, but Mr. Corwin replied that he was interested in a private claim against the United States Treasury; that Crawford had been charged with committing a wrong in being interested in a claim while a member of the Cabinet, and he would not place himself in a situation which would subject him to a similar charge. Several days elapsed, during which he was urged to accept the post, but peremptorily refused, until Governor Young, of New York—now in his grave—came forward and proposed to take Mr. Corwin's interest in all the claims before the Board. Mr. Corwin did not know what was their value, and he proposed to take for his interest whatever sum Governor Young and myself should agree upon, but I found the Governor unprepared to pay so much as I considered the interest worth. I proposed myself to purchase Mr. Corwin's claim at the estimate I had proposed to Young, but to this he would not listen, stating that he still should be morally involved in the matter, for if I profited by the purchase he knew I would share it with him, and if there was a loss upon it he would be unwilling that I should bear the loss."

Mr. Speaker, is not this really a very pretty little farce? Why, sir, analyze it, and see its various parts.

Corwin felt that he would be liable to censure, if he accepted the Treasury Department under Fillmore, still holding an interest in claims against that Treasury. The verdict of the people upon Crawford's conduct, flashed vividly across his mind. Sir, it could not well be otherwise; for he had just witnessed the inauguration of President Fillmore. He had just seen Fillmore enter this Hall to receive the oath of office, followed by the Cabinet of the deceased Taylor; and the murmur from yonder gallery of "there come the Galphins," which reached every part of this Hall, was still ringing in his ears. The suspicions of the people must be quieted by at least the semblance of a sale.

He felt, too, that a sham sale to his nephew and partner would evoke rather than quiet the suspicions of the public. In this extremity, through Governor Young, George Law is made to play the part of "dummy." Bob Corwin would convey the impression that Governor Young was himself the purchaser, though the committee assign him the position of negotiator, or rather that of a "go-between."

"But I found the Governor," says Bob Corwin, "unprepared to pay as much as I considered the claim worth." No doubt, sir, that Governor Young, seeing this claim enveloped in all the doubts and difficulties that hung over it at the time the Corwins purchased it, was unprepared to raise its value from $11,000 to $80,000. Consequently, by their own showing, this pretended sale remained incomplete and inoperative until these doubts and difficulties were removed. Messrs. Little and Law were too shrewd operators to place their signatures to an instrument binding themselves to pay any stipulated sum, much less the enormous sum of $80,000, until they had some reliable basis upon which to estimate the value of the purchase.

Why, Mr. Speaker, no man can peruse the testimony of George Law and Robert G. Corwin, witnesses sworn at the instance, and to give evidence for, Mr. Corwin, without a settled conviction upon his mind, that the sale in July was a mere pretense, made expressly to deceive and mislead the public mind.

Corwin, though he sold the claim unconditionally, had no knowledge of the amount he was to receive for it; and George Law, the pretended purchaser, though he bought the claim unconditionally, had no knowledge of the amount he was to pay for it; and yet we are told that Corwin had "washed his hands of all interest in these claims" before entering the Cabinet of President Fillmore. True, sir, Mr. Corwin had nominally sold his claims; but I ask every candid unprejudiced mind to tell me whether or not Corwin's real interest in these claims was not precisely the same after, that it was before this pretended sale,—ay, sir, up to the time that Governor Young and Co. fixed and reported to the parties the price to be paid as the purchase money for these claims?

Suffer me, sir, to call the attention of the House to a few extracts from the testimony of the witness referred to. George Law says:

"Soon after General Taylor's death, in the month of July, 1850, I was here in Washington. Governor Young, of New York, called at my room at the National Hotel. He said he had a friend who was offered a seat in Mr. Fillmore's Cabinet, and who had some interest in claims that were then known as 'Mexican claims,' and that were to be settled by a commission; and that this friend, from feelings of delicacy, would not take a seat in the Cabinet whilst he was interested in such claims. Governor Young was desirous to relieve him from that objection. I asked him if he thought that was the only obstacle in the way. Governor Young said that it was. I told him that if he (Governor Young) desired, I would purchase those claims. He said that he did, but that the purchase must be unconditional; because he was satisfied that if there was any understanding about the claims if not realized, his friend would not take the place. I told him that there was no necessity for any contingency about them, and that I would leave it to him (Governor Young) to say what the value of the claims was, and I would purchase them at his valuation. Governor Young said he presumed that would be satisfactory; that the friend to whom he had reference was Mr. Thomas Corwin, and that he would go and see him. Governor Young went awny. I am not sure whether it was the same day or the next morning that he returned and said that it was satisfactory to Mr. Corwin to leave it to him (Governor Young) to determine what the value of the claims was; and Governor Young said, if I was satisfied, it should be the understanding. I told him I was satisfied. Governor Young afterwards brought me a valuation of the claims, (this was along that season,) and I paid about $80,000 for them. I recollect that there was an interest in the Gardiner claim included. I think it was in all a little over $80,000 (but not much) that I paid; but I cannot say how much I paid for the Gardiner claim in particular. I gave my check for the amount for all the claims, or Mr. Corwin's interest in them."

Again, Mr. Law says:

"I purchased those claims as a favor to Governor Young, who was a friend of mine, and in whom I had entire confidence. He seemed to be desirous and anxious to relieve Mr. Corwin from this embarrassment, in the way of going into the Cabinet. Witness had very little acquaintance with Mr. Corwin—he knew him by sight; but he (the witness) would have done the same thing for any other person to oblige Governor Young, having full confidence in him." * * * * * * * * *

"I did not know anything of the value of the claims, except what was stated to me by Governor Young. My object was not to make or lose money, but to do Governor Young a favor." * * * "I made the purchase, relying upon Governor Young's judgment and integrity. I did not undertake to go into the matter in detail."

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the only true inference to be drawn from such testimony? Why simply this, sir: Governor Young, the sub-treasurer of New York, the custodian of the Government money in that city, was the personal friend of Mr. Corwin. Perhaps, sir, his continuance in the office of sub-treasurer depended upon Corwin's assuming the control of the Treasury Department. Perhaps, too, sir, the fact of Governor Young's being the sub-treasurer, and controlling the enormous revenues of the Government in New York, will explain George Law's great confidence in, and extreme willingness to oblige him. Perhaps, sir, Governor Young's control of the Government money made it necessary, to save appearances, to use George Law, or some other third person, lest it might be said that the Government money, in the hands of Governor Young, had been used in this transaction. Perhaps the fact that George Law was one of Governor Young's sureties, his name being upon his official bond for $400,000, will account for his great confidence in the Governor, and the loose and unbusiness-like manner in which, by his own showing, he seems to have conducted this whole transaction.

Be all these conjectures as they may, there can be no doubt but that Governor Young was extremely anxious to have Mr. Corwin enter the Cabinet of President Fillmore; and in order to relieve his "feelings of delicacy," undertakes to negotiate a sale of Corwin's interest in these various Mexican claims. And to oblige Governor Young, without any investigation or examination, the sagacious George Law agrees to purchase those claims. This he does without the least anxiety or hesitation, as Governor Young is to assess their value. This, too, is satisfactory to Mr. Corwin, inasmuch as the claims are to remain untransferred, and his partner and nephew is also to assess their value. Mr. Corwin's "feelings of delicacy" are relieved, and he takes his position in the Cabinet. Governor Young and Bob Corwin wait until the award of the claims commission is known, or as Mr. Law says, until "some time along that season," and then they assess the value; and then, and not till then, the contract is consummated and the bargain reduced to writing. The precise time, the committee inform us, was in November, more than four months after Mr. Corwin had entered the Cabinet of President Fillmore.

Mr. Speaker, a careful reading of this testimony has satisfied me that Governor Young, Mr. Corwin's sub-treasurer in New York, and not George Law, was the real purchaser of Corwin's interest in these Mexican claims, if such a loose unbusiness-like transaction as this could be dignified with the name of a sale. The extracts already read from Mr. Law's testimony lead the mind imperceptibly to this conclusion; and the following extract from the testimony of Robert G. Corwin, taken before the committee, confirms the impression:

"Robert G. Corwin appeared as a witness, and was sworn.

"Question by Hon. Thomas Corwin. Were you concerned with me, as counsel, in prosecuting claims before the late commission under the treaty with Mexico? If so, state whether I sold out all my interest in those claims, and when, and to whom.

"Answer. I was concerned with you in the prosecution of claims up to the time when you went into the Cabinet of Mr. Fillmore. Your interest was sold prior to your going into the Cabinet, and your interest was represented afterwards by Governor John Young, of New York. I don't know exactly by whom the whole arrangement was made with Governor Young. The assignment of his interest was made to Jacob Little; he afterwards transferred his interest in these claims to George Law. I understood that Young was the negotiator, and that the assignment was made to Little to enable Young to get the money from him fairly; then it was transferred to Law, from whom the money was received. The sale was made prior to the organization of Mr. Fillmore's Cabinet, which was some time in July, 1850; but it was agreed that Governor Young and myself should estimate the value of your interest in all the claims you were concerned in. We were concerned in thirty-seven claims in all. We, Governor Young and myself, concluded the examination of all the papers, and made out the estimate a short time prior to the next regular session of the board in November, 1850."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask, in all fairness, does not this case really assume this one aspect? Corwin must sell his interest in these claims before entering the Cabinet of President Fillmore. Consequently, he sells to Governor Young at such price as Governor Young himself, and Robert G. Corwin should fix upon them; giving them time to wait until the award of the commissioners should be known, before fixing the value. And then, as Governor Young was Mr. Corwin's sub-treasurer in the city of New York, George Law, the intimate friend and surety of Governor Young, is used to throw an obscurity over the transaction, and give it the semblance of a sale.

Why, sir, when you have exposed and set aside George Law's connection with this transaction, you have taken from it the veil of obscurity, and it stands, like Moore's Prophet when the veil was lifted, exposed in all its "hideous deformity." And yet, sir, this is what the gentleman from New York calls exonerating Mr. Corwin, "and turning back upon me the odium!"

These five specifications, Mr. Speaker, in the very order in which I have named them, embrace all the duties imposed by the resolution of the House upon the Committee of Investigation. That resolution, sir, nowhere charged the committee with the duty of inquiring into Corwin's knowledge of the fraudulent character of Dr. Gardiner's evidence. No such specification is made in the resolution, and as a matter of course no testimony was adduced before the committee to establish any such inference or implication. If any such thing had been attempted, Mr. Corwin, if he chose, could at once have objected to the jurisdiction of the committee, and have told them that they were going beyond the duty assigned them by the House.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to read the preamble to the resolution?

Mr. OLDS. Certainly, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. It is as follows:

"Whereas, a strong suspicion rests upon the public mind that fraudulent claims have been allowed by the late Mexican Claim Commissioners, with one of which it is suspected Thomas Corwin, Secretary of the Treasury, has been improperly connected; therefore," &c.

Will the gentleman from Ohio incorporate it in his speech?

Mr. OLDS. Certainly I will. But, Mr. Speaker, it does not in the least change the interpretation of the resolution, neither does it in the least change the character of the specifications against Mr. Corwin.

Why, sir, the committee do not hesitate to say that the commissioners allowed fraudulent Mexican claims. The suspicions of the public then, as affirmed in this preamble, were well founded. Is it not, sir, equally as clear, that the connection of Mr. Corwin with one of them, as affirmed in the preamble, was improper? If not, sir, why do the committee, as they have done in the bill now under consideration, seek to make, in future, precisely such a connection, a misdemeanor, even though the claim may not be a fraudulent one? Mr. Corwin, sir, is welcome to the full benefit of all his friends can make out of this preamble.

Now, sir, with these facts before us, will the honorable gentleman from New York, or any honorable gentleman, rise in his place and say, that the committee have not fully sustained every specification made in the resolution of the House? I may, perhaps, be told that, in the remarks which I had the honor to submit to the House, at the time I introduced the resolution calling for this committee of investigation, I made certain charges against Mr. Corwin, which the committee felt itself called upon to investigate; and that upon those charges they have acquitted Mr. Corwin, and "turned back upon me the odium" of being an "infamous slanderer."

On the 5th of March last, in my remarks in this House upon the land bill, I charged that Corwin had been employed in this case, that it might receive the aid, not of his legal abilities, not of his great eloquence, but of his political position, and the influence of his great name. He is not charged with being a party in the fraud, but the charge is, that he sold his political position and political influence in aid of a claim, fraudulent in itself, and sustained by perjured testimony. I repeated the same language, showing my precise meaning in the remarks I submitted at the time of calling for the committee of investigation. That I may place myself right, and be correctly understood, I will read from the remarks then made, as reported in the Congressional Globe, page 2303, part 3d of the 24th volume, and repeated in the Appendix to the same volume, page 266:

"Sir, let me divert the attention of this committee for a single moment to charges that common rumor fasten upon the present Secretary of the Treasury, and which the country demand to have investigated by this Congress. I refer, sir, to his connection with the Gardiner claim. Public rumor charges, sir, that Mr. Corwin received $79,000 as the agent of this Gardiner claim. Now, sir, the inquiry naturally arises, Why did Mr. Gardiner stipulate to pay Mr. Corwin this enormous fee? Was Mr. Gardiner so dumb that he could not act as the agent of his own claim? Not so, sir; he is a man belonging to one of the liberal professions, and cannot be supposed to be devoid of common sense; and, sir, if his claim was a just one, he could himself present it before the proper tribunal and ask a decision upon its merits. But if his claim was bad, he would naturally desire to bring the stronger influence to its support. He could not have selected Mr. Corwin because of his great eloquence; for, sir, a plain, simple statement of facts was all that was allowed before the tribunal. He could not have selected him on account of his legal acumen in taking and arranging testimony, for, sir, this case was prepared and the testimony taken in Mexico; and every one knows that Mr. Corwin, though a great favorite in Mexico in consequence of 'his bloody hand and hospitable grave' sentiments, was never in Mexico. Nay, more, sir; a grand inquest of the country, upon their oaths, have said that this whole case is a forgery. Why, then, sir, was Mr. Corwin selected? The answer is obvious: Mr. Corwin is a great man with his party. He has been made so, sir, by the Whigs of Ohio. They made him their Representative first in this House; then, sir, they made him their standard-bearer of the party in Ohio, by selecting him as their candidate for Governor; then, sir, they sent him to the Senate of the United States. But this is not all; he was at one time the favorite of his party in Ohio, as a candidate for the Presidency. His name, in connection with that office, was at the mast-head of his party press. Sir, Mr. Gardiner, as a shrewd man, knew all this. He knew that this man must be possessed of great influence with a Whig Administration; and for the exercise of this influence, for the power of this position, Mr. Gardiner could afford to give Mr. Corwin $100,000, if thereby he could get allowed his claim of $480,000. But, sir, in what light does it present Mr. Corwin before the country? The people had sent him here to guard their interests; they were paying him eight dollars per day to watch the National Treasury; they supposed, sir, that with the vigilant and ever-watchful eye of Mr. Corwin upon the Treasury, all would be safe. But, sir, rumor says that they were mistaken in their man; for whilst receiving pay from the people to watch and guard their Treasury, this Mr. Gardiner, knowing his man, feed him on the other side—he outbid the people. Gardiner's $100,000 was as omnipotent over your National Treasury as was the 'Open sesame' of Ali Baba over the cavern of the 'Forty Thieves.'"

Mr. Speaker, the evidence of General Thompson himself, as well as that of Edward M. Johnson, the secretary of the board of Mexican claims commission, fully demonstrate it was political influence that Gardiner desired to aid and strengthen his claim, and not forensic eloquence or legal accumen.

Johnson, in his testimony, says:

"After the first instances, the board became satisfied that Dr. Gardiner himself understood his own case better than anybody else, and that the best means of arriving at the truth would be to receive his own statements, and cross-examine him on all these points."

Gardiner, then, was fully competent to the management of his own case; and in the selection of his counsel and agents, his object was to secure the aid of such persons as had power and influence with the commissioners.

This is shown in the testimony of Waddy Thompson, who, in speaking of the employment of Major Lally, a near connexion of one of the commissioners, says:

"Some time in the fall of 1849, or early in 1850, Dr. Gardiner called at my room and told me that he had been advised to employ Major Lally in this case. I protested strongly against it, and said it would be an act of great injustice to me to do so—to employ him or anybody else without my consent. I knew nothing of Major Lally or his character which would justify any imputation on that account, but I knew that such imputations would be made, as he was nearly connected with one of the commissioners, and, as I had been informed, was not a lawyer; and that he, Gardiner, had certainly counsel enough."

Gardiner, Mr. Speaker, most undoubtedly employed all these men, and gave them most enormous fees, that he might have the influence, not only of their political, but also of their personal position, in aid of his doubtful and fraudulent claim.

The charge against Mr. Corwin was, and is, that he sold his political position, being United States Senator, and his great personal influence with the Whig commissioners, in aid of a claim, fraudulent in itself, and sustained by perjured testimony.

I am aware, sir, that my colleague, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] in a speech delivered by him in this House in August last, by the quotation of a single paragraph from a speech of mine, made in July previous, not upon this subject, but upon the state of political parties, attempted to make me the accuser of Mr. Corwin, as being a party in the forgery and perjury committed in this case. In reply to my colleague on this precise point, I took particular pains to be correctly understood, and consequently put my exact meaning into the form of specific charges. They may be found on page 2303 of the 3d part of the 24th volume of the Congressional Globe. They are as follows:

First. "That Mr. Corwin, while acting as Senator, and receiving eight dollars per day for watching and guarding the National Treasury, took a contingent fee, said to amount to $100,000, for the prosecution of a claim against that Treasury."

This specification, excepting so much as fixes the amount of Corwin's fee, is fully sustained by the committee, who say "that in May the Hon. 'Thomas Corwin, then a member of the United 'States Senate, was employed as counsel in the 'Gardiner claim by General Waddy Thompson."

Second. "That when about to become the head of the Treasury Department, he sold his contingent fee to a citizen of New York for a large amount, said to be $79,000, and that said claim, amounting to nearly half a million of dollars, was paid upon the draft or warrant of Mr. Corwin."

The finding of the committee upon this specification has already been stated. It is, that "the 'Hon. Thomas Corwin resigned his seat in the 'Senate, and accepted the appointment of Secre-'tary of the Treasury, in the month of July, 1850. 'In the same month, and previous to his going 'into the Cabinet of President Fillmore as Sec-'retary of the Treasury, a sale of his fee interest 'in, and also of his half of the one fourth part of 'the Gardiner claim, was negotiated through the 'intervention of Governor John Young, of New 'York, to George Law, Esq., of New York;" and further, that "the money for the sale, $80,357, 'was received by Thomas Corwin, and on the '23d of November, was deposited by him to his 'credit with Messrs. Corcoran & Riggs."

Third. "That Thomas Corwin and Robert G. Corwin, his nephew, through Mr. Corcoran, purchased the one fourth interest of this claim for the sum of $15,000. That with this $15,000 Dr. Gardiner twice visited Mexico in the preparation of his papers and evidence, to be presented to the Board of Commissioners."

I have already shown, from the report of the committee, that Thomas Corwin and Robert G. Corwin purchased the one fourth of the Gardiner claim for a sum of over $22,000 instead of $15,000. The report of the committee also shows that after receiving this money, Dr. Gardiner proceeded to Mexico to complete his testimony. But to substantiate fully the charge that with this money Dr. Gardiner proceeded to Mexico with the instructions of General Thompson and Thomas Corwin in his pocket, allow me to refer again to Robert G. Corwin's Lebanon speech, in which, in speaking of the necessity of procuring additional testimony from Mexico, he says:

"Dr. Gardiner was now in an embarrassed condition. The destruction of his property in a foreign country had left him almost destitute. As one of the consequences, he had left the country largely in debt, and deemed it unsafe to return in his present condition His old friend Perez Galvez was dead, and he had no powerful friends in Mexico on whom he could rely. He had no money for so expensive a journey. In this dilemma, General Thompson and myself both endeavored to negotiate a loan for him, and failed. We also failed in our efforts to sell a share of the claim. Capitalists were afraid to invest, because, as they remarked, the commissioners had yet several months to sit, and in the mean time it might occur that Gardiner's claim lacked support, and the board had the power to revoke all it had done in his regard. At this time Dr. Gardiner came to me and insisted that I should purchase a share of his claim. At first averse to the proposal, my objections were gradually overcome, and I purchased one fourth of Dr. Gardiner's claim for the sum of over $40,000. This being a larger amount than I could command, and one half being a cash payment, I raised the money by getting my friends in Washington and Ohio to indorse my paper. Among others, I asked Thomas Corwin, and you know Corwin signs everybody's note.

"After this I proposed to Mr. Corwin that as we had been associated as lawyers in the case, and heretofore in business, he should join me in my purchase of an interest in the Gardiner claim. He did so after weighing the matter in his own mind, and finding no valid objection to such a course. This was in March, 1850."

Again, in his testimony before the committee, Robert G. Corwin says:

"I purchased the one-fourth of his claim. His reason for selling it was to raise money to go to Mexico and get this additional proof."

There is not a remaining doubt, then, but that, as charged, this sale was made in consequence of Gardiner's necessity to have money to visit Mexico. And the fact is equally as well established, that, with this money, he actually visited Mexico, with the instructions of Corwin and Thompson in his pocket, and that he returned with his forged testimony.

Fourth. "That Dr. Gardiner's claim was founded upon his right to a silver mine in Mexico, from which he alleges he was expelled by the Mexicans."

The committee say:

"The claim of George A. Gardiner was a claim for damages alleged to have been sustained by him, by reason of his expulsion, on the 24th day of October, 1846, by the Mexican authorities, from mines which he alleged he was extensively engaged in working in the State of San Luis Potosi, in Mexico."

Fifth. "That no such silver mine as the one claimed by Dr. Gardiner, ever existed."

Upon this specification, the committee say:

"Upon examination of the evidence taken by them, it appears from the testimony of José Antonio Barragan, that he is well acquainted with the place in the department of Rio Verde, State of San Luis Potosi, in Mexico, where Gardiner's evidence locates his mine; that there are silver mines in the State of San Luis Potosi, but that there is none at that place, or in the department of Rio Verde."

Again, the committee say:

"Two witnesses, John Baptiste Barragan and Pantaleon Galvan, testify to the forgery of the documentary evidence of Gardiner; and both testify that they are acquainted with the locality of Laguinillas, in the State of San Luis Potosi, and that there is no silver mine there. These three witnesses are Mexicans, residing in the vicinity where Dr. Gardiner's testimony locates his mine; they are all gentlemen of character and respectability in their own country. The first named, José Antonio Barragan, held, from 1843 to 1846, the office of collector of the customs at Rio Verde. Laguinillas belongs to this district. He now holds the office of comptroller general of the State of San Luis Potosi. They all came to the United States as witnesses, under an arrangement made by George W. Slacum, Esq., an agent of the United States Government, who went by direction of Hon. R. P. Letcher, the American Minister in Mexico, to the State and city of San Luis Potosi, for the purpose of investigating the character of the claim of George A. Gardiner, and the Meare claim, and obtaining testimony in relation to them."

The Sixth and last charge. "That the evidence upon which the Mexican claims commissioners awarded nearly half a million of dollars to Gardiner, Corwin & Co., was a forgery from beginning to end."

I have already shown from the finding of the committee, that "John Baptiste Barragan and Pantaleon Galvan, gentlemen of character and respectability, testify to the forgery of the documentary evidence of Dr. Gardiner."

The committee add:

"From the evidence before the committee, (the above being only a summary of the more important facts testified to by the witnesses,) the committee are constrained to believe, upon the first branch of the investigation committed to them, that the claim of George A. Gardiner, upon which an award was made by the Board of Commissioners for the sum of $428,750, was sustained before the commissioners by false testimony and forged papers, and is a naked fraud upon the Treasury of the United States."

These charges, Mr. Speaker, let it be recollected, were drawn up before the taking of any testimony in this case. And yet, sir, every one must admit, from the finding of the committee, after having all the testimony before them, that if they had desired to put the facts of this case, as they report them, into specifications for the purpose of introducing articles of impeachment against Mr. Corwin, they would have used the language, and made the specifications as I have made them. And yet, sir, the gentleman from New York would call this an honorable acquittal of Mr. Corwin, and "turning back upon me the odium by my own party."

Mr. Speaker, I will not say that at the time I offered the resolution calling for this committee of investigation, that I had not a settled conviction upon my mind, that Corwin must have known, or at least have strongly suspected, the fraudulent character of this claim. That conviction has not been changed, but greatly confirmed, by the evidence reported by the committee. But, sir, notwithstanding these convictions, I had no purpose of making any such charge in the resolution, knowing the utter impossibility of proving a man's thoughts or impressions. Nothing in the language of the resolution, or in the remarks with which I accompanied the resolution, can be construed into such a charge. Upon this precise point, sir, in commenting upon my colleague's account of Corwin's connection with this transaction, in which I supposed he had involved himself in seeming contradictions, I used the following language:

"What, sir, is to be the interpretation of these contradictory statements? I fear me, sir, that my colleague himself will convict Mr. Corwin of being a party to this fraud. I fear me, sir, (that from my colleague's own showing,) this case is likely to be far more serious upon Mr. Corwin than his worst enemies had apprehended."

This language does not look as though I desired, at that time, making Corwin a party to the fraud. I repeat, sir, no matter what might have been my settled convictions, this language shows that I designed making no such charge. It shows, sir, that I designed imposing no such inquiry upon the committee. Yet, sir, because the committee inserted in their report, a paragraph simply stating the fact that "no testimony has been ad-'duced before the committee proving, or tending 'to prove, that the Hon. Thomas Corwin had any 'knowledge that the claim of the said Gardiner 'was fraudulent, or that false testimony or forged 'papers had been, or were to be, procured to sus-'tain the same," I am to be told that the committee have acquitted Mr. Corwin of the actual charges, "and turned back upon me the odium." Why, sir, I never for a moment supposed that the cunning, sagacious Corwin, had so committed himself, as that his knowledge of the fraud would be proved. He would have been a fool, indeed, had he not well covered up his tracks; and notwithstanding he was surrounded by his friends and accomplices, kept his own secrets closely locked up in his own bosom. But, sir, apply to Mr. Corwin a principle universal in your courts of judicature, "that a man's inward intentions shall be judged by his outward acts," and then tell me if you can, sir, that Corwin has established his honest intentions, and vindicated his innocence.

But, sir, the committee do not undertake to say that Corwin had no such knowledge. They merely assert a fact, viz: that no such evidence was adduced before the committee. Upon the contrary, the inference to be drawn from the declaration and the action of the committee is, that they did infer that Corwin must have had suspicions, amounting almost to a certainty, that the whole case was a fraud. For it must be admitted upon all hands that the commissioners who allowed the claim had no better information as to the character of the claim than had Mr. Corwin, the confidential counsel and agent of Mr. Gardiner.

It is not to be presumed that Mr. Corwin would have purchased one fourth of so large a claim without having as closely scrutinized its validity and honesty as did the commissioners. Neither is it to be presumed that if the case had been devoid of suspicion that the Messrs. Corwin could have purchased one fourth of $428,000 for the sum of $22,000.

The committee do not hesitate to censure the commissioners. Does not that censure apply equally as strong to Mr. Corwin? They say:

"The committee, at the same time, are of opinion that there were circumstances developed during the course of the trial which should have induced the Board of Commissioners to have given the case a more thorough investigation.

"It is in proof, from the testimony of the secretary of the board, that the claim was suspected by the board from the first, and that Gardiner was frequently called on for explanations."

Were not these circumstances and suspicions as well known to Corwin as they were to the commissioners? To suppose anything else, is to deny to him that sagacity which his friends so fully accord to him.

Mr. Speaker, the committee do not undertake to say that Corwin had no knowledge of the fraudulent character of this claim. They merely assert the fact that no such evidence was presented to the committee. But, sir, is it not fair to infer the opinion of the committee as to the guilt or innocence of Mr. Corwin from the recommendation made by the committee to the House? That committee, sir, had been appointed and instructed to investigate Corwin's connection with the Gardiner claim. And what is their finding? Why, that Corwin, whilst acting as Senator, had been connected with this claim as the agent or counsel of Gardiner; the committee find, sir, that the Messrs. Corwin had a large fee interest in the claim; they find, sir, that Thomas Corwin and Robert G. Corwin had purchased the one fourth of this claim; they find that the claim was most fraudulent; and they find that it was sustained and allowed upon forged testimony. And what do they do, sir? Why, they report the facts to this House, and they accompany that report with a bill making the recurrence of just such transactions as Corwin had been guilty of a misdemeanor, and punishable with fine and imprisonment.

Mr. Speaker, every line, every word of that bill speaks trumpet-tongued the opinion of the committee as to the guilt or innocence of Mr. Corwin. The very caption of the bill has a significance in it not easily misunderstood. Listen to it:

"MR. PRESTON KING, from the Select Committee appointed to investigate the connection of the Hon. Thomas Corwin with the Gardiner claim, reported the following bill."

A bill for what, sir? Why, "A bill to prevent frauds upon the Treasury of the United States."

Does not this imply that a fraud had been committed upon that Treasury? And does it not connect Mr. Corwin with that fraud? Mr. Speaker, let me ask honorable gentlemen to listen to the reading of the bill, section by section, and then let them say if it is not a most fearful censure cast by the committee upon Mr. Corwin for his connection with the Gardiner claim:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all transfers and assignments hereafter made of any claim upon the United States, or any part or share thereof, or interest therein, whether absolute or conditional, and whatever may be the consideration therefor; and all powers of attorney, orders, or other authorities, for receiving payment of any such claim, or any part or share thereof, shall be absolutely null and void, unless the same shall be freely made and executed in the presence of at least two attesting witnesses, after the allowance of such claim, the ascertainment of the amount due, and the issuing of a warrant for the payment thereof.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any officer of the United States, or person holding any place of trust or profit, or discharging any official function, under, or in connection with, any Executive Department of the Government of the United States, or under the Senate or House of Representatives of the United States, who, after the passage of this act, shall receive any gratuity from any claimant against the United States, or shall act as an agent or attorney for prosecuting any claim against the United States, or shall in any manner, or by any means otherwise than in the discharge of his proper official duties, aid or assist in the prosecution or support of any such claim or claims, shall be liable to indictment, as for a misdemeanor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction for the trial of crimes and misdemeanors; and, on conviction, shall pay a fine not exceeding twice the amount of gratuity, fee, or compensation received by the person so convicted, or suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding one year, or both, as the court, in its discretion, shall adjudge.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That any Senator or Representative in Congress who, after the passage of this act, shall receive any gratuity from any claimant against the United States, or shall, for compensation paid or to be paid, certain or contingent, act as agent or attorney for prosecuting any claim or claims against the United States, or shall in any manner or by any means, for such compensation, aid or assist in the prosecution or support of any such claim or claims, shall be liable to indictment, as for a misdemeanor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction for the trial of crimes and misdemeanors; and, on conviction, shall pay a fine not exceeding twice the amount of the gratuity or compensation received by the person convicted, or suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding one year, or both, as the court, in its discretion, shall adjudge.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act, and of the act of July twenty-ninth, eighteen hundred and forty six, entitled "An act in relation to the payment of claims," shall apply and extend to all claims against the United States, whether allowed by special acts of Congress or arising under general laws or treaties, or in any other manner whatever; and every offense against the provisions of this act shall be a misdemeanor.

Call you this bill, sir, exonerating Mr. Corwin from all suspicions?

I will admit, sir, that if this bill had been reported from one of the standing committees of the House, the case would have presented a different aspect. But not so, sir. The bill comes from the committee appointed to investigate Corwin's connection with the Gardiner claim. If that connection had been all right and honorable, why has that committee reported this bill? Scrutinize this bill, sir; examine all its provisions. Why, sir, every section of it has been drawn by a master-hand, to meet precisely, and punish by incarceration within the walls of the penitentiary, exactly such a case as that presented by the committee against Mr. Corwin.

Mr. Speaker, if this committee designed exonerating Mr. Corwin from all censure, they have done him great injustice by reporting this bill. For it is impossible to separate Mr. Corwin's connection with the Gardiner claim, from the necessity which has called from that committee this most fearful and stringent bill.

And yet, sir, with all these facts staring him in the face, the gentleman from New York has the hardihood, may I not say the audacity, to tell this House and the country, that the committee have exonerated Mr. Corwin, "and turned the odium back upon me."

Why, sir, this bill, if it were a law, would not reach the case of any of the parties interested in the Gardiner claim, except the case of Thomas Corwin. It would not reach Waddy Thompson, for he is not a member of Congress. It would not reach Bob Corwin, or Mr. Curtis, or Major Lally. They are not members of Congress, neither are they connected with any of the Departments. If, then, the committee desired to exonerate Mr. Corwin from all censure, why do they seek to punish, by incarceration within the walls of a dungeon, any Senator or Representative in Congress, who shall do precisely what Mr. Corwin has done?

Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that this bill had been passed into a law, prior to Mr. Corwin's connection with the Gardiner claim, what would have been the consequence? Would he not have been indicted under it? Would he not have been liable to its pains and penalties? Mr. Corwin is innocent then, only from the fact, that we have no law to punish just such a case as the committee make out against him. But the committee recommend the passage of a law making it a misdemeanor, and punishable with fine and imprisonment, to do precisely what Mr. Corwin has done.

The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that a stupendous fraud has been perpetrated against the Government. The National Treasury has been robbed of nearly $500,000. So barefaced has been the fraud, that the committee informs us "that in 'July, 1852, the United States instituted a chancery 'suit in the circuit court of the District of Columbia, to enjoin in the hands of Corcoran & Riggs 'moneys and stocks belonging to G. A. Gardiner, 'to the amount of between $90,000 and $100,000; 'and also in the same month, in the circuit court 'of the southern district of New York, to enjoin 'in the hands of the New York Life Insurance 'and Trust Company moneys and stocks belonging to George A. Gardiner, to the amount of '$130,500."

Gardiner, it seems, sir, is to be made to disgorge his portion of this fraudulent claim—Gardiner is subjected to a criminal prosecution—Gardiner, the humble citizen, in all probability will be convicted, and suffer the extreme penalty of the law. But, sir, what will be, or rather, what ought to be done with the other parties interested with this stupendous fraud?

The Messrs. Corwin and Waddy Thompson, no matter what might have been their original impressions about this claim, are now fully aware that it was a naked fraud upon the National Treasury. Will they come forward like honest men and refund their portion of the plunder? or will they tighten their grasp upon their ill-gotten gain?

The committee, sir, have reported a bill to prevent and punish the recurrence of such transactions. Will this Congress content itself with the passage of this bill? Or in case of the neglect or refusal of Thompson, Corwin & Co. to refund, will it cause suits to be instituted against them, to recover back into the National Treasury their portion of this enormous plunder?

Be the action of Congress what it may, sir, I have discharged my duty, and am content to abide the result.

FOREIGN POLICY—CUBA.

SPEECH OF HON. E. C. MARSHALL,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 6, 1853,

In the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the conduct of the present Administration in regard to Cuba, and our foreign policy generally.

Mr. MARSHALL said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I had not wished or intended to claim the attention of the committee to the remarks I propose to make to-day. I had intended, and still intend (unless the duty is discharged by some one who can bring before the House the authority of a greater name) to offer a resolution to this effect: That the Committee on Ways and Means be directed to report a bill placing at the disposal of the President of the United States the sum of five or ten millions of money in the Treasury, and not otherwise appropriated, to meet any exigencies which may arise before the meeting of the next Congress in our foreign relations. I wished to have presented some such resolution in the House, not only that it might give rise to discussion of matters of a practical and important bearing on the interests of the country, but that such discussion might be followed by some action on the part of this House which would have significance before the people. I had hoped, and still hope, that a vote of the House, giving unequivocal expression of opinion upon practical questions will be taken, and I entertain the fullest confidence that that vote will have the happiest effect at home and abroad. The expression here in committee of abstract opinions on questions which may never arise, and which certainly will only arise in the remote future, is no part of my purpose to-day.

There are affairs now pending in regard to which the action of the Executive, so far as any action has been had, has been, as I think, and as I shall endeavor to prove, ruinous to the interests and fatal to the honor of the nation. Fortunately, our foreign policy may yet be changed, or rather, a foreign policy may be established consistently with the faith of treaties and all our obligations, while the public interests are protected and the national honor redeemed. The resolution which I propose to introduce will announce to the incoming Administration our perfect confidence in it, as the popular vote in the late election has done on the part of the people themselves. It is offered not as a war measure, but simply implies that a change of policy is desired, and that the Executive will have the support, the earnest and effectual support of Congress. A vote of confidence of this character is not without precedent in our history; and it is also established firmly in the Government from which many of our usages and laws are derived. I shall urge this measure upon the Democratic party as a peace measure, and one which strikes me as the most important upon which we shall have to act, in its effects upon our national character and national interests. The subject of our foreign relations has been introduced by gentlemen in committee, and questions have been debated which, although not identical with those which I think render necessary the vote of confidence of which I have spoken, are yet cognate questions; and as the points to which I attach the greatest importance have been almost neglected and doctrines inculcated of the worst influence upon the State which I represent, in part, I have determined to give my own views of those questions at this time, although I think the subject would have come up with more propriety and effect upon a resolution before the House. I shall call the attention of the committee to the diplomacy of this Government in the Island of Hayti and the Republic of Nicaragua, because there we have incurred the deepest shame and sustained the greatest loss, and because these evils are not without easy remedy; and for the further reason that the State which I represent in part has a special and local interest in the policy of the Government as regards the Gulf of Mexico, its islands and shores.

It is true, as a general principle, that in a Confederacy like ours, the more remote members are, and ought to be, more jealous of the honor, and more sensitive to every indication of weakness of the Union, than those nearer the political and geographical center. Civis sum Americanus is uttered with more pride on the shores of the Pacific than the Potomac.

We lean upon the General Government for support; and nowhere within the ample boundaries of the Union does there exist the same sentiment of confiding dependence that we feel. At the same time there are none of the States which have felt with such poignant shame the sacrifice of honor and principle, and the deep humiliation, brought on us as a people by the present Administration.

We believe, we know, that there is strength enough in the Government, under a manly and patriotic Administration, to protect all its parts in all their rights. The eagle's wing is strong enough to bear its flight over the continent, and its beak and talons sharp enough to guard its charge, even though the lion of England should array himself against it in his acknowledged power.

The interest so universally felt in the subject of inter-oceanic communication, and much of that felt in regard to the islands and shores of the Gulf of Mexico, has arisen since, and depends on the acquisition of California. Commercial necessity forces us to transmit, monthly, nearly three millions of specie through an independent republic, and under the very guns of fortresses which have only to hold us in the contempt we have merited to become hostile; and the inestimable rights of every kind of our citizens are exposed through the same causes, and to the same dangers. I feel obliged, therefore, even on occasions not peculiarly appropriate, even when the effort will not be productive of immediate action, to assert the doctrines I hold, and to expose the imbecility and corruption, from which even now we are suffering. The Island of Cuba, and the possibility and probability of its annexation to the Union, and the policy of the Administration toward the Government on which it is dependent, have produced much debate. The danger of collision between Spain and ourselves seems to me to have passed for the present, and, right or wrong, the questions between us are settled. I do not think that in good faith the next Administration can, or that it will, assert any claim or principle likely to renew the late difficulties, or to change materially our relations with Spain or Cuba. I cannot see that any immediate necessity exists for a change in our policy, or that any practical question is likely to arise. Neither the next Administration, nor the present generation, will be called on to act in regard to it, and I am willing to leave it to the wisdom and courage and patriotism of those who will, by the course of events, and in the fullness of time, have to meet it. I cannot but allude to one significant fact, of which I have seen no explanation, which goes to prove that the Administration is by no means confident of the propriety of its course in the most exciting and threatening of the Cuban difficulties. The American Consul in Havana, who had pursued precisely the course consistent with the expressed views and instructions of the Government, who carried out with a tameness and cowardice, which should have made him Secretary of State, the will of the Executive, was by that very Executive dismissed with dishonor, and given over to the execrations of the whole unanimous people, without one word of explanation or defense.

The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE,] who introduced this discussion, did not confine himself to an examination of the policy of the Administration in respect to Cuba, but went on to the assertion of general principles, which I was surprised to hear from him, and in which I by no means concur. That gentleman also indulged himself in a general reprobation of the doctrines of progress, and the plans of filibusters, and seemed to intimate a belief that some political party, or section of a party, were desirous of lawless conquest, and in favor of predatory incursions upon neighboring Powers, especially if those Powers were weaker than ourselves. Now, sir, let me say in behalf of Young America, and the progressives, with whose opinions I sympathize, that we desire to do no one thing which is not consistent with the sound principles of public law, and the rights of all our neighbors. That we do not desire war for conquest, or any purpose; that we regard it as the greatest evil, except dishonor. And further, that we advocate no measure of foreign policy which ought, or which we believe will, lead to war. We contend for no new doctrine; we merely insist upon the strict observance of principles well established by authority, and necessary for our own peace and safety. I shall, in another connection, state the doctrines to which I allude, while I now consider some of the leading propositions of the gentleman, [Mr. VENABLE,] which I believe constitute a faith common to the gentleman and the more conservative portion of the Whig party.

If I understood the gentleman, he was opposed to the annexation of Cuba at any time, and in any way, on the ground that the Union could not with safety embrace any additional territory. I will also state what I believe is the real operative reason of the objection of that gentleman. It is a conviction, now nearly universal, that the progress of slavery in American territory is arrested. That in all future acquisitions, from the operation of many active causes, the institution of slavery will not exist. It is clear that whatever the reason assigned, the ground of opposition to the acquisition of a country so manifestly advantageous to the South as Cuba would be, either as a free or slave State, is jealousy of the North.

Mr. Chairman, the time is past when the question of slavery in any territory about to be acquired, can produce the agitation and danger which has arisen from it. The principle is settled by the compromise, that the citizens of such territory, at the time, shall determine for themselves this question; and if the North should, by its greater energy and aptitude for emigration, acquire the popular power, and the right under the rule so settled by the compromise, to declare any territory seeking admission into the Union, free, the South could not, if it would, under the Constitution and laws, and would not if it could, resist a measure beneficial to the whole nation. The South should be satisfied with the guarantees of the Constitution and the laws, for their peculiar institution; and even if it be receding, if the conditions of human society, and the progress of free States militate against it; if with the protection thrown round it by the organic law of the land, it be yet in its own nature temporary and evanescent, and about to disappear before the democratic energies and the laws of political economy, there is neither the wisdom of a statesman, nor the generous patriotism of a good citizen, in seeking to impede the advance, and check the development of States where no such institution obtains.

I believe myself, and I speak only for myself, that there will be no more slave territory annexed to the United States. The history of the country, and especially of California, establishes the fact, and illustrates the principle which governs the case. Look at California. If slavery could ever progress, it would have obtained there. Slavery is only advantageous to the slaveholder in countries where the largest amount of labor can be bestowed on the smallest surface, and where it pays the heaviest profit. Now, sir, since man first left the Garden of Eden, there has been no place discovered where these conditions are so wonderfully met, as in California—and yet I tell gentlemen that there never was a time when slavery could have been introduced there, nor is such a time coming. We approved the compromise; but the character of our State was fixed without it. Labor was imposed as a curse, (and it is awful in my private opinion,) and free citizens will not submit to have it made dishonorable, as well as disagreeable, by slave competition. Free men will be the first emigrants, and they have, and will protect their aristocracy of labor from the action of organized capital, in the shape of slavery.

But as regards the proposition now beginning to be urged in the most unexpected quarter, that any extension of territory is dangerous to the Union, I shall say only a few words. The directly opposite proposition would seem true upon its mere statement—certainly every addition of territory, voluntarily connecting itself with an existing government, increases the physical force and resources of every kind, at the disposition of the constituted authorities of the whole.

It is true that a pure democracy can only exist within narrow territorial limits, and with a very small population, for the obvious reason that where the people assemble and pass laws directly, that only a very few can meet or act in concert. Our own observation and experience proves that such democracy should consist of fewer citizens than compose this House, if prompt and efficient legislation is the thing desired. But that difficulty, which is as old as the formation of society, was obviated by the system of responsible representatives of the people themselves. The other objection, that a legislature assembled from vast distances, could not wisely provide for the local wants of regions remote, and to the great majority of its component members, wholly unknown, has been met only conclusively in the history of the world by our own system, partly national and partly federal. The establishment of the doctrine of State rights, as a security for efficient local legislation, and a Federal Legislature, Executive, and Judiciary, for the arrangement of foreign relations and of domestic affairs, throwing its guardian arm over all, is perfect in theory and in practice. It appears to give the only absolute security against the prevalence of dangerous faction, by placing always, in the hands of the National Government, the force of more than half of the Confederacy; and against foreign invasion it is a self-evident security—and these internal factions and foreign wars exclude all the perils which can menace a nation. I confess that I can see only one limit to the safe extension of territory, and that is in a distance so great that the constituent citizens would be unable to hold the representative to the rigid responsibility which is the basis of the whole system.

Such a Government seems to me to grow stronger with each accession of territory, and like a well-constructed arch, to acquire greater firmness from increased pressure and accumulated weight. But suppose the worst did happen, from the annexation of Cuba, or any other province—suppose the worst to have come—that the parts could no longer hold together, but must dissolve: what then? I say, still, that the experiment is worth trying, and that good would result even from the temporary union. We would have introduced new ideas; we would have taught the lesson of self-government, of resistance to oppression, of freedom, of the equality of men in the eye of the law, of the dignity of the individual, without which teachings, man had better not be.

We would have made converts to the faith of human liberty, and given their true value to a nation; and whether we continued to exist in one Union, or broke into fifty free republics, the world would be improved by the diffusion of that knowledge, which alone makes life tolerable. The great Union so broken, would be like a fractured diamond, less valuable certainly in its fragmentary state, but still the same precious material, reflecting from each brilliant part the light of American civilization, intelligence, and liberty.

No one can have less sympathy than myself with the wild excesses into which doctrines liberal, but at the same time safe and prudent, have been sometimes carried. I would by no means defend the vagaries of Anacharsis Cloots, or such sects as he represented. I mean to be never the advocate of wild and self-sacrificing propagandism; but I prefer it much, in its worst form, to the extreme of conservatism—that conservatism which would, in terror and suspicion, withdraw from all foreign intercourse into Japanese solitude; that conservatism which, in dread of entangling alliances, would refuse to declare a principle of public law, or in the maintenance of strict neutrality neglect to defend its citizens, plundered by both belligerents; that conservatism which instructs the representatives of a great Republic to avoid in monarchical courts the expression of the sentiment of the country they represent, or the inculcation abroad of the free principles which alone give value to government; that conservatism which has already made our own diplomatic corps mere evidences of the power, mere trappings and circumstances to swell the pomp and flatter the insolence of those potentates to whom their very presence should be a solemn warning; that conservatism which dares not interpose in friendly mediation between its own neighbors, without calling in the crowned heads of Europe to destroy its influence, and laugh at its folly. Liberal opinions and bold policy may run into inconsiderate rashness; but prudent conservatism may also degenerate into cowardly imbecility. The notions of an hundred years past are not necessarily or generally suitable or safe at this date.

The conservatism of the present day is a mere eddy in the rushing and resistless tide of human development and progress. The position of our continent, its mere geographical position, makes impossible the policy of conservatism. Placed between the civilization of the Orientals, which the maturity of despotism has well-nigh destroyed, and the nations of Europe still fresh and vigorous even under the curse of monarchical and aristocratic institutions, commercial necessity, like the attraction of gravitation, forces contact with both. Commerce must have its agents, must be protected. Representatives of the Government, with political character higher than the mere consul, and hedged round by the sacred jus postliminii, introduce the very atmosphere of the republic to the court of the monarch—opinions are diffused, sympathies are created, interests spring up, which may be affected by the terms of treaties to which we are not parties; wars and pacifications, transfers of territories by which our rights and privileges may be sacrificed, so blended become the interests of commercial nations that an injury to one is an injury to the other. The United States must either adopt a Japanese seclusion, or she will be forced into entangling alliances, and will become the involuntary propagandist of the hideous principle of republican liberty. Conservatism is impossible: we must go backward or forward. We must decline into worse than colonial feebleness, or we must accomplish a mission of world-wide beneficence. Fogyism itself would look hopefully forward from one of our California promontories, around which break, unchecked in their wild play for six thousand miles, the giant waves of the Pacific ocean. (Plenipotentiaries from China offering unrestricted intercourse)—Fogyism itself would become a convert to progress, and fancy the very continent a vast ship voyaging triumphantly into that future, which opens bright but boundless around humanity.

I have said, Mr. Chairman, that the subject to which I should ask the attention of the committee, was of a practical character. In the investigation of the policy of the Administration in the Island of Hayti, I shall attempt to prove that the doctrine of Mr. Monroe, and the principles of national law, and the dictates of humanity, and the impulses of universal manhood, that all the settled and necessary rules of conduct peculiar to the United States, as between it and the Powers of Europe, in the adjustment of the affairs of this continent, and the instruction and all-pervading sense of dignity and personal consequence which regulates the deportment of man to man, have been openly and absurdly violated. That the rights and interests of the United States, the rights and interests of a sister Republic, have been continually and wantonly sacrificed. These are strong terms, but I shall endeavor to establish the title of the Administration to yet stronger epithets. And here, sir, in advance of the argument, and assuming, for a moment, what I propose to prove, I must express my astonishment and mortification at the course of the central Democratic journal, (The Union,) in regard to this affair. This journal, which should be the organ of the party—which should exert an immense influence in the formation of public opinion—which should gather, with patient labor, correct information for general diffusion; this paper which should be a vigilant sentinel over the doings of the Administration, has selected this disgraceful negotiation for its approbation. The Union has exhibited the last degree of ignorance and thoughtlessness in its article upon this subject, and has not only failed to throw any light upon it, but has not even reflected truly the conclusions or reasoning of even the most careless observers of passing events. We want beyond everything a party organ which shall be conducted, not as a commercial speculation, not solely or principally with a view to pecuniary advantage, but a periodical which shall be the jealous guardian of the rights of the people and the honor of the nation; which shall speak with the boldness of conscious knowledge on all subjects of public importance. Upon this question of Hayti, the Republic copies the article of the Union as being perfectly in accordance with the views of the Administration. Did not the Union know, had its editor never heard, that the Democratic party, so far as it had expressed, by the press or otherwise, its opinions on this point, had visited, with the deepest reprobation, the course of the Administration?—but the article itself contains (what every one in the country knows, and nothing more) enough to convict itself of absurdity, and the Executive of weakness and disregard of one of the fundamental principles of American policy. It says:

"In general, the foreign policy of President Fillmore's administration has not been in accordance with our notion of what the foreign policy of this country should be, and we have been constrained in some instances to express an emphatic disapprobation of negotiations which seemed to us to compromise the dignity and to surrender the rights of the United States. For this reason, any instances of an energetic or wise administration of the foreign affairs of the country by an Executive whose general policy we have been constrained to condemn, will the more readily command our warmest commendation. Such an instance of wise diplomacy do we regard the efforts of this Government, in conjunction with Great Britain and France, to arrest the sanguinary designs of the negro Emperor of Hayti against the republic of Dominica.

"By som emeans, publicity has been given to the correspondence between the State Department and Mr. Robert M. Walsh, its agent in the negotiation for the pacification of Hayti. In the various papers which constitute this correspondence, the motives and purposes of the Administration in proffering its good offices in behalf of the Dominican republic, are frankly and clearly set forth.

"In 1821, the Spanish portion of the Island of St. Domingo voluntarily subjected itself to the government of Hayti, then presided over by Boyer. On the expulsion of Boyer, and on account of the wrongs and grievances which they had endured, with a repetition of which they were menaced, the Dominicans threw off the subjection of negro government and established an independent republic. To this step the Spanish inhabitants of St. Domingo were driven by the necessity of self-preservation. Not only were their political rights and their liberty invaded and trampled upon by the black barbarians of Hayti, but the doom of indiscriminate slaughter and extermination was incessantly held before them in the threats of the Macaya and Dessalines.

"By the most imperious necessity, then, were the Dominicans impelled to set up an independent government. Nevertheless, their act of separation was regarded as a revolt by the negroes of Hayti, who prepared to reduce the rebel whites to subjection by the strong arm of force. All the efforts of the Haytian government were unequal, however, to the reconquest of Dominica. The Spaniards defended themselves with valor and energy, and, despite the disparity of numbers, successfully repelled the invasions of their foes. They achieved and established their independence. France formally recognized the republic of Dominica. England and the United States recognized it by their acts. Still Soulouque refused to acknowledge the independence of the Dominicans, and persisted in his efforts to reduce them to subjection. In this juncture, under the apprehension of a very formidable attack by Soulouque, the Dominican government solicited the mediation of the United States, Great Britain, and France, to restore, if possible, peaceable relations with its savage neighbors. Great Britain and France promptly acceded to the proposition, impelled thereto by every consideration of justice and humanity. Without reluctance, the United States followed their example. The Government dispatched Mr. Walsh to the Haytian court, to coöperate with the representatives of Great Britain and France in the humane endeavor to persuade the Emperor Soulouque to abandon his hostile designs against the Dominicans.

"Persuasion could not appease his ferocious wrath, nor could threats drive him from his bloody purposes. He persisted in his designs against Dominica, and would in no manner acknowledge its independence. The utmost the mediating Powers could effect was the prolongation of an existing truce.

"And this was the issue of a negotiation for which the Administration deserves credit. It originated in an impulse of humanity, and sought to protect a civilized community from the oppression and ferocity of a blood-thirsty savage. The mission of Mr. Walsh was a mission of peace and true philanthropy."

Even in the imperfect history of the Island of Hayti here given, it is clear that the Dominicans were entitled to their independence in the judgment both of the Union and the Administration; that being so entitled, and in fact being independent, they invited the United States to protect them against a savage whose power was originally founded on murder, and continued and sustained by lawless outrage. The Union indorses this paragraph from the instructions of Mr. Webster to Mr. Walsh, the agent who conducted the negotiation:

"You will then, conjointly with your colleagues, require the Emperor to conclude a permanent peace with the Dominican government upon the basis which you may jointly prescribe to him, or to consent to a truce with that government of not less than ten years.

"The Emperor should be made properly aware of the dangers which he and his country may encounter, if he should be unfortunately advised to reject reasonable terms of pacification; but you will stop at remonstrance until further notice."

Now, if this means anything, it means that the United States assert a right to intervene forcibly, if necessary, in the affairs of the island, and that that intervention has been made in a way that calls for "the warmest commendations" from the Union. Those warmest commendations are bestowed upon the total failure "to appease his (Soulouque's) ferocious wrath," or "drive him from his bloody purpose." If the Union desired to defend or explain this contemptible failure, it would have been generous to the Administration; but to bestow the warmest commendations upon it for permitting a bloody savage—not acknowledged by the very Administration itself as one of the recognized Powers of the earth—to mock and defy it, while he does the very thing about which the issue has been made, is self-evident nonsense. This is the plain statement: The United States says to Soulouque, You shall not make war on the republic of Dominica; Soulouque says, I will make war on the republic of Dominica; and the United States don't say anything more—but the Union says, it is "an energetic and wise administration of the foreign affairs of the country.

Oh, shade of Dogberry! rejoice, that at length thy profound teachings are appreciated by a Whig Administration and a Democratic editor:

"Dogberry. You shall comprehend all vagrom men; you are to bid any man—Stand, in the prince's name.

"Watchman. How if he will not stand?

"Dogberry. Why then, take no note of him, but let him go; and presently call the rest of the watch together, and thank God you are rid of a knave."

But, sir, the Union seems wholly unconscious that the Administration has not been content to render itself simply ridiculous, and contemptible; but that to do so effectually, it has violated a principle, the very clearest and least liable to dispute in our entire foreign policy. I allude to the doctrine of Monroe. The Union makes itself responsible for the joint mediation of France and England, accepted by the Administration in direct and apparently intentional, gratuitous, and wanton violation of the policy which is essential alike to our safety and our honor. In another connection, I will state the doctrine, and what I conceive to be its meaning and effect; but for the present purpose, I would only direct the attention of the Union to the National Intelligencer of December 23d, where "non-interference on the part of European Powers with the independent Governments of the New World," is stated as an admitted principle of all parties—apparently in the same happy oblivion of the course of the Administration in this and other transactions, as the Union.

But leaving the Democratic organ to the consolation to be derived from the sympathy of the Republic, I will examine the course of the Administration in regard to Hayti, by the light of its own official correspondence, and other reliable sources of information. The momentous importance of this island to the United States in a commercial point of view, and its still greater importance as a naval depôt, has been strangely overlooked. I do not speak of the policy of its annexation, nor do I contemplate its acquisition by the United States; nor do I believe that the course of the next Administration ought to be or will be shaped with any such purpose; but this I do say is obvious from a single glance, that its independence of Europe is of more moment to us than that of Cuba; and that the protection of the white republic, which embraces two thirds of its surface, against the negro empire which holds and ruins while it holds the other third, is at once our duty and our interest, and that such interference should be without the coöperation of any European Power; but that in that island, more than elsewhere, the interference of Europe, whether as joint mediators, or in any other way, should be effectually prevented. The dependence of Cuba on Spain is the cause of the embarrassments and difficulties which have sprung up in that direction. Hayti has for nearly thirty years been wholly independent of all European power. The island contains about thirty thousand square miles. Of this area, about one third of its western end is in possession of Soulouque, and the remaining two thirds constitute the territory of the republic of Dominica. It is blessed with a climate the most delightful, and a soil the most productive; it lies to the windward of Cuba, and holds it, in fact, a mere prisoner in its hands if in the possession of any naval or military power. By its geographical position, it is the true key to the Gulf of Mexico, and to both oceans the natural Queen of the Antilles. It has upon its northeast side a bay called Samaná, perhaps the finest in the world, and which is said at this time to be occupied by France; a bay of which a French political writer of eminence speaks in these words:

"There are three points in the Atlantic which assure the maritime prepondcrance to the great power which shall establish itself on either one of them—the little Island of St. Thomas, the Mole of St. Nicholas, (in Hayti,) and the Bay of Samaná. St. Thomas, at present the entrepôt and maritime center of that part of the world, is nothing but a barren rock, to which everything—even wood and water—has to be brought from abroad: and besides, it belongs to Denmark. The Mole of St. Nicholas is surrounded and commanded by a compact circuit of high mountains, which circumstance requires the military occupation of a very extensive territory; it belongs, moreover, to the Haytians. There remains Samaná. Of all the bays in the world, the Bay of Samaná is at once the most vast, the most secure, and the best defended on the side of the land and of the sea; while all the riches of the mineral and vegetable kingdoms—from gold to coal, from ship-timber to precious shrubs—are found accumulated in the peninsula which gives it its name."

"Where, then, shall we search for the secret of the hesitation, which nothing without or within can excuse? Is it in the strange illusion of one of our last Ministers of Foreign Affairs, who, in reply to one that was representing to him the danger of the occupation of Samaná by the United States, said: 'Fortunately the English are yet in Jamaica;' so, too, were the English in Oregon?" * * *

"No, it lies, I fear, in the traditional maxim of the bureau: 'It is none of our business.' None of our business! Happy, indeed, is that country which can act on such maxims! But are we in that condition? When England is each day enlarging the distance which the year 1848 placed between her and us," * * * "when the United States are covering the Atlantic and Pacific with their annexationist Corsairs; do we not, by remaining asleep in our little corner, incur the risk of awaking some fine day, stifled and powerless? Our lethargy is here all the less inexcusable, inasmuch as there are no political or financial obstacles for an excuse; that in order to see our flag float over the Peninsula of Samaná, we should not have even the trouble of carrying it thither; [quere?] that, in order to conquer the finest maritime and territorial position of the New World, the tête-de-pont of the passage of Panama, the future entrepôt of the two hemispheres, the key of the two oceans, would only require of us a simple monosyllable and a single nod of the head. But why say this aloud? Some one will object to me. Good God! to make known here what all the world, except ourselves, knows already."

These considerations no wise people will overlook. It is true, that at present, while the resources of both divisions of the island are exhausted by wars and preparations for wars against each other, the commerce of the island seems comparatively unimportant. The exports of the Dominican republic are about one million annually, and Hayti about three millions; the population of Dominica being about one hundred and twenty-five thousand, of which only fifteen thousand are pure blacks, thirty thousand whites, and the balance blancos, or mixed, and Hayti about seven hundred thousand. This commerce has been declining, as has the actual produce of the island, steadily since its occupation by the French, in 1787, 1788, and 1789. In those years, the exports from Hayti alone, one third of the island—and with a population, all told, of five hundred and thirty-five thousand—was $8,783,000; the consequence is, that Dominica, which has a soil equally productive, and twice as extensive, would, if she were suffered to, equal the condition of Hayti under the French in 1787, 1788, and 1789, sustain a population of more than a million, and export over fifty millions. This is an estimate infinitely lower than the facts justify, but it is sufficient to show that the interest of the United States consists with its duty; that all the motives, pecuniary advantage, security for our trade in the Gulf, and the dictates of humanity, should impel us to the effectual protection of the Dominicans.

But no motive of interest would be sufficient to direct national policy as against the public sentiment of civilized and enlightened nations or the plain dictates of morality and justice.

Has the United States a right to interfere? The Administration has not only settled that question as against itself by an actual interference, but it has published satisfactory reasons for its intervention. In addition to the instructions given to Mr. Walsh, quoted before, the following extract from a letter addressed by the representatives of the three Powers, Great Britain, France, and the United States, to the Haytian Minister of Foreign Relations, expresses the views of the Administration, and takes the true ground:

"In the eyes of the three Powers, the independence of the Dominicans reposes upon a right as sacred, a fundamental compact as respectable, a fact as consummate, as those which secure the independence of Hayti itself. In their eyes, that people is in legitimate possession of all the titles which constitute nationalities the most incontestable; a regular administration, a legislation protecting equally the persons and property of all, a military organization both on land and sea, a flag enjoying the honors due to that of a free country, international relations through accredited agents, and even a solemn treaty of recognition and commerce with one of the chief nations of the earth."

And from the same document:

"Reduced to the alternative of renouncing those advantages, or of perpetually fighting to retain them, the Dominicans have been compelled to request the intervention of the Powers with whom they are connected by the aforesaid international relations, in order to free themselves from a position so deplorable.

"That intervention they justly obtained, because a few words inserted in the often-modified constitution of Hayti, are by no means sufficient to create for that country a right of perpetual possession of the territory of its neighbor—a possession entirely fictitious at the time when that constitution was formed, continuing so during eighteen subsequent years, and again becoming so after the lapse of seven, and of which the temporary existence only demonstrated the radical impossibility of blending two races of different origin, customs, manners, and language."

And again:

"The only thing for foreign nations to consider was the simple fact that the Republic of St. Domingo is positively independent, and entitled to be treated as such, whatever may have been the original rights or pretensions of Hayti."

Nothing could be more distinct and satisfactory than this. Upon the same subject, and to show to the Department at home the propriety and necessity of intervention, Mr. Walsh writes to Mr. Webster in these words—this is official:

"The contrast between the picture which is now presented by this country, and that which it exhibited when under the dominion of the French, affords a melancholy confirmation of what I have said. It was then indeed an 'exulting and abounding' land—a land literally flowing with milk and honey; now, it might be affirmed, without extravagance, that where it is not an arid and desolate waste, it is flooded with the waters of bitterness, or covered with noisome and poisonous weeds. 'When I arrived here,' to quote the words of an intelligent foreigner who has been in Hayti since the epoch of its independence, 'there was abundance of everything—now there is a want of everything.' The cultivation of sugar, which was once the main fountain of wealth, is now entirely abandoned, except for the production of an intoxicating drink; and that of coffee has so much decreased, that it would not in the least be a matter of surprise if ere long the supply of that indispensable article for Haytian commerce, were to be insufficient for the ordinary consumption of the inhabitants themselves.

"The government, in spite of its constitutional forms, is a despotism of the most ignorant, corrupt, and vicious description, with a military establishment so enormous that, while it absorbs the largest portion of the revenue for its support, it dries up the very sources of national prosperity, by depriving the fields of their necessary laborers to fill the town with pestilent hordes of depraved and irreclaimable idlers."

And in further proof of the strong position taken by Mr. Walsh, with the approbation of the Department, witness this extract from an official letter:

"I thought I might then try the effect of an argument which I took care to represent as wholly unofficial and private, my Government having no knowledge of it whatever. The day before I left Norfolk I was told by a friend that he had been offered a command in an expedition which was contemplated to go to St. Domingo and assist its inhabitants against the Haytians. This fact I communicated to the Minister with all plausible emphasis, dwelling upon the perilous probability that should such an expedition ever land upon the island, all the miseries and horrors with which the Emperor was now threatening the Dominicans would be brought to his own door; that the desperadoes composing it would never rest until they had exhausted every effort to overwhelm the empire, and that even if they should fail in destroying it, the evils they would suffer would be almost equivalent to ruin. The only sure way, I added, to arrest the danger was to conclude a peace, and by thus depriving the expedition of the lawful motive of lending aid to a people whose independence was wrongfully assailed, it would become the duty of the United States to prevent it from leaving their shores.

"The chord was one which seemed to vibrate more strongly than any other, for the Government has been in great dread of such an expedition ever since the attack upon Cuba."

And again, from Mr. Walsh, as to the right to menace or use force:

"The truth is, the big ship in the harbor is not a pleasant spectacle to his eyes, and the sending such a one just now, is a ceremony of which he would much prefer the breach to the observance. It is a pity the commodore cannot protract his stay here, as the presence of the steamer would materially assist our negotiations, the logic of force being, I am afraid, the only kind which his government thoroughly comprehends, or at least is disposed to respect."

But as to the views of the Department of State of the national character of Hayti and the government of Soulouque, the following to Mr. Walsh, from Mr. Webster, is conclusive:

"It is presumed, however, that in process of time—and perhaps before long—if the Haytian government shall abandon its ambitious projects of foreign conquest, shall devote its attention to the improvement of its own people, and shall succeed in that object, so as to command the respect of dispassionate and impartial men, no nation whose interests may dictate the measure will hesitate to send consuls to their ports or to recognize Haytian consuls in their ports."

Could anything be clearer? The Government itself asserts the right to coerce the Haytian outlaw, and refuses to recognize the absurd and monstrous empire as one of the Powers of the earth, entitled to the respect or countenance of the civilized world. One other extract from Mr. Walsh's report, and the diplomatic history of this affair, as furnished by the Government, is finished. In it is confessed the failure of the whole mission, and the only honorable and manly course indicated. It has been, however, wholly disregarded:

"That result can only be accomplished by coercing the Haytian government. All persuasion and argument are thrown away upon it, all sense of duty and justice and right is merged by it in sanguinary ambition and ferocious vindictiveness. The Dominicans will listen to no terms which do not establish their national sovereignty, which they have so long and so successfully defended.

"They would prefer total extermination, as they declare and as their conduct demonstrates, to falling again under the atrocious despotism which they have shaken off; and every consideration of interest, of justice, of humanity demands that their independence should be placed on a secure and permanent basis."

I will, however, Mr. Chairman, take a more comprehensive view of this question. Has the United States a right to intervene for the protection of Dominica against Soulouque? The facts and principles which are necessary to prove this right, are often identical, and always connected with those which establish the obligation of the Government to forbid, and at any hazard to prevent, the interference of any European Power, especially France or England, in the affair.

The conclusion as to the policy of the Government, which has contemptibly failed in the assertion of the right, and which has, without any justification or necessity, or any good result, in fact violated the obligation, is inevitable. Before going into these facts, before giving a brief account of the relations of the Island of Hayti to Europe and to ourselves, and its different parts to each other, and of the submission by this Government to the interference of France and England, it is well to recur to and carry with us distinctly the rule of foreign policy, and its reasons, which is called the Monroe doctrine. In the seventh message of Mr. Monroe, this clear and luminous exposition of the doctrine occurs:

"It was stated at the commencement of the last session that a great effort was then making in Spain and Portugal to improve the condition of the people of those countries, and that it appeared to be conducted with extraordinary moderation. It need scarcely be remarked that the result has been, so far, very different from what was then anticipated. Of events in that quarter of the globe, with which we have so much intercourse, and from which we derive our origin, we have always been anxious and interested spectators. The citizens of the United States cherish sentiments the most friendly in favor of the liberty and happiness of their fellow-men on that side of the Atlantic. In the wars of the European Powers, in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced, that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense. With the movements in this hemisphere we are of necessity more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied Powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective Governments. And to the defense of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor, and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those Powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies and dependencies of any European Power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great considerations and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by a European Power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States. In the war between those new governments and Spain, we declared our neutrality at the time of their recognition, and to this we have adhered, and shall continue to adhere, provided no change shall occur, which, in the judgment of the competent authorities of this Government, shall make a corresponding change, on the part of the United States, indispensable to their security.

"The late events in Spain and Portugal show that Europe is still unsettled. Of this important fact no stronger proof can be adduced than that the allied Powers should have thought it proper, on any principle satisfactory to themselves, to have interposed by force in the internal concerns of Spain. To what extent such interposition may be carried, on the same principle, is a question in which all independent Powers whose Governments differ from theirs are interested; even those most remote, and surely none more so than the United States. Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is, not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its Powers; to consider the Government de facto as the legitimate Government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy; meeting, in all instances, the just claims of every Power; submitting to injuries from none. But, in regard to those continents, circumstances are eminently and conspicuously different. It is impossible that the allied Powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can any one believe that our southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition, in any form, with indifference. If we look to the comparative strength and resources of Spain and those new governments, and their distance from each other, it must be obvious that she can never subdue them. It is still the true policy of the United States to leave the parties to themselves, in the hope that other Powers will pursue the same course."

In the subsequent or eighth annual message of the same President, (Mr. Monroe,) he again alluded to the contest between Spain and her colonies; said that the latter had fully achieved their independence, and that said independence had been recognized by the United States. He then adverted to the European Powers; said that it was "the interest of the United States to preserve the 'most friendly relations with them, but that with 'regard to our neighbors, the republics of South 'America, our situation was different. It was 'impossible for the European Governments to in-'terfere in their concerns without affecting us. 'Indeed, the motive which might induce such in-'terference would appear to be equally applicable to 'us;" and he added that "it was gratifying to 'know that some of the Powers with whom we en-'joyed a very friendly intercourse, and to whom 'these views had been communicated, had ap-'peared to acquiesce in them."

In this statement it will be observed that all intervention between the Governments of this hemisphere by the Powers of Europe, for whatever purpose, whether "oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny," is declared to be "the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States." The purpose for which the intervention might be made does not change the dangerous and hostile character of the act; and the reason is obvious, and our late experience gives it additional force. If once they are permitted to interfere, protectorates, and consequent acquisitions and fortifications of strong points, for the effectual protection of such wards, would render the State so protected and occupied, the mere creature and victim of the stronger power, and would lead by a thousand pretexts which everybody but Mr. Fillmore can see at once, to the introduction of the European system into the continent, which is inconsistent with our safety. How dangerous every infraction of this principle is, may be seen by the late overtures for a tripartite treaty, which would have bound us in all time from the acquisition of Cuba, and which has even awakened the Executive. This offer, so promptly rejected, was, however, a corollary, a necessary consequence of the tripartite mediation in Hayti, and the admission in Honduras, and along the Mosquito coast, of the claims of England.

The offer on the part of France and England to make a treaty stipulating for the eternal separation of Cuba from the United States does not equal in insolence either of the two encroachments which we have not only submitted to but invited. To what depth of degradation—to what sacrifice of pride, honor, and power—to what extreme of humiliating subserviency to Europe we would have insensibly gone, I forbear to conjecture. We have gone far enough, however, to prove that the only safety is in the rigid observance of the Monroe doctrine which is contained in one line: Non-interference on the part of European Powers with the independent governments of the New World. That this doctrine should have been enforced with jealous precision against France and England in the Island of Hayti by the United States is made more apparent by the fact that each of these Powers has guarded against interference by the other, and that the United States alone has been indifferent to the progress of either in the island. The joint mediation met the views of both those Powers, as it gave to them a controlling majority in any negotiations which might be entered into. And that there could have existed no adequate motive for accepting or tolerating the joint interference of those Powers is demonstrated by the fact, that that connection with us did not influence Soulouque in any degree, but that the joint mediation was as ludicrously impotent as our sole attempt could by possibility have been.

By the treaty of Ryswick, 1697, Spain ceded to France the western one third of the Island of San Domingo, retaining the eastern two thirds. The black population of the western or French portion of the island in 1790 massacred the whites, and became independent of France. The blacks of the east or Spanish division did not join in this rebellion. In the same year the Spanish part of the island was ceded by Spain to France, and remained in her possession till 1808, when the English aided the Creoles to throw off the control of France, and the territory was confirmed to Spain in 1815 by the treaty of Paris, and was governed as a Spanish province till 1821. In 1822, Dominica, with a view to connect herself with the Colombian republic, revolted from Spain. This purpose was never carried into effect; but Spain was unable to attempt even its subjugation, and has never to this day reasserted her claim. On the contrary, she has openly acknowledged their independence by demanding, in 1830, from Hayti an indemnity for its loss, and also by receiving and treating with the Dominican commissioner in 1847 for the acknowledgment of the republic then established in the east.

In February, 1822, Boyer, the chief of the west or negro part of the island, the now Empire of Hayti, invaded the east with a force which was irresistible by the Dominicans. The provisional authorities were compelled to submit, and the territory was incorporated with the Haytian republic. It is not necessary to my present purpose to recount all the atrocities practiced by Boyer on the Dominicans. It is enough that his administration was so intolerable, not only to the Dominicans, but to the Haytians, that he was driven from power and from the country in the year 1843. Riviere, who overthrew and succeeded Boyer, was more ferocious toward the Dominicans than his predecessor. It is true that Dominica sent her representative to the convention held at Port au Prince, in 1843, to remodel the constitution. In the first business before the convention, the difficulty arose which led to the establishment of a separate republic in Dominica. This was the basis on which the union (if any union was to be between the west and the east) should be established. The Dominican delegates insisted, as a fundamental provision, upon the protection and encouragement of white immigration. It was refused by the Haytian representatives. Upon this the Dominicans declared themselves independent of Hayti, in a manifesto published 16th of January, 1844 In the war which immediately followed, the Dominicans beat the Haytians in several actions, and have maintained themselves in this independence ever since. In November, 1844, the constitution, modeled after our own, was proclaimed.

The two successors of Riviere—Guerrier and Riché—made no serious attempt against Dominica. But Soulouque who succeeded, has exhausted every means in his power to annoy or to reconquer the country, and has publicly declared his intention to exterminate the whites from the island. Shortly after the establishment of the Dominican republic, commissioners were sent to this place to ask its recognition. Had they not a right to ask it? No claim to sovereignty had been advanced by any European Power for more than twenty years. They had, driven by a tyranny unexampled, thrown off the connection, forced in the first place with Hayti, and were in fact and of right independent. The leading ground of difference between them and Hayti, white immigration, should have commanded our sympathies; and the doom of extermination pronounced against them, gave them a right to protection on the grounds of common humanity. On the arrival of these commissioners, Mr. Calhoun was in the Department of State. The large and comprehensive mind of that great statesman, appreciated at once the importance of the interests involved, and he sent out a special agent to examine carefully and report on the affairs of the island. Before the report was made, or at least before it was acted on, Mr. Calhoun retired from the Department of State. Mr. Buchanan, who succeeded Mr. Calhoun, sent another special agent, Lieutenant Porter, who made a long, and I think, an able report, which was never acted upon, owing to the excitement and absorbing interest of the Mexican war, which was just then being commenced, and the events which followed it. This is, however, but an imperfect excuse for a most serious fault.

In 1849, just at the accession of General Taylor, Soulouque made the most formidable attack upon Dominica which it had sustained. He reached within two days' march of Santo Domingo city, and with a force apparently irresistible. The indifference and neglect of the United States had extinguished all hope of interposition on our part, and in despair the Dominicans applied for a French protectorate. This would have been accepted by France at once, and the Bay of Samaná (a point of more importance than Havana, and which, it is rumored, she has at last taken possession of) ceded to her—the island, in fact, would have become her property, but for the interference of the British Minister, who gave notice that Great Britain would not consent to it. The correspondence on this subject, copied from the archives in Santo Domingo, is now in this city, and in possession of the gentleman afterwards sent out by Mr. Clayton as special agent to Dominica. Whether this would have been submitted to or not by the United States, it is impossible to say; but it was by no action on the part of our representative at home or abroad that it was prevented.

After the invasion of Soulouque, which was defeated by the exertions of the Dominicans, though made more formidable by domestic treason and foreign intrigue, Mr. Clayton, then Secretary of State, sent, as had grown to be a habit, a special agent to Dominica. I have had access to the reports and papers of this gentleman, so far as they could with propriety be communicated. Upon his arrival petitions and addresses from all parts of the Republic came to General Santa Anna and the President of the Republic, urging a retraction of the offers to France and opposing the French connection, and advocating annexation to or protection from the United States. An application was made to the agent, and by him forwarded to the Government here, praying for intervention by the United States for the pacification of the country. This application was forwarded by him along with a report, which set forth additional reasons, of the most conclusive character, why it should be favorably considered, and then, if not before, the authorities here should have become fully aware of the intrigues which both France and England (the joint mediators) had kept on foot for the acquisition of some hold in the island, and of the most fatal effect upon our interest. I shall give a short synopsis of the report, and then a short history of the diplomacy of those Powers in Hayti. And I think it must be clear to every mind, that whatever might have been decided as to our own intervention, or the extent and character of it, nothing but criminal carelessness or infatuated and predestinated stupidity could fail to recognize the necessity for excluding France and England from any share in the matter or any the least control over our free action.

The report urges that the duty and interest of the United States was to intervene, for the reasons which I have before given, and which were subsequently assigned as the causes of the joint mediation, and goes on to urge further, that the war was one of extermination and for conquest, and that it involved the very existence of the white race in the island; that the Haytian constitution declared as a first principle "that no white of any nation should place his foot upon the soil with the title of proprietor," and that the Dominicans invited white immigration by grants of land and the privileges of citizenship; that our commerce suffered from the war, and that our citizens were endangered, and our property lawlessly seized by the barbarians of Hayti in the prosecution of the war; that acts of plunder and piracy to the amount of many hundreds of thousands of dollars had been committed against our citizens, as is proven by Mr. Webster's Report, House Doc., 3d Sess. 27th Congress. The report further urged the fact upon our Government, that England and France coveted Samaná, and that the Dominicans would be forced to cede it to one or the other, in consideration of protection which they had vainly sought from us. It was urged that France had never relinquished her designs to recover the island, and that England had always been, and was then, engaged in efforts to acquire the control of the island. The Government was by this report put in the possession of this additional fact—that the Consul General and Minister Plenipotentiary, Sir R. Schomburgh, as soon as he discovered that an application was made for the mediation of the United States, had offered and urged the mediation of England, which was not accepted. The Dominicans did not trust the English Government, but better informed, and consequently more prudent than the United States, feared the known policy of Great Britain on the great question between the races, and did not believe that she would support them in good faith against the double claim of Soulouque to sympathy—both as negro and as emperor. Dominica had been taught by many years of observation, that it was no part of the policy of Great Britain to support a free white republic on the island, but that her designs were to acquire rights for herself in that territory. The mediation of England was, however, pressed by Schomburgh with such earnestness, that the Dominicans dared no longer refuse it peremptorily, and the American agent was consulted by the authorities on the subject. The Dominicans would not, however, agree to it, unless it was distinctly understood that the United States and France were to be joint mediators, and with the further distinct avowal that the call for joint mediation was in the alternative, and should be made only on condition that the United States refused to intervene alone. This report, and these offers on the part of Dominica, were met by General Taylor's administration, so far as to instruct their agent to give notice to Soulouque that this Government would not view with indifference any aggression on Dominica, at least while Soulouque was indebted to the United States. This notice had the effect to suspend for a time an invasion which Soulouque was preparing in 1850.

Mr. Bulwer now gave notice of the readiness of his Government to enter into the joint mediation, and the Administration replied, that upon the return of their special agent, they would give a definitive answer. The reputation of Mr. Clayton is, however, free from the stain of this disgrace. Nothing was, in fact, done by him. General Taylor died while the affair was pending, and Mr. Webster took charge of the Department of State. It is worth remark, and should be borne in mind, that after the departure of this special agent from Santo Domingo, no treaty being concluded for the safety of Dominica, but everything left as it had always been, and still is, open and unsettled, the agents of France, and also of England, endorsed the propositions of Soulouque to that Republic, and endeavored to induce its authorities to submit to his demands. This is conclusive evidence that neither of those Powers were acting in good faith with us, or Dominica, and, taken in connection with the fact that the mediation wholly and shamefully failed of its purpose, and that the threats of the three greatest Powers of the earth did not alarm a barbarian who was unable to have resisted, for one moment, the attack of either of them—and that those threats were not carried out by either against him, when he met fully the very contingency on which they were uttered—it is monstrous—wholly incredible, on any principle of human action, that the majority of them could have been acting in good faith. This Administration, however, replied to Mr. Bulwer, by the appointment of Mr. Walsh; the joint mediation was entered into. Everything which our interest and duty dictated failed, and the two Powers had the triumph of leaving matters open for their future action, with this incalculable advantage gained, an admission by the United States of the right of European Powers to interfere in the affairs of independent Governments in this hemisphere, and a thorough and well-merited contempt felt for us and our arms and diplomacy in those Governments, which should trust us as implicitly as they should profoundly respect us. I shall leave this branch of the subject, with this extract from the official organ of the Dominican government. I take it from the New York Herald, February 26th, which translates from the Gaceta de Gobierno, of January 25th:

"We were surprised," says the Dominican official organ, "when we read, in the message of the President of the United States to Congress, of the settlement of peace between the Dominican republic and that part of the west called the Haytian empire. This false report, communicated to that Government by an unfaithful person, precisely when Soulouque was calling under arms a numerous army at Juana Mendez, in order to invade our territory, is highly alarming, for these falsehoods can affect us in other countries which are friendly to our republic. They wish to divert the attention of other nations from the unrighteous machinations against our independence. For that reason, we positively repeat, that till now the Powers who wished to settle that question, with the desire of avoiding bloodshed in a disastrous war, have not agreed on the affair."

The same spirit which has conducted our negotiations in Hayti has guided our policy in Nicaragua, and to the same or even worse results. The state of things existing at the present moment, produced by the sagacity and courage of this Administration, and the one which immediately preceded, may be stated in a few words. The territorial rights of the republic of Nicaragua are in fact sacrificed by the construction of the treaty made to protect those very rights, and this Administration has become a party to the dismemberment of that republic. The aboriginal tribe of Mosquitos are recognized as having the sovereignty over an indefinite extent of territory which has belonged to Spain since the discovery of the continent, or to the States which have been formed from her colonies. Islands in the Bay of Honduras, which belonged to that republic, have passed, without protest or objection, into the absolute possession of Great Britain, in direct violation of treaty stipulations, and the principle which binds us to the protection from European aggression of all the independent States of this continent. All this has happened, too, in violation of repeated pledges made by this Government. It is not necessary to trace minutely the history of our relations with Central America—political Central America—before the year 1848. In that year, the subject of inter-oceanic communication became of vital and immediate importance; and from that time the series of measures which have terminated in the disgrace of the American name began. Much earlier, however, as early as 1825, the subject was agitated, and correspondence was had between the governments of Central America and the United States on the subject, which is instructive. The Minister of that Government wrote to Henry Clay, then Secretary of State, asking the coöperation of the United States in a treaty for the secure establishment of a transit route, and giving the United States preference over other Powers, on the ground that its "noble conduct had been a model and protection to all the Americas." Instructions were accordingly given to our Chargé d'Affaires to assure the Government of our deep interest in the subject, and to investigate the matter and report upon it. This was not done; but the same efforts were renewed in many instances by Central America, and afterwards by the separate States which had composed it.

I shall pass, however, over all that, and come as hastily as possible to the negotiations which immediately preceded the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, and which are necessary to a full comprehension of the present established policy. In 1847, the republic of Nicaragua, feeling itself endangered by the aggressions of the British, and alarmed at the fatal doctrines asserted by that Government in regard to the rights of the Mosquito kingdom, appealed to the United States for protection, on these grounds:

"The United States is the natural protector of all the republican States of the continent, the center of the hopes of the American cause. Nicaragua, who derived its first impulses from you, and is animated by your example, doubts not that her representations will be received on a subject which threatens her institutions and independence, and affects the interests of all the American republics."

Mr. Buchanan, to whom this letter was addressed, did not reply to it at all; but subsequently, after the same application was repeated, and the English had actually seized the port of San Juan, he sent out Mr. Hise to negotiate. Mr. Hise did not return till after General Taylor was inaugurated, when he came with a treaty, the leading features of which I shall give by extracting its most important provisions.

The instructions of Mr. Buchanan to Mr. Hise assert in bold and true terms the rights of the United States and the motives of England; and for their most lame and impotent conclusion, I confess myself at a loss to account. I give those clauses which contain the substance and meaning of the whole. He says:

"The object of Great Britain in this seizure is evident from the policy which she has uniformly pursued throughout her history, of seizing upon every valuable commercial point in the world, whenever circumstances have placed it in her power. Her purpose, probably, is to obtain the control of the route for a railroad and canal between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans by way of Lake Nicaragua."

He also insists on the policy "of excluding all interference on the part of European governments in the domestic affairs of the American republics." He asserts the wrong of Britain, and denies their claims, but says, in conclusion, that "the Government of the United States has not yet determined what course it will pursue in regard to the encroachments of the British Government." So instructed, Mr. Hise, not perhaps pursuant to instructions, but under the impulse of genuine American feelings, and impressed with the dangerous character of the intrigues of the agents and representatives of Great Britain, particularly at and about San Juan, concluded a convention with Commissioners of Nicaragua, with the following provisions:

1st. That the United States should enjoy the perpetual right of way through the territories of Nicaragua by any means of conveyance then existing, or which thereafter might be devised.

2d. That the United States, or a company chartered by it, might construct a railroad or canal from one ocean to the other, and occupy such lands, and use such natural materials and products of the country as might be necessary for the purpose.

3d. That the United States should have the right to erect such forts on the line or at the extremities of the proposed work as might be deemed necessary or proper for its protection.

4th. That the vessels and citizens of all nations at peace with both contracting Powers might pass freely through the canal.

5th. That a section of land two leagues square at either termination should be set apart to serve as the sites of two free cities under the protection of both Governments, the inhabitants of which should enjoy complete municipal and religious freedom, trial by jury, exemption from all military duty, and from taxation, &c., &c.

In consideration of these privileges the United States were to be bound to defend and protect the territorial rights of Nicaragua, to preserve the peace and neutrality of her coasts, and some other provisions not relevant to the matter in hand. Before Mr. Hise had concluded this convention the Administration which sent him had gone out, and General Taylor was inaugurated. Mr. Hise was recalled, and Mr. Squier sent in his stead, with instructions from Mr. Clayton, which I shall lay before the committee. This treaty of Mr. Hise, which certainly contains matter worth consideration, was suppressed by the Taylor administration, on the ground that it was completed after the date of his letter of recall, and that it exceeded his instructions. The very truth is, it was suppressed because it took the American ground, and would have brought us by possibility in contact with England, which was then asserting new and most extraordinary propositions. We will see what those propositions were, and how they were met by Mr. Clayton, and by his successor. Mr. Manning, Vice Consul at Nicaragua, writes to Lord Palmerston in April, 1849:

"My opinion, if your lordship will allow me to express it, as regards this country, for the present is, that it will be overrun by American adventurers, and consequently bring on her Majesty's Government disagreeable communications with the United States, which possibly might be avoided by an immediate negotiation with Mr. Castellon for a protectorate and transit favorable to British interests. The welfare of my country, and the desire of its obtaining the control of so desirable a spot in the commercial world, and free it from the competition of so adventurous a race as the North Americans, induce me to address your lordship with such freedom."

And Lord Palmerston, in a letter addressed to all the British agents in Central America, asking information as to the boundaries of the Mosquito kingdom, says: "You will also report what in 'your opinion is the line of boundary which her 'Majesty's Government should insist upon as abso-'lutely essential for the security and well-being of 'the Mosquito shore;" and without waiting for a reply, says, in a circular letter to the representatives of his Government, that "the right of the 'King of Mosquito should be maintained as ex-'tending from Cape Honduras down to the mouth 'of the river San Juan." The answer of Chatfield, the English factotum in Central America, improves on Lord Palmerston's exaggerated claim, and says that the Mosquito boundary should pass the river San Juan and reach even to Chagres; because, he says, "looking to the probable desti-'nies of these countries, considerable advantages 'might accrue in after times by reserving the rights 'of Mosquito beyond the river San Juan," and suggests, as Manning had done, an "early assertion" of these claims.

The actual seizure with armed force of the port of San Juan, the only terminus of the inter-oceanic communication on the Atlantic side, under pretext of the right of the Mosquito King, and the knowledge of the schemes and designs revealed by the above extracts, prompted Mr. Hise to make the effort to conclude his proposed treaty. In the fear of England, but under the pretexts of want of authority, the administration of General Taylor would not even submit the convention to the Senate, and withheld it from the Senate on a call for it, as appears from Senate Journal, February 13th, 1850. However, General Taylor did what Mr. Buchanan had so singularly omitted to do. He answered to the applications which the Nicaraguan republic had addressed to this for protection against English encroachment, and says, after a recognition of the correctness of the positions taken by the Nicaraguan government, that "the representations of Nicaragua had been received with lively and painful interest," and that the United States would coöperate to "vindicate her just territorial rights, and secure her peace and prosperity." Assurances to the same purpose were made by Mr. Clayton. How have they been redeemed by him or his successor?

Mr. Squier received instructions from Mr. Clayton, from which may be gathered his intention to make a treaty with Nicaragua, not wholly inconsistent with our interests and the promises we had made. Unfortunately, however, the treaty made pursuant to those instructions was suppressed by Mr. Webster. And more unfortunately still, Mr. Clayton made a treaty with England, which, under the construction given by his successor, surrendered the very rights it was intended to protect, and was fatal to the treaty negotiated by his own agent, under his own instructions. Mr. Clayton says, after a masterly and conclusive argument against the right of the English under the Mosquito King:

"It is manifest, indeed, that the rights claimed by Great Britain nominally in behalf of the Mosquito King, but really as her own, are founded in repeated usurpations, which usurpations were repeatedly and solemnly acknowledged and relinquished by her during the domination of Spain on the American continent. Since that domination has ceased, those claims could have had no other foundation for renewal than the supposed weakness or indifference of the governments invested with the rights of Spain in that quarter."—Instructions of John M. Clayton, Secretary of State, to Mr. Squier, Ex. Doc. 75, 31st Cong., 1st Sess.

And again, giving his own views of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty:

"We have never acknowledged, AND NEVER CAN ACKNOWLEDGE the existence of any claim of sovereignty in the Mosquito King, or any other Indian in America. To do so would be to deny the title of the United States to her own territory. Having always regarded the Indian title as a mere right of occupancy, we can never agree that such a title should ever be treated otherwise than as a thing to be extinguished at the will of the discoverer of the country. Upon the ratification of the treaty, (the Clayton and Bulwer treaty,) Great Britain will no longer have any interest to deny this principle, which she has recognized in every other case in common with us. Her protectorate will be reduced to a shadow, "Stat nominis umbra," for she can neither occupy, fortify, or colonize, nor exercise dominion or control in any part of the Mosquito coast, or Central America. To attempt to do either of these things, after the exchange of ratifications, would inevitably produce a rupture with the United States. By the terms of the treaty neither party can protect to occupy, nor occupy to protect."

Mr. Clayton further instructs Mr. Squier:

"We are willing to enter into treaty stipulations with the government of Nicaragua that both Governments shall protect and defend the proprietors who may succeed in cutting the canal, and opening water communications between the two oceans. All apprehensions may, and will be removed by the solemn pledge of protection given by the United States, and especially when it is known that our object in giving it, is not to acquire for ourselves any exclusive or partial advantage over other nations. Nicaragua will be at liberty to enter into the same treaty stipulations with any other nation that may claim to enjoy the same benefits, and will agree to be bound by the same conditions."

And yet again Mr. Clayton says as to boundaries—and in utter exclusion of the English Mosquito claim:

"Against the aggressions on her territory, Nicaragua has firmly struggled—and protested without ceasing, and the feelings of her people may be judged from the impassioned language of the proclamation of her Supreme Dictator, November 12th, 1848. The moment [says he] has arrived for losing a country with ignominy, or for sacrificing the dearest treasures to preserve it. As regards myself, if the power which menaces sets aside justice, I am firmly resolved to be entombed in the remains of Nicaragua, rather than survive its ruin."

The eloquent appeal of the Minister of Nicaragua to his government, is evidence not less striking than impressive of the disposition of an injured people to resist what they believe to be injustice and oppression. Will other nations interested in a free passage to and from the Pacific ocean by the way of the river San Juan and Lake Nicaragua, tamely allow that interest to be thwarted by such pretensions? Meaning of the Mosquito protectorate of Great Britain! "As it regards the United States, this question may be confidently answered in the negative."

Now, if all this means anything, it means to say that Nicaragua has a right to the line of proposed inter-oceanic communication, including the port of San Juan; and that we will protect this right, if she gives us the right of way—every line. The mere fact of treating with her about the matter, acknowledges her right. The instructions to Mr. Squier, provide that Nicaragua shall only "enter into treaty stipulations with other nations that may claim to enjoy the same benefit, and will agree to be bound by the same conditions."

This very condition of the treaty with Nicaragua, forces England either "to be bound by the same conditions," an acknowledgment of the right of Nicaragua to the port of San Juan, or it cuts her off from the equal enjoyment "of the same benefits" of the transit route. Pursuant to these instructions, Mr. Squier made a treaty with Nicaragua, carrying out their spirit and intention, fully and fairly. I cannot give the treaty in full, but the following clause shows its character:

ART. 36. "It is expressly stipulated that the citizens, vessels, products, and manufactures of all nations, shall be permitted to pass upon the proposed canal, through the territories of Nicaragua, subject to no other, nor higher duties, charges or taxes, than shall be imposed upon those of the United States: Provided always, That such nations shall first enter into the same treaty stipulations and guarantees respecting said canal, as may be entered into between the State of Nicaragua and the United States."

The same provision is made in the treaty of commerce, negotiated at the same time. The right of way was granted by Nicaragua to American citizens; and this treaty, as is obvious, would bring all nations into league against England, if she refused to make the same. Had this treaty been adopted, Nicaragua would have been secured according to her prayer to us, and our solemn pledges to her, against the encroachments of England.

Of course England opposed this treaty in Nicaragua, by every art, which I have not space here to expose. She failed; and as far as Nicaragua was concerned, the treaty was made 23d September, 1849. It was sent home, approved by General Taylor, and submitted to the Senate. It was never acted upon. The death of General Taylor placed our foreign relations in other hands than those of Mr. Clayton, and gave the English Government the power it would probably not otherwise have had, to turn against us those very acts of Mr. Clayton, which, if unwise in the last degree, wanted yet the action of Mr. Fillmore and his Cabinet, to become altogether disgraceful.

Mr. Clayton, pending the negotiations above alluded to with Nicaragua, and no doubt, as he has often declared, for the purpose of concluding forever the British claims, of whatever character, which came in conflict with the rights of Nicaragua, committed the fatal error of treating with England in an affair in which she had no right. He intended, by the very terms of the treaty, to declare that she had no rights. Why, then, in the name of common sense, should he have treated about those rights as if they existed? But here is the article of the treaty on which all the outrageous claims of England are based, and by which, under the construction of this Administration, we are made to yield the whole question originally in dispute, and to stultify ourselves before the world:

"ART. 1. The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same, or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy or fortify, or colonize, or assume, or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords, or may afford, or any alliance which either has, or may have, to or with any State or people, for the purpose of maintaining or erecting any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same; nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or the subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal, which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or the subjects of the other."

Now, no doubt this appeared clear to Mr. Clayton, and no doubt he thought that by no greater sacrifice than the great principle of "non-intervention by the Powers of Europe in the domestic affairs of the independent States of this continent," he had attained his object and avoided any collision with England. On the contrary, England has so construed the treaty as to make it an acknowledgment of all her most extravagant demands. Mr. Bulwer says, in a letter to Mr. Webster, that the agreement was not designed to affect the position of Great Britain as to the Mosquito kingdom—and argues that the mere reference to protection contained in the treaty recognizes the right and the fact, and that England only meant to say that she would not exercise this protectorate so as to interfere with the proposed canal. Under this construction, England now occupies San Juan—now oppresses Nicaragua, and now sustains the very protectorate under which she had perpetrated all the wrongs we have pledged ourselves to redress. In further evidence of the construction put on this treaty by England, and also her mode of dealing with refractory republics, see this letter from the representative of England in Central America to the government of Nicaragua, 15th August, 1850:

"Instead of insisting on its supposed right to the Mosquito shore, Nicaragua would best consult her interest by at once making good terms with England—for resistance in this matter will be of no further avail. It is impossible that Nicaragua should be ignorant of her Britannic Majesty's relation to the Mosquito question, as it has before it the letter of Viscount Palmerston, of the date 15th April last, in which he declares, in the most clear and direct terms, the utter impossibility of acceding to the pretensions of Nicaragua. On the other hand, the treaty of Messrs. Clayton and Bulwer, about which you have so much to say, and in which you express so much confidence, expressly recognizes the Mosquito kingdom, and sets aside the rights which you pretend Nicaragua has on that coast. The true policy is for Nicaragua to undeceive herself in this respect, and to put no further confidence in the protestations and assurances of pretended friends, (viz. Americans.) It will be far better for her to come to an understanding, without delay, with Great Britain, on which nation depends not only the welfare and commerce of the State, but also the probability of accomplishing anything positive concerning inter-oceanic communication through her territories, because it is only in London that the necessary capital for such an enterprise can be found."

I will not now argue the question if this be the true construction; it is or it is not. If it is, we have surrendered the Monroe doctrine wholly; we have violated our pledged word willfully, and we have, by acknowledging the Mosquito king, subverted the very principle on which all territorial right in the New World rests, viz: that the aborigines had only a possessory right, and no sovereignty or eminent domain over any part of it. If it is not the true construction, we are permitting England to violate her treaty obligations with us most injuriously every day, and by this same violation of faith with us, to inflict the deepest wrong on the sister republic which had claimed, and to which we had promised our protection.

This would be our position if no further action had been taken by this Administration after Mr. Clayton left the Department of State. But, sir, I grieve to say that the most intolerable part of the record remains to be completed. And here, sir, I wish to bring a most significant fact before the committee and the country. On the 26th of February, 1851, the following letter was addressed by the Minister of Nicaragua to the Secretary of State, (Mr. Webster.) I give a translation as literal as possible:

WASHINGTON, February 24, 1851.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the republic of Nicaragua, has the honor to address Mr. Daniel Webster, Secretary of State of the American Union, to submit to him a few remarks concerning the interpretation that Great Britain has believed necessary to give to the treaty concluded between this last Power and the Government of the United States, the 19th April, 1850. It is notorious to all that the said treaty has for object to give the most complete security for the execution of the maritime canal through the Isthmus of Nicaragua and to guaranty the neutrality of this important way of inter oceanic communication. Without any doubt to attain this object, and in order to avoid difficulties of any kind to the lawful execution of said treaty, both Governments have thought necessary to insert in the articles, the nomenclature of the States, districts, and localities adjoining the place through which the canal is going to run, among others the coast and the Mosquito country which form and constitute, and that have constituted and formed an essential and integral part always of the republic of Nicaragua.

Hence arose that Great Britain, wishing to take advantage of the same test and the clauses of the treaty, has directed all her agents in Central America, and principally in Nicaragua, new instructions and communications in which expressly is stated that the Government of the American Union recognizes the existence of the pretended Mosquito kingdom, and the usurpation of the port of San Juan, and that, far from debilitating the rights of the savage chief, the treaty confirms them in full.

The undersigned, although fully persuaded of the error of the British Government, cannot help, on this account, to address Mr. Daniel Webster, Secretary of State, with the view of ascertaining if the Government of the Union really intends to recognize the existence of a territory separated, covering, and independent of the republic of Nicaragua, generally known under the name of the coast and Mosquito kingdom, and if the actual Administration which directs the destinies of the American people so wisely and prudently, abounds in the ideas and principles expressed in the dispatch of his honorable antecessor of the 7th of May, 1850, directed to the Chargé d'Affaires of the republic of Nicaragua. The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity, &c., &c.

To which letter no answer has yet been returned. Perhaps this silence, apparently unaccountable, will be made intelligible by considering carefully the projet of a convention signed by the Secretary of State for the United States, and the British Minister, (Mr. Crampton,) and presented to the government of Nicaragua. The projet should be inserted entire, but its length forbids. I give its substance, under all the responsibilities for any misrepresentation:

I. That the entire southern bank of the river San Juan and Lake Nicaragua, including the department of Nicoya, or Guanucaste, on the Pacific, shall be definitely conceded to Costa Rica.

II. That the Mosquito kingdom shall comprise the territory lying between the mouths of the rivers Rama and Segovia, on the eastern coast of Central America, and shall extend inward to the meridian of 83° 30′ west longitude.

III. That the port of San Juan de Nicaragua shall be "ceded" to Nicaragua by his august Majesty, subject to a variety of conditions, amongst which is a recognition of all Mosquito grants, and the surrender, for three years, of all duties collected there, at a rate of ten per cent. annually, to this august potentate.

The Mosquito Indians do reserve to themselves, out of the territory heretofore claimed and occupied, on the eastern coast of Central America, a district of country to be bounded as follows: Beginning on the shore of the Caribbean Sea, at the mouth of the river Rama, which is 11° 34′ north latitude, and 83° 46′ west longitude, running thence due west to the meridian of 84° 30′ west longitude from Greenwich, thence due north on said meridian to the river Segovia, thence down said river to the Caribbean Sea, thence southerly along the shore of said sea to the place of beginning, and all the rest and remainder of the territory and lands lying southerly and westerly of said reservation, heretofore occupied or claimed by the said Mosquitoes, including Greytown, they shall relinquish and cede to the republic of Nicaragua, together with the jurisdiction over the same, in consideration of the net receipts for three years from all duties levied and collected at Greytown, at the rate of ten per cent. ad valorem on all goods imported into the State—the period of three years to commence on the day when Nicaragua shall formally take possession of and enter into the occupancy of said town. The said net receipts to be payable quarterly to such agent as may be appointed to receive them.

Nicaragua is required not to molest or interfere with the Mosquito Indians within the territory reserved to them.

The first thing which strikes one on examining this projet is the recognition of the Mosquito kingdom. This it not only does expressly by setting forth its boundaries, but by stipulating for the cession ("ceded" is the term used) of the port of San Juan on certain oppressive conditions, by the Mosquitoes to Nicaragua. Now, as to this Mosquito kingdom, in the extracts already made from Mr. Clayton's instructions to Mr. Squier, the argument against any title in them is complete. But I will add a few considerations and authorities to the same purpose:

"The Mosquito Indians are sunk in the lowest state of ignorance and barbarism. Their number (including the Woolwas, Ramas, Towkas, and others not recognizing the sovereignty of the Moscos) does not exceed five thousand." —Mr. Hise, United States Chargé d'Affaires, to Mr. Buchanan, February, 1849.

"The Mosquitos are inferior to the Indians of the United States in personal appearance, and infinitely below them in the mental scale. They are squalid and miserable beyond description. From the best of my information the 'nation' does not exceed one thousand or fifteen hundred, and it is not probable that one tenth of those have any idea of a national character. It should be understood that a number of Indian tribes in the interior are claimed by the English to be under Mosquito jurisdiction, but I cannot learn that they admit any such authority. On the contrary, they actually prohibit, under penalty of death, any intermixture with the Mosquitos."—Mr. Squier, United States Chargé d'Affaires, to Mr. Clayton, June, 1849.

"They do not appear to have any idea of a Supreme Being."—Young's Mosquito Shore, p. 72.

"Chastity is not considered a virtue; polygamy is common amongst them."—Ib. p. 73.

"A plurality of mistresses is no disgrace, and it is not uncommon for a British subject to have one or more of these native women at different parts of the coast. They have acquired great influence through them."—Macgregor's Report to British Parliament.

"I have never known a marriage celebrated amongst them. The children are, in general, baptized by the captains of trading vessels from Jamaica, who perform the ceremony with anything but reverence on all who have been born during their absence. Many of them are indebted to them for more than baptism. I could enumerate more than a dozen children of two of these captains. By this licentious and immoral conduct, they have identified themselves with the natives. Their arrival is hailed with joy, as the season of festivity, revelry, christening, and debauchery." —Robert's Mosquito Shore, p. 109.

And the Secretary of State of Nicaragua to Lord Palmerston, says:

"You know, sir, very well, that the established practice for a society which considers itself capable of assuming the rank of a nation, to obtain its recognition as such, is, to solicit through its chief, his ministers, or direct accredited agents, the recognition of established States. But this rule of international law has in no way been complied with by the pretended King of Mosquito, who, it is alleged, now assumes to raise the question of boundary with Nicaragua. This government has not recognized, and will never recognize such a kingdom as 'Mosquito,' much less the territorial pretensions of which you speak. No such king has existed, or now exists. It is preposterous, sir, that a few savages, wandering in the forests and wastes on the coasts of Honduras and Nicaragua, living by the chase and fishing, without houses, without a known language, without written characters, arts, laws, or religion, without any of the elements which, according to received principles, are necessary to a national existence—that such a horde of savages should profess to constitute a regular society, or what is more, a kingdom!"

Chief Justice Marshall says—and the opinion has never been contradicted or questioned—in regard to all Indian title:

"While the different nations of Europe respected the rights of the natives as occupants, they asserted the ultimate dominion to be in themselves."

And again:

"The United States maintain, as all others have maintained, that discovery gave the exclusive right to extinguish the Indian title to occupancy, either by purchase or conquest, and also gave a right to such a degree of sovereignty, as the circumstances of the people would allow them to exercise."

But, sir, not only are the Mosquitos incapable of the rights asserted for them in this treaty, but the republic of Nicaragua has a title to the port of San Juan and the whole of the territory to be "ceded" by this projet as clear and indisputable as the United States to the District of Columbia. In 1502, Columbus sailed from Cape Honduras to the Isthmus of Panama, and took possession in the name of Spain. There are grants made in close and constant succession of different parts of this coast by Spain down to 1786. England had, however, attempted to exercise sovereignty over part of the Mosquito shore in the mean time; but by a treaty of the above date she recognizes the title of Spain, and withdraws her protection from such of her subjects as may "be so daring" as to settle on the territory belonging to Spain. The terms of this treaty are recognized and renewed by the treaty of Madrid, dated August 28th, 1814. The history of the time from 1814 to 1824 exhibits abundant proof of occupancy by Spain of this coast; and when the confederation of Central America declared its independence, England herself recognized it with the boundaries settled in the constitution as reaching from "sea to sea." And on the dissolution of that confederation England also recognized the boundary of the State of Nicaragua, which was declared to run from sea to sea. By two treaties with Spain, one in 1836, the other in 1850, the title of Nicaragua is recognized over the Mosquito coast and "from sea to sea." The port of San Juan, which this projet would make Nicaragua purchase from the Mosquitos, was fortified by Spain as early as 1665, and the defenses renewed in 1727, and her occupation of it uninterrupted till 1824, when the troops of Nicaragua expelled the Spanish garrison. In 1842, and also in 1844, San Juan was blockaded by England as a port of Nicaragua, to recover claims brought against Nicaragua. And England never in any way, till 1847, disputed the title of Nicaragua, at least to this point; and never in any manner asserted the Mosquito title south of Blewfield's Bay before that year, when, as I have before shown, she determined to control the terminus of the inter-oceanic communication, and under this ambulatory Mosquito claim seized with an armed force the port of San Juan, driving out the troops of Nicaragua, and holding it herself, as she still holds it, under the affectation of a Mosquito protectorate.

The projet also contemplates a robbery of Nicaragua in favor of Costa Rica, which is so clearly and concisely exposed in the following extract, that with it I may finish this part of the subject:

"Upon the independence of Central America, the various provinces of the old Captain Generalcy, corresponding to our thirteen colonies, took the rank of independent States, and, as such, subsequently entered into the confederation of Central America. Each State assumed the boundaries which it had possessed as a province. From this arrangement there was no dissent. As provinces, the boundary between Costa Rica and Nicaragua had been repeatedly defined by royal decrees, by the historians of the country, and by the official maps. This was a right line, running from the lower or Colorado mouth of the San Juan river, to the mouth of the Rio Salto de Nicoya, or Alvarado, on the Pacific. All the Spanish maps, from the earliest periods to that of the disruption of the Spanish Empire in America, all lay down this line as a boundary. But upon this point the best evidence is that furnished by Costa Rica herself. In her first constitution, (art. 15, chap. ii,) dated Janurary, 1825, she defines her boundary on the north to be precisely what we have stated, i. e., the mouth of the San Juan on the Atlantic, and that of the Alvarado on the Pacific. Were any further evidence necessary, it is afforded by the map attached to Thompson's Guatemala, which was furnished to the author of that work, officially, by the Government of the republic of Central America, of which Costa Rica formed a part. There was neither misunderstanding nor dispute upon the subject."

"So things remained up to the 9th of December, 1826, when the Federal Congress, from causes in no way connected with any question of territorial right, passed a decree as follows: 'For the present, and until the boundaries of 'the several States shall be fixed in accordance with act 'seven of the constitution, the department of Nicoya (or 'Guanucaste) shall be separated from Nicaragua and attached to Costa Rica.' Although this decree was provisional, Nicaragua did not submit to it without an earnest protest, in which the inhabitants of the district also joined. The Congress, however, never proceeded to define the limits of the respective States, and in 1838, the confederation was dissolved. By the dissolution, the original rights of the States, territorial as well as all others, reverted to them again in their sovereign capacity. The temporary alienation of Nicoya ceased, and it reverted to its true proprietor, whose rights, at the most, had only been suspended. Yet, it is upon this temporary concession of the Federal Congress that any claim of Costa Rica must rest; but no claim thus founded can for a moment receive the sanction of reason.

"Still, admitting it to its full extent, and admitting that Congress not only had the right of separating Nicoya from Nicaragua, and supposing that it had exercised the power with a view to permanency, and that the whole transaction had been concurred in by Nicaragua, yet, even then, Costa Rica could not claim a foot beyond the actual limit of the department of Nicoya, which constitutes less than one third of the vast territory which Mr. Webster proposes to surrender to her! Nicoya is comprised between the southwestern shore of Lake Nicaragua and the Pacific, and embraces no portion of the territory south of Lake Nicaragua, and below the San Juan river, a territory over which Nicaragua has always maintained jurisdiction, where she has had forts for centuries, and which she still occupies. As late as 1846, Costa Rica negotiated with Nicaragua for the privilege of passing through this territory, and in 1848 made overtures for the purchase of it."

This plan for the partition of Nicaragua was presented to her Minister here. He resisted and expostulated, but in vain; it was sent to Nicaragua, and, after being considered by the Government, was replied to by the following decree:

The Director of the State of Nicaragua to its Inhabitants:

Inasmuch as the Legislative Assembly has decreed the following:

The Senate and Chamber of Representatives of the State of Nicaragua, in Assembly convoked—

DECREES:

ART. 1. The State of Nicaragua does not accept the project of convention or recommendatory basis, adjusted on the 30th of April last, between his Excellency Daniel Webster, Secretary of State of the United States, and his Excellency J. F. Crampton, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of her Britannic Majesty, in respect to the territorial boundaries between Costa Rica and Nicaragua, and the separation of the Mosquito coast.

ART. 2. The State of Nicaragua is disposed to have the question started, in connection with the points mentioned, discussed before imperial arbitrators.

ART. 3. The State of Nicaragua protests solemnly against all foreign interference in the affairs of its government, and against the use of force to coerce its will or violate its rights.

Therefore, let it be executed. J. L. PINEDA,
Supreme Director of the Government of Nicaragua.

MANAGUA, July 19, 1852. A true copy:
CASTILLON, Secretary of Foreign Affairs.

The following decree had been passed before (viz: in October, 1849) by the same authority:

"The Legislative Chambers of the Republic of Nicaragua, in view of past events and existing circumstances, in conformity with the settled sentiments of the people which it represents, solemnly declare:

"1. Their adhesion to the principle of the total exclusion of European interference from the domestic and international affairs of the republican American States, as necessary to their peace and independence.

"2. That the extension of monarchical institutions by conquest, colonization, or by a support of savage chiefs to sovereignty, or savage tribes to national existence, or by other means upon the American continent, is in opposition to the interests of the republican American States, dangerous to their peace and safety, and an encroachment upon their individual and collective rights."

And thus the affair was suspended; and nothing but the firmness and decision of the Nicaraguan government has saved us from the deep guilt involved in the projet just discussed. When it was discovered that this plan would be opposed by the Minister of Nicaragua, application was made to his government for his recall; this was refused, as he was a long-tried and trusted representative, and the reasons of the demand were asked for; they were not given, but after the death of the then Secretary of State, as lately as the 30th of December, 1852, only the other day, the present Secretary of State addressed a note to the Minister of Nicaragua, refusing to recognize him in his official character; thus proving the persistence of this Administration in the same policy which had dictated the refusal to answer the inquiry contained in the letter to Mr. Webster, inserted above, and making the present Secretary of State a sort of administrator, de bonis non, of the unexecuted vengeance of his predecessor.

The last point to which I shall ask the attention of the committee, is the seizure by England of the islands of Roatan, Bonacca, &c., &c., in the Bay of Honduras. This has been completed in two acts; on the 10th of August, 1851, the superintendent of the Balize took possession of, and attached these islands as a dependency of the Balize.

In July, 1852, they were regularly organized under the name of the "Colony of the Bay of Islands." That this is a manifest violation of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, in the sense which it bears on its face, does not admit of contradiction. But it is contended by the agents of England, that under the explanations and exceptions and conditions between Mr. Clayton and Mr. Bulwer, that British Honduras was not within the scope of that treaty, or its dependencies. Now, admitting this proposition, it is a fact known to every one that these islands were only held by the English themselves to be dependencies of British Honduras in August, 1851, more than a year after the treaty was concluded; consequently, they could not have been "the dependencies" spoken of in the secret conditions of the treaty. But it is perfectly clear that, under existing treaties, (from which I have already cited paragraphs for other purposes,) in unbroken series from 1763 to 1814, and now governing the relations between England and Spain, and from laws passed by the English Parliament, and now in force, that England had no such right even in the Balize or British Honduras, as is asserted over these islands.

Under these treaties, the Balize itself belongs to the State of Guatemala, and the islands now in dispute as clearly to Honduras. By the seventeenth article of the treaty of peace, of 1763, it was provided that "His Britannic Majesty shall cause 'to be demolished all the fortifications which his 'subjects have erected in the Bay of Honduras, 'and other places of the territory of Spain, in 'that part of the world, within four months."

The English did demolish some of their forts, but retained some of their establishments, which violation of the treaty of 1763 led to another war. This war was concluded by a treaty of peace in 1783, by which the English were allowed the privilege of cutting logwood in the district "lying be-'tween the rivers Hondo and Balize, provided that 'the stipulation shall not be considered as derogating in anywise from the rights of sovereignty 'of the King of Spain." It also provides that all English subjects, "whether on the Spanish continent, or in any of the islands whatever dependent upon it," shall retire within the district above defined. As the conditions of this treaty were violated by the English, another was entered into, in 1786. The first article of this treaty is this:

"His Britannic Majesty's subjects, and the other colonist, who have enjoyed the protection of England, shall evacuate the country of the Mosquitos, as well as the continent in general, and the islands adjacent, without exceptions situated beyond the line hereafter described as what ought to be the frontier of the extent of territory granted by his Catholic Majesty to the English, for the uses specified in the third article of the present convention.

"The English line, beginning from the sea, shall take the center of the river Libun, or Jabou, and continue up to the source of said river; from thence it shall cross in a straight line the intermediate land till it intersects the river Wallace, (Balize,) and by the center of the same river the line shall descend to a point where it will meet the line already settled and marked out by the commissaries of the two Crowns in 1783."

The third article provides that the English may cut certain woods, and "gather such fruits of the earth as are purely natural or uncultivated." And further:

"But it is expressly agreed that this stipulation is never to be used as a pretext for establishing in that country any plantation of sugar, coffee, cocoa, or other like articles, or any fabric or manufacture by means of mills, or other machines whatsoever, (this restriction, however, does not regard the use of saw-mills for cutting or otherwise preparing the wood,) since all the lands in question being indisputably acknowledged to belong to the Crown of Spain, no settlement of that kind, or the population which would follow, could be allowed."

In this settlement of boundaries, it will be observed that no islands are included; but as if to exclude all doubt upon that subject, the fourth article of the same treaty provides that the English shall use for certain purposes the island of Casina, of St. George's Key, but that "no fortifications shall be erected, or troops established there." Article fifth also provides that some small islands, (not, however, those now in dispute,) may be used by the English for the same purposes, and with the same restrictions as St. George's Key. "Spanish sovereignty over the country," and the exclusion of any "system of government, either military or civil," by any other Power, are expressly provided for in article sixth. It is obvious, therefore, that the British claim to the Balize is a mere possessory right guarantied and limited by treaty, and for certain specific purposes, and it is equally obvious that the islands in dispute are not under the treaties, or in any sense dependencies of the Balize.

The limits laid down for the English in the treaty of 1786, were within the territory claimed by and recognized by Spain, as belonging to Guatemala, and that State has the undoubted right, derived direct from Spain, to sovereignty over it. By the same title the islands in dispute belonged to the State of Honduras, and were acknowledged as her territory by Great Britain herself in 1830, when England disavowed in plain terms the act of the superintendent of the Balize in seizing the island of Roatan. The treaty of 1814 refers to and revives the treaty of 1786 with all the boundaries and rights which it contained, and that treaty is the law of the case at the present day. And England has so recognized it to be by acts of Parliament as late as 1819, and now in force, which amends an act passed in 1817, in which these words occur:

"Whereas, grievous murders and manslaughters have been committed at the settlement in the Bay of Honduras, the same being a settlement for certain purposes in the possession, and under the protection of his Majesty, but not within the territory and dominions of his Majesty," &c.

As to the part we should take in any dispute between Guatemala and Great Britain, in regard to the Balize, I have said enough before to indicate my opinion; but upon the much clearer question arising from the seizure of these islands, which were not dependencies of the Balize, but of the State of Honduras, and which were not claimed as dependencies of Balize for a year after the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, and which therefore could not come within the doubtful reservations, secretly made by Messrs. Clayton and Bulwer explanatory, I do not see how Americans can differ. The treaty of 1814 is plainly violated; the Clayton and Bulwer treaty is as openly broken in the clause which provides, "that neither Great Britain nor the United States shall occupy, fortify, or assume, nor exercise dominion over any part of Central America."

We should take such action as would enforce the treaty, let the result be what it may. It would be no war for conquest, but for the maintenance of national honor and good faith. It would result in placing us in our natural position, as the protector of those republics which have been created by the force of our example, and which have a right to look to us for aid in those emergencies in which we are as deeply compromised as they. I believe such a war—even if there should be a war from the assertion of our manifest rights—would terminate with extended territory, augmented power, and increased influence in the world. If, in its results, the ties which would exist between ourselves and the States of Central America, as guardian and ward—if the sympathy of a common republicanism should be drawn yet closer even to a political union—I can see nothing of evil augury in the prospect. Not that I would desire to see war for this or any other purpose, but to avert injury and disgrace; but I believe that such a war, and for such a purpose, is as sound in policy as right in morals.

ACQUISITION OF CUBA.

SPEECH OF HON. V. E. HOWARD,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 6, 1853,

In the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the duty of the United States to take possession of and hold the Island of Cuba.

Mr. HOWARD said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I have risen to address some remarks to the committee in reply to the observations of the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] the other day, touching the course of the Administration in relation to the subject of Cuba. I think he has done great injustice both to the law and to the facts connected with the course of conduct pursued by the Administration, and that he has also done injustice to the American citizens who were the victims of Spanish cruelty connected with this affair. It is manifest that the subject of Cuba is becoming one of great and growing national interest in this country. Its importance to my own State consists in this, that if Cuba was in the hands of an adverse or unfriendly maritime Power of any great strength, it would be impossible for the States bordering on the Gulf of Mexico to get their products to market; our great staples must rot upon the wharves of our southern commercial cities. It is, therefore, a subject to which we must direct our attention and dispose of in some form or other.

Now, sir, in relation to the expedition which was the subject of the gentleman's comments, I agree in one view expressed by him, and that is, that it was the duty of this Government to suppress all illegal private enterprises against Cuba, or any other foreign country. And, sir, it gives me pleasure to be able to say upon this occasion, that the Administration of Mr. Polk did suppress an illegal expedition that was contemplated shortly after our late peace with Mexico, and into which an effort was made to draw our soldiers on their return.

The letter of Mr. Buchanan, the Secretary of State of Mr. Polk, which has been so improperly published by this Administration, shows that that Administration interposed and suppressed a contemplated expedition against Cuba; that it issued directions to the officers of the army, and to all its civil officers who could act on the subject, directing that measures be taken that any such expedition should be suppressed. The measures adopted were efficient, and in this respect, the conduct of Mr. Polk's administration stands out in bold and honorable contrast with the course of his successors, for two such enterprises have since been set on foot, and descents upon Cuba effected in both instances. If the present Administration did not permit this expedition to go out, they were at least guilty of great negligence in relation to the matter, for which they ought to be held responsible to a just public opinion. For, sir, I take it to be an absurdity to say that this Government, with all its power, could not arrest an expedition confined to a single steamer. The use of ordinary diligence and exertion would have prevented that expedition from going out. Gentlemen on the other side cannot, therefore, accuse a Democratic Administration of this country of being negligent in relation to these expeditions against a neighboring Power; and in that respect, the Democratic party of this country stands in a much more favorable light, not only here, but elsewhere. I have no doubt that General Pierce will take efficient means to maintain and enforce the neutrality laws of the country.

While I am upon this subject, I may as well refer to another question. I am in favor of the Monroe doctrine; but I am not inclined to sustain certain resolutions that have been introduced into the other branch of Congress by one of the greatest statesmen of the country, which gives a formal notice to the world, that when any foreign Power attempts to settle or colonize on this continent, we will consider it an unfriendly act, a cause of war. I am not for abstract legislation on any subject. I do not see the propriety, by a joint resolution of Congress, of serving notice upon the whole world, after the manner of Richard Roe and John Doe in an action of ejectment, that whenever a colonization establishment, or any other settlement, shall be made upon this continent by a European Power, it shall be immediately a cause of war. I think that abstract legislation in all instances, is improper. The court which wanders beyond the record in deciding a case, in judicial proceedings, generally has to retrace its steps; and when the legislator attempts abstract legislation in advance of the times, he commits a fault still greater, and more inexcusable. I prefer that each case should be left to its own circumstances. It is the part of wisdom to leave every case to be determined by its own circumstances. They will not only be a law for themselves, but find a means for their own peaceful solution. To attempt to determine this matter by legislation is not compatible with the theory of our Government. In the first instance, it is more properly a question for the diplomacy of the Government; and in the next place, if diplomacy fails, it is a question for the war-making power. To declare this policy by a law, in the shape of a joint resolution, would in a great measure take it out of the hands of our diplomatic agents, and limit the discretion of the President, to whose custody it has hitherto been confided. Sir, it must be apparent to every reflecting man, that the European Powers are much more likely to quietly concede Cuba to us if we do not thus ostentatiously assert such a principle by legislation, than they are to acquiesce in this doctrine so broadly stated as it has been put forth in those resolutions to which I allude. It is rather calculated to irritate than to be of any practical benefit.

But, sir, I do not think that the Senate resolutions state the Monroe doctrine fairly. The Monroe doctrine is, that if colonization upon this continent by European Powers shall endanger our safety, shall conflict with our great national interests or peril our institutions, then it will be a cause of war; but it is not, as these resolutions seem to contemplate, that every settlement upon any sandbank on this continent is an offense, which is to result in war. I am opposed to any declaration, by legislative enactment or by joint resolutions of Congress, which would compel us in honor to go to war if a European Power should happen to take possession of any unimportant or barren spot upon this continent. I am in favor of this doctrine, that whenever a European Power undertakes to make a colonial establishment here which interferes with our great national interests, our national safety, or our institutions, we will then resort to the last argument, if the last argument becomes necessary to free ourselves of the difficulty; but I do not go beyond that. I am in favor of a practical enforcement of the doctrine when any necessary case shall arise.

But, sir, I am opposed to these resolutions for another reason. They are inadequate to the subject. They go upon the ground that we will not permit any foreign country to establish any settlement here; but at the same time that we permit present establishments to remain as they are, that we will never acquire Cuba without the consent of Spain. Now, I am at a loss to understand on what the Monroe doctrine, taking that view of the subject, is held to be based. If it has any sound basis, it must rest on a question of safety—that these colonial establishments interfere with our commerce and institutions, and endanger the stability of our Government. Well, if any existing establishment upon this continent interferes in the same way, and is pregnant with the same dangers, is there not as much reason that an existing establishment shall cease as there is that a new establishment or colony shall not be created? The one principle is precisely as broad as the other, and controlled by the same reasons. Sir, it is not a sound principle of international law which is attempted to be asserted by the Senate resolves. The whole doctrine rests, and can be based upon nothing else than that we have a right, under the international code, to take all those precautionary measures which the safety of the nation requires. Therefore, sir, for one, while Cuba remains in its present position—while it remains quietly under the power of Spain—while its present domestic relations are continued and its internal policy does not endanger our safety—I see no necessity for our attempting any design upon it.

But, on the contrary, if the projects of England should ever take a definite form, which have continued from 1820 to the present time—if there should be danger that any great maritime power will take possession of Cuba, and thereby disturb our safety, by locking up the commerce of the Gulf, including as it does that of the valley of the Mississippi and eight or ten States, then, under the international code as laid down by Vattel, Wheaton, and others, and as the principle has been stated by Chancellor Kent, we would be justified in taking possession of Cuba, although we might in justice and fairness be afterwards compelled to make a fair compensation for it to Spain, if the necessity for such a measure was created without any fault on her part, and if her conduct towards us had been fair and just.

Chancellor Kent thus states the rule on this subject:

"Every nation has an undoubted right to provide for its own safety, and to take due precaution against distant as well as impending danger. The right of self-preservation is paramount to all other considerations. A rational fear of an imminent danger is said to be a justifiable cause of war."—Kent, Vattel, b. 2, c. 4, section 49, 50.

I can well conceive that that necessity will probably arise. If any one of the great European Powers were to attempt to possess themselves of the Island, or if they were to attempt, what has been threatened, to change the institutions of the Island so as to make it a second St. Domingo, with a view of striking a blow at slavery in the United States, and thereby endanger the peace and security of the slave States upon the Gulf, then it would be the duty of this Government to interfere, and take possession of the Island and hold it as an American State or an American province.

The southern States on the Gulf would never permit Spain, as a matter of revenge in the case of a revolution by the Creoles, to abolish slavery in that Island, with a view to the destruction of the planters. They cannot permit such an example to be successful so near their shores. The instinct of self-preservation is too strong. This measure was threatened during the invasion of Lopez; it never can succeed so long as slavery exists in the United States; and any attempt of that sort, either by Spain or any other Power, will be followed by an immediate seizure of the Island, either by this Government or by the slave States on the Gulf of Mexico. There is no principle of international law that would require a great Government like the United States to permit itself to be thus assailed through a small colonial dependency of another and distant Power. England has been very prompt to protect herself from like dangers by at once taking possession of the point of danger. If Cuba had been as near her possessions as ours, she would have seized it long since on half the provocation.

On what principle do the British hold Gibraltar, Malta, and several other strong positions, which give them control over the commerce of the world? Why, they have assumed them as being necessary to the protection of their own commerce. Upon this question of necessity, the policy of the Government is well settled, if Cuba should ever pass from the dominion of Spain to that of any other Power. The danger to be apprehended to this country and its institutions from the acquisition of Cuba by any other Power, as well as the intrigues of England in relation to the subject, have been pointed out and made the subject of comment by nearly every Administration for more than thirty years. These dangers were suggested by Mr. Adams while Secretary of State in 1822, in his official dispatches to our Minister to Madrid. In his dispatch to Mr. Forsyth, he says:

"The present condition of the Island of Cuba has excited much attention, and has become of deep interest to this Union. From the public dispatch and other papers which you will receive with this, you will perceive the great and continued injuries which our commerce is suffering from pirates issuing from thence, the repeated demands made upon the authorities of the Island for their suppression, and the exertions, but partially effectual, of our own naval force against them." * * * "From various sources intimations have been received here, that the British Government have it in contemplation to obtain possession of the Island." * * * "There is reason also to believe that the future political condition of the Island is a subject of much anxiety and of informal deliberations among its own inhabitants; that both France and Great Britain have political agents there, observing the course of events, and perhaps endeavoring to give them different directions."

In his dispatch of April, 1823, Mr. Adams again comments upon the designs of England, with reference to the Island; upon the impossibility of its inhabitants maintaining an independent government, alleging, that "their only alternative of dependence must be upon Great Britain or upon the United States." In commenting upon the necessity of Cuba to the United States, he says:

"Such, indeed, are, between the interests of that Island and of this country, the geographical, commercial, moral, and political relations, formed by nature, gathering in process of time, and even now verging to maturity, that, in looking forward to the probable course of events, for the short space of half a century, it is scarcely possible to resist the conviction that the annexation of Cuba to our Federal Republic will be indispensable to the continuance and integrity of the Union itself."

After Mr. Adams was elevated to the Presidency, he maintained his policy in relation to Cuba, which was substantially repeated to our Minister to Spain in 1825, by his Secretary of State, Mr. Clay. In 1827, our Minister to Spain, Mr. A. H. Everett, gave information to the Government of an effort of England to revolutionize Cuba, based upon a dispatch of the Spanish Minister at London. The Spanish Minister admitted to Mr. Everett, that his Government had received information of the efforts of England. Mr. Everett says in his dispatch of December 12th, 1827:

"I then mentioned to Mr. Salmon that, according to the information which the Government of the United States had received, the object of the plan was to place the Island under the protection of Great Britain; but that the form of a declaration of independence was to be adopted, in order to avoid awakening the jealousy of the United States; that the United States would not, of course, be deceived by this artifice; that they could not view with indifference these movements of the British Government, considering it, as they did, as a settled principle, that the Island must in no event pass into the possession of, or under the protection of any European Power other than Spain."

Mr. Van Buren, as Secretary of State, in 1829, in his dispatch to our Minister to Spain, alluded to the designs of England and France with reference to Cuba and Porto Rico. With reference to the importance of the former to the United States, he said:

"The Government of the United States has always looked with the deepest interest upon the fate of those Islands, but particularly Cuba. Its geographical position, which places it almost in sight of our southern shores, and, as it were, gives it the command of the Gulf of Mexico and the West India seas, its safe and capacious harbors, its rich productions, the exchange of which, for our surplus agricultural products and manufactures, constitutes one of the most extensive and valuable branches of our foreign trade, render it of the utmost importance to the United States, that no change should take place in its condition which might injuriously affect our political and commercial standing in that quarter. Other considerations, connected with a certain class of our population, make it the interest of the southern section of the Union that no attempt should be made in that Island to throw off the yoke of Spanish dependence, the first effect of which would be the sudden emancipation of a numerous slave population, the result of which could not but be very sensibly felt upon the adjacent shores of the United States."

Mr. Forsyth, as Secretary of State, in his dispatch in 1840, repeated the views of his predecessors, and warned our Minister to be on the look-out against the designs of England on Cuba, of which the Government had been advised. Mr. Webster, in his dispatch as Secretary of State, to our Minister to Spain, says:

"The archives of your legation will show you that the subject of the supposed designs upon the Island of Cuba by the British Government is by no means new, and you will also find that the apprehension of such a project has not been unattended to by the Spanish Government."

In January, 1843, Mr. Webster communicated to our Consul at Cuba, the contents of a communication which he had received from a "highly respectable source," as to renewed designs of England upon Cuba. The writer makes statements about the designs of the British Ministry and British abolitionists, to bring about a revolution in Cuba, and erect it into a "black military republic, under British protection." He remarks, says Mr. Webster, "if this scheme should succeed, the influence of Britain in this quarter, it is remarked, will be unlimited. With six millions of blacks in Cuba, and eight hundred thousand in her West India islands, she will, it is said, strike a death blow at slavery in the United States. Intrenched at Havana and San Antonio, posts as impregnable as Gibraltar, she will be able to close the two entrances to the Gulf of Mexico, and even prevent the free passage of the commerce of the United States over the Bahama Banks, and through the Florida channel." And although Mr. Webster says the Government neither indorses nor rejects these views, they are so stated by him as to show that they made a deep impression on his own mind.

It is apparent from all this correspondence, that it is the settled policy of the Government that Cuba is not to pass from Spain without coming under our own jurisdiction, and that the Island is not in a position to permit it to be an independent government without making it dangerous to our commerce, institutions, and national safety. Since this correspondence, our immense Pacific commerce has arisen, which passes within sight of Cuba.

A very accomplished officer of the Navy, Lieutenant Dalghren, in his report on the subject of fortifications, has expressed an opinion, which is obviously true, that, with all the fortifications we can place on our coast, we cannot protect our commerce in the Gulf of Mexico, with Cuba in the possession of a hostile Government. Indeed, Cuba is far more necessary to us, than Gibraltar or Malta is to England.

Mr. Dalghren says:

"The true and only key, however, to the defense of these shores and to the immense interest there collected, is the Havana. The island to which it belongs enters its western extreme into the Gulf, leaving but two passages for vessels, so narrow as to be commanded with the greatest facility; these are the great thoroughfares of trade, and the mail steamers from New Orleans to California and New York. Hence if the use of the Havana be even at the disposal of an enemy while in the hands of a neutral Power, each and all of these interests could be with difficulty defended, even by a superior naval force, and never guarantied against severe losses. While from it, as a United States port, a squadron of moderate size would cover the southeast and Gulf coasts, protect the foreign and inshore traders, and secure the lines from New Orleans or New York to the Pacific States by way of the Isthmus—its occupation would necessarily be the object of every expedition, military or naval, preliminary to any attempt on the southern trade or territory."

The rule of international law for which I am contending, is thus stated by Mr. Wheaton:

"Of the absolute international rights of States, one of the most essential and important, and that which lies at the foundation of all the rest, is the right of self-preservation. It is not only a right with respect to other States, but a duty with respect to its own members, and the most solemn and important which the State owes to them. This right necessarily involves all other incidental rights which are essential as means to give effect to the principal end."

The European Powers are estopped from denying the application of this doctrine in its fullest extent, by having repeatedly acted upon it. By the treaty of Utrecht the French Government was compelled to demolish the fortifications at Dunkirk, because dangerous to others. By the treaty of Paris of 1815, France was compelled to demolish the fortifications of Huningen, and agree never to renew them, because dangerous to Basle. The doctrine of self-defense and self-preservation was the alleged justification of the combination of the Protestant Powers against Louis XIV., and for all the coalitions formed by the allied Powers against France, and more recently for the Congress of Troppau and Laybach, in relation to the Neapolitan revolution in 1820; for the Congress of Verona in relation to the affairs of Spain, and one of the grounds for British interference in the affairs of Portugal in 1826; for the interference of the Christian Powers in favor of Greece, principally on the ground that the contest encouraged piracies, and interfered with commerce; for the interference of Austria, Great Britain, and Russia, in the affairs of the Ottoman Empire in 1840. I do not mention these instances with approbation, but to show the existence of the right in a proper case, and that neither England, France, nor Spain, can complain of its exercise. England has seized possession after possession in India, on the ground that each instance was necessary to the preservation of her other possessions in that country.

The right of a government to take all necessary measures for its safety and self-defense consistent with reason and justice to other Powers, is stated more strongly by European writers than by our own. Vattel asserts that "since, then, every nation is obliged to preserve itself, it has a right to everything necessary to its preservation." * * * "A nation or State has a right to everything that can help to ward off imminent danger, and keep at a distance whatever is capable of causing its ruin; and that from the very same reasons that establish its rights to the things necessary to its preservation."

Cuba is even now in a transition state. It cannot continue long in its present condition. Revolts will continually occur there, for the seeds of liberty have been sown in that devoted Island. The people will be restive under the onerous and oppressive exactions of Spain. With the present commercial policy of that country, the revenues collected from the Island will not pay the army and navy necessary to keep the people in subjection. It is not, therefore, in my opinion, possible for the Island to long remain a dependency of Spain, and we can never with safety permit it to pass out of her dominion without becoming a portion of the United States. Cuba requires our utmost vigilance. The effort of England and France to induce us into a treaty in relation to the Island; the fact that those Powers combined to place fleets there under pretense of guarding its coast; the fact that England has assumed to erect a colony on the islands off the coast of Central America, and has now a considerable fleet in the Gulf and off the coast of Cuba, under the pretense of arresting the slave trade, all demand our vigilance, and preparation for any emergency. There is no doubt that, since the discovery of gold in Australia, England has, with increased interest, turned her attention to the Gulf of Mexico and the Isthmus, as a line of communication with her Asiatic possessions. We have been made to feel her power and weight in Mexico, in connection with the Tehuantepec route.

I dissent altogether from the position of the President that it would be inexpedient for us to acquire Cuba, if Spain consents to our acquiring it by treaty or purchase. I hold that it is our highest national interest to become the possessor of that Island as soon as we can by cession from Spain. I cannot see the danger of sectional agitation from its acquisition which is anticipated by the President. There are ten men in the United States now in favor of acquiring Cuba, where there was one in favor of the annexation of Texas at the time of the Tyler treaty. The commercial class of the North generally are in favor of the measure as soon as it can be honorably accomplished. It is obvious that the northern States would be largely benefited by it in a commercial point of view. It is, in my opinion, a great mistake to suppose the acquisition of Cuba would give rise to any fresh agitation of the slavery question. If the Island were in our possession, we should effectually suppress the slave trade, and to that extent, its transfer to us would not only diminish slavery, but arrest a traffic which results in an annual loss of the lives of colored persons, nearly, if not quite equal in number, to those reduced into slavery by the trade. If Cuba were converted into a black republic, it would soon become a mere harbor for pirates, and the northern States would be the first to cry for the acquisition of the country. There is no danger that the North would risk the consequences of rejecting Cuba. They have too much interest in the preservation of the Union; far more than the South. Their whole commercial and manufacturing prosperity rests upon it. We have passed that crisis for the present century.

Neither is there any danger from the character of the population in Cuba. With the aid of the thousands which would flock there from every portion of the United States, they would have no difficulty in working our system. The admission of a free press, and the Protestant religion, would work wonders in the Island in a short time.

I will proceed now to the course of the Administration, which was the subject of the remarks of the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] the other day, touching the treatment which the prisoners taken in the Lopez expedition received by the Spanish authorities of the Island.

I repeat, that I am not a defender of the Lopez expedition, nor of any similar adventurers. But there are many things to be said in extenuation of that unfortunate occurrence. Cuba is, no doubt, oppressed by one of the worst governments on earth. It is more arbitrary than that of the Czar, and less humane because it is governed by officers from Old Spain, whose object is to amass wealth by oppressing the people by burdensome and onerous exactions. General Lopez, an ardent lover of liberty, was inspired with the ambition of freeing his country from this intolerable despotism. He pursued his high purpose with an energy, perseverance and courage, worthy of a better fate. He missed the fame and renown of one of the liberators of the age, only because his efforts were unfortunate. While the leader of a revolution is canonized by success, the unfortunate conspirator is covered with obloquy, and his name shrouded in disgrace. Narciso Lopez perished ignominiously by the garote, but his blood watered a soil that will yet bear the fruits of liberty, and a monument to his memory will hereafter be erected over the spot where he fell, by the hands of freemen. Every revolution generally has a victim before success.

It has been the policy of the authorities of Cuba to represent that the Creoles of the Island did not sympathize with the movement of Lopez. But the reverse is well known; an extensive revolt was at one time planned and organized. That is proved by the multitude of arrests and banishments, by the fact that all the prisons in the Island were crowded to overflowing. After the failure of the first expedition this organization was, to a great extent, broken up. A reorganization took place just before the second expedition of Lopez, and at one place, at least, a declaration of independence was promulged. There is no doubt that the extent of this movement was greatly exaggerated, and that the revolt was by no means as extensive as a sanguine man like Lopez was easily led to suppose. He was also made the victim of a stratagem by the government of Cuba. It is now known that he received letters written at the instance of the government assuring him he had only to show himself with a few followers, and that the population would flock en masse to his standard. It was this impression, no doubt, that caused him to set out with so small an expedition. Had he landed with two thousand men and a few pieces of artillery, there is no doubt that the enterprise would have been entirely successful. But when the Creoles saw that he had made a descent with only four hundred men landing in the vicinity of Havana, they perceived at once that all was lost, and abandoned a movement which they believed could not maintain itself against the Spanish forces on the Island.

There is no question that Lopez and his men believed they were going in aid of an extensive revolt, and a well organized revolution. The expedition was not undertaken in the spirit of aggression and plunder, but with a sincere desire to aid the cause of liberty. The expedition succeeded in getting out of our ports and failed, and the Americans embarked in it having been taken prisoners, I maintain were entitled to the trial secured to American citizens by the treaty of 1795, with Spain. Now I ask if they received that trial in any aspect of the case? It will be seen, by the official correspondence, and also by the report of Commodore Parker, based upon conversations held with the Captain General of Cuba, as well as from the other correspondence which took place, and which may be found among our official documents, that the authorities of Cuba place the right they had to punish these men by trying them by the tribunals which did try them, and by denying them counsel as they did, entirely upon the ground that they were pirates. Now, I undertake to say, that no respectably adjudicated case can be found which will sustain the position that these men were pirates. What is a pirate? A pirate, according to the definitions of the writers on international law, is a robber upon the high seas. Such also is the definition of the Spanish law writers.

Piracy, says Chancellor Kent, is robbery, or a forcible depredation, on the high seas, without lawful authority, and done animo furandi, and in the spirit and intention of universal hostility. The Supreme Court of the United States has also defined the crime to be robbery upon the high seas; which is the universal definition of the writers on international law in modern Europe, including those of Spain. The offense of the Lopez men was not upon the high seas, nor done animo furandi, and no other piracy is known to the law of nations. Neither was it piracy within the definition of the offense given by the acts of Congress.

Now, sir, you know the principles of international law are founded upon usage, upon treaty, and upon custom, and require the usage of more than one nation to ingraft upon them a single principle. That is a well-received doctrine, which has been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States in passing upon one of the acts of Congress which assumed to add to the international code. The same principle has been recognized by the leading Powers of Europe with reference to the slave trade, which cannot be held piracy apart from treaties. Spain could not make these men pirates by its own declaration; if they were not pirates under the laws of nations, they could not be punished as pirates. I am aware that there are some elementary writers who have said that in unlawful expeditions like this, where the men are taken prisoners, they are to be treated as pirates and robbers, not entitled to the laws of war. But this is to be taken with qualifications; for the proposition as applied to these prisoners, is not supported by a single English or American adjudication. When they commit robbery, they should be punished as robbers; when they commit piracy, they should be treated as pirates; and when they commit murder, they should be punished as murderers.

Such was the language of Mr. Clayton, under the administration of General Taylor. He did not admit that the Contoy prisoners were pirates. On the contrary, he asserted, in relation to all of them, and especially the Contoy prisoners, that they had not committed the offense of piracy, and could not be punished as pirates, remarking that murder and robbery were grave offenses, but not piracy. When the State of New York arrested McLeod for his expedition into that State, and the destruction of the Caroline, he was not tried for piracy, but, as homicide had been committed, he was tried for murder, and given a regular trial in all the forms of law. It is true, that Judge Cowan, in passing upon the case, cited those authorities which allege that persons engaged in these expeditions might be treated as robbers and pirates. These citations were not long since published in one of the papers in this city; but the learned New York Judge did not rely on them as authority in point. And when examined, it will be found that all they intend to assert is, that if the offender commits robbery, he may be punished as a robber; and if piracy, as a pirate. He is not entitled to the benefit of the laws of war, a position which will readily be conceded. I do not say that the Spanish officers were bound to admit these men to quarter, if they had been taken in conflict with arms in their hands; but having given quarter, having received them as prisoners, they were entitled to the rights of American citizens. The fifty men under Crittenden, who were taken and shot, had not arms in their hands when they were captured. They were endeavoring to make their escape from the Island in two boats, as I have been informed by good authority. The men were in one boat, and the arms in another, which probably accounts for their surrender. As American citizens, then, guilty, not of piracy, but of an offense against the neutrality laws of this country, and at most a conspiracy against Spain, they were ntitled to a trial. I concede that, as foreigners, they might commit treason against Spain, although that has been denied; but I think the affirmative of the proposition the better opinion. Still, they were American citizens, entitled to the benefit of the treaty of 1795 with Spain, which declares:

"And in all cases of seizure, detention, or arrest for debts contracted, or offenses committed by any citizen or subject of the one party within the jurisdiction of the other, the same shall be made and prosecuted ('por orden y autoridad de la justicia,') by order and authority of law only, and according to the regular course of proceedings usual in such cases."

It will be seen that the language of the treaty is very broad, and applies to any citizen or subject who has incurred seizure or detention for "offenses committed." It is clear these American citizens were seized and detained within the meaning of the treaty. How, then, were they to be prosecuted? "By authority of law only, and according to the regular course of proceedings usual in such cases." Such language in a statute in England or this country, would be held to guaranty to the accused a trial according "to the law of the land," which, since the days of Lord Coke, has been held to mean a trial by the course of the common law, by presentment or indictment, and a jury. In Spain they have no juries, but the language of the treaty evidently contemplates a trial in the regular course of proceedings according to the civil laws of Spain. Their lawyers and books draw a wide distinction between the proceedings of what they term the ordinary and extraordinary tribunals. Civil courts are held by them to be ordinary tribunals, military and ecclesiastical courts are extraordinary tribunals, and not the regular course of proceeding, under their law, any more than a court-martial is our regular course of proceeding. This is still more apparent by reference to the Spanish side of the treaty, which our Supreme Court held in the case of Clarke, to be the true exponent of the provision of another treaty with Spain, when it alluded to Spanish law and proceedings, and even corrected a construction which the court had previously given to the English article in the treaty.

The Spanish side declares that American citizens shall be arrested and prosecuted "por orden y autoridad de la justicia." Justicia is ordinarily rendered justice; but in this instance, and generally when used with reference to judicial proceedings, is more properly translated judicature. The word in Spanish is of a much more technical meaning than law, which is used as the English equivalent in the treaty. The Spanish authors, when they use the word with reference to the administration of justice, apply it to the course of proceedings in the civil tribunals. And such is evidently its sense in this treaty. That such was the intention of the treaty, is apparent from the dispatch of Mr. Pinkney, a profound lawyer, who negotiated it, and who said it was a proper provision in treaties with all such countries as Spain. It is evident that he supposed he had secured to his countrymen in Spain, a regular trial in the civil courts in all cases. The object of this provision of the treaty was to rescue the citizens of the United States from these extraordinary and arbitrary tribunals; from these military and ecclesiastical courts, which had been the disgrace of the age, and the scandal of christendom. At all events, it was the duty of the Administration to contend for a reasonable construction of the treaty, which secured a fair trial to American citizens.

The construction put upon the treaty by the gentleman from New York cannot be sustained. His construction is, that these citizens of the United States were tried and punished in the same manner as Spanish subjects, and therefore they and their friends had no right to complain. Why, sir, it was to avoid that very thing that the treaty was made. It was to avoid the necessity of the citizens of the United States being subjected to these infamous military and ecclesiastical tribunals that this clause in the treaty was inserted; and the construction that is now attempted to be put upon it, would destroy the whole force and virtue of the guarantees of the treaty.

Again, the trial by a summary court-martial, was a violation of the treaty; because Spanish subjects could not, under the laws of Spain, be tried for treason in those cases where the arrest was made by military authority; they may be tried by the ordinary council of war, which is a permanent tribunal, but not by a summary court-martial. The trial was not therefore the regular proceeding in such cases even for Spanish subjects, and in this respect was a violation of the treaty,—a point I shall present more fully in connection with the case of Mr. Thrasher.

Sir, the Spanish authorities attempted to evade the force of this treaty, as I have said, by declaring that these men were pirates, who were not pirates according to international law. It was only by holding that they were citizens of no country, but the common enemies of mankind, that Spain could shield herself from the charge of having violated the provisions of the treaty of 1795. If you will look at the report of Commander Parker, who was sent to Cuba by the President to investigate this affair, you will find that the Captain General places his justification upon that ground almost exclusively in his first interview with Commander Parker; and you will see furthermore, by looking at the report, that the Captain General did not pretend that they had a regular or legal trial—not even that they had a regular trial before a military commission. He admitted that the trial was summary. Commander Parker thus reports his interview with the Captain General:

"He stated that he considered them as pirates, and that they had been so denounced in the proclamation of the President of the United States. That they were tried in a summary manner, and full proof made of their guilt, and that of their participation in the invasion of the Island by Lopez. He did not consider himself at liberty to furnish me with the proceedings on the trial, but would send them to his own Government, and to the Spanish Minister at Washington, who would do whatever was right in the matter, on the call of the Government of the United States."

Where is this, no doubt, ex post facto record? Why, sir, I marvel that any gentleman in this House should call it a trial. Those men were arrested one day and shot the next. Fifty men were brought to Havana one day and executed the next. This shows the impossibility of there being anything like a trial, with a fair opportunity to contest the proceedings. But we know in what the trial consisted, from the statements of respectable Americans in Cuba at the time. Several officers went into the room where these men were confined and took their voluntary statements. They admitted that they had been in the Lopez expedition; and upon that admission the order was issued by the officers that they should be shot. Is that a trial? Is that the trial contemplated by the treaty? If it is, it is in vain to stipulate with a foreign Power that our citizens shall be tried according to the laws of the land, with an opportunity to establish their innocence. We know that these men were not allowed to contest the jurisdiction of the pretended court; we know that they were not allowed counsel; we know that they were not permitted to have evidence, and we know that the whole thing was done in hot haste and in the spirit of revenge. Our Consul, Mr. Owen, came into town after they were condemned, interposed in their behalf, asked for a postponement, and for the release of some, if not all. The Captain General refused to permit him to intercede for the prisoners, and told him he must know that he was doing so against the wishes of his Government. The officers of Cuba hurried their victims to slaughter; and if the letters from Havana can be credited, their bodies after execution were brutally desecrated by the mob.

I think it, therefore, impossible to maintain that these men were tried by the regular tribunal secured to them by the treaty. But even admitting that it was regular to try them by a summary court-martial or any military tribunal, still I insist the treaty was violated; still I say that they did not have the benefits of the provisions guarantied to them by the treaty in relation to trials. It contemplates a trial which is not a mockery. It contemplates a trial which allows the party his witnesses. It contemplates a trial which allows him counsel. It contemplates a trial which gives him a hearing and not a judicial butchery.

Now, sir, it was asserted by the Spanish authorities—and it has also been asserted by this Administration—that if these men received such a sort of trial as Spanish subjects receive, then the stipulations of the treaty were complied with and secured to the criminals.

Sir, the treaty is not admissible of such a construction. The very reverse is the object of the treaty, and the bare reading of its words is sufficient evidence of the correctness of that position. The treaty declares:

"The citizens and subjects of both parties shall be allowed to employ such advocates, solicitors, notaries, agents, and factors as they may judge proper, in all their affairs, and in all their trials at law, in which they may be concerned, before the tribunals of the other party; and such agent shall have free access to be present at the proceedings in such causes, and the taking of all examinations and evidence which may be exhibited in the said trials."

If we admit that the court which tried Crittenden's men, being a military tribunal, had jurisdiction of the case, still, I say, the treaty was violated in the trial. Because they were never regularly arraigned; because they were not allowed to plead to the jurisdiction; because they were not permitted counsel; and because they were not allowed the regular examination of witnesses in their behalf, according to all the accounts which have reached us. The treaty is a distinct substantive provision, as to the employment of counsel. It secures the right to American citizens to have counsel of their own choice "in all their affairs, and in all their trials at law." It relates to all trials before all the tribunals, whether civil or criminal, whether military or ordinary. It is therefore perfectly obvious that it never was the intention of Mr. Pinkney and the Spanish Minister, when they negotiated that treaty, to put it in the power of Spain, by transferring criminals to military tribunals, to deprive them of the right of counsel, the right of witnesses, the right of being present when the evidence was taken by which they were to be convicted. It is, therefore, in my estimation, preposterous to assume that American citizens, tried even before the military tribunals of Spain, can be deprived of counsel and witnesses merely because Spanish subjects are deprived of them.

Why, sir, I need not say to any lawyer in this House, that, whatever may be the general law of Spain, a particular provision for the benefit of American citizens made by treaty, is the law of the case, and that it is the duty of the Spanish tribunals to administer it as the law of the case.

I admit, that without such a provision, our citizens must be judged as the citizens of Spain are judged who have committed offenses within their jurisdiction. Suppose the Spanish Government passes an edict that when any one is believed to have committed felony, any officer of the army may order him to be shot without trial and without a hearing, does that abrogate our treaty with Spain? If the Cortes should pass a law declaring that no Spanish subject should have an advocate, agent, or counsel, on any trial before a Spanish tribunal, would it destroy, or in any way affect our treaty provision for the security of American citizens?

Sir, the Cuban authorities did not take any such position as to Crittenden and the other followers of Lopez, whom they executed. That was left to the ingenuity of the present Administration and its defenders. They knew that these men had not enjoyed even the benefit of the laws of Spain for the trial of its subjects who were guilty of treason. They were not even tried before the council of war, nor did they have the benefit of the rules of proceeding which prevail in that military tribunal. The Cuban authorities assumed that these men were pirates, and that whatever violence was done them, they were not citizens of any country, and therefore this Government could not complain. Now, sir, although the President did not formally denounce these men as guilty of piracy, although the administration of General Taylor stands committed upon the record of denying that the offense was piracy, yet in his proclamation Mr. Fillmore declared that "such expeditions can only be regarded as adventures for plunder and robbery." Certainly such was not the object of the leaders of that expedition, and to say so was to do gross injustice to their motives and characters. He then proceeds to inform them that they "will forfeit their claim to the protection of this Government, or any interference on their behalf, no matter to what extremities they may be reduced in consequence of their illegal conduct." In the first place this proclamation, by assuming the guilt of all parties in the expedition, anticipated the work of Concha's court-martial. It incited the Spanish authorities to pursue the very course they adopted.

If, sir, there was a provision in the treaty with Spain, which guarantied to American citizens the right of trial, the President could not give up that right unless they denationalized themselves by an act of piracy. He was bound to assert it for their benefit. The President cannot suspend the Constitution, nor treaty or laws made in pursuance thereof. On the contrary, he is compelled by his duty and oath of office to see them faithfully executed. It has been argued that the Lopez men had committed a heinous crime, and deserved to die; but men are not hung, in this country at least, by equity. The greatest criminals are as much entitled to the forms of law as the most innocent who are accused. If a guilty man may be condemned unheard, and without a trial, there is no safety for the innocent. The example set by Spain in the case of the Lopez men, if acquiesced in, places it in her power to execute any American citizen without giving him a fair trial. It has practically abrogated the treaty.

Again, sir, I disagree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] as to another branch of this subject. In the case of Mr. Thrasher, he has taken the ground that he had become naturalized, or at all events taken the oath of allegiance to the Crown of Spain, and that, therefore, he had forfeited his right of American citizenship, and was liable to be tried as a Spanish subject, and was not entitled to the benefits of the provisions of the treaty. Such, also, was the position of the Administration in relation to Mr. Thrasher, and they appear to have abandoned him to his fate without a struggle.

Sir, I am astonished that any one should take the position that Mr. Thrasher was naturalized, in view of the facts and the laws of Spain. What is the record, furnished by Concha himself, the Captain General of Cuba? It is, that Mr. Thrasher had not taken the oath of naturalization, and he summoned Mr. Thrasher before him when he attempted to publish a paper in Cuba in 1850, and prohibited him from publishing it, on the ground that he refused, when thus summoned, to take the oath of naturalization. He required him to discontinue his paper, or take the oath of naturalization. Thrasher refused to take the oath of allegiance to the Spanish Government, and was not, therefore, entitled to the benefits of the act of naturalization, and compelled to abandon his paper.

Mr. BROOKS, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman from Texas let me understand his point? Did I understand him to say that Mr. Thrasher did not take the domiciliary oath which was required of him by the Captain General of Cuba?

Mr. HOWARD. No, not the domiciliary oath. I admit he took that oath.

Mr. BROOKS. I believe the gentleman understands Spanish; the oath which he took was an oath of fidelity and vassalage to Spain—juramento de fidelidad y vasallaje. Is not that so?

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir, that is not so, if the gentleman means to assert that it was an oath of allegiance to Spain.

Mr. BROOKS. He was obliged to take such an oath under the laws of Cuba, of 1817.

Mr. HOWARD. I will set the gentleman right on that subject. In relation to that matter, gross injustice has been done Mr. Thrasher.

What is naturalization? When is a man naturalized? When he renounces the sovereign of his origin, and acquires the rights of citizenship under the Government to which he transfers his allegiance. Now, what were the laws of Spain in reference to that subject? I have here the regulation of 1791, contained in the official documents accompanying the President's message. But this whole subject of settlement and colonization in Cuba was regulated in 1817 by a special law. It did not require Mr. Thrasher to swear himself a Catholic, as the gentleman supposes. It only required satisfactory proof of that fact. The regulation is contained at length in a work of great authority recently published in Spain, entitled "Legislacion Ultra Marina."*

* Naturalization law of Spain in Cuba.

1st. All the strangers belonging to friendly Powers or nations who wish to establish themselves, or who already are in the Island of Cuba, must make it clear by the proper means to her Government that they profess the Roman Catholic religion, and without this indispensable circumstance, they shall not be admitted to domicile themselves there; but as to my subjects of these dominions and of the Indies, they are not obliged to prove this, because that, in respect to them, there cannot be any doubt as to this point.

2d. As to the strangers who are admitted according to the preceding article, the Governor shall receive from them an oath [juramento de fidelidad y vasallaje] of fidelityland submission, in which they shall promise to comply with the laws and general orders of the Indies to which the Spaniards are subject.

3d. When the first five years are past from the establishment of these foreign colonists in the Island, and they shall then enter into an obligation to remain perpetually in it, all the privileges and rights of naturalization shall be conceded to them, likewise to their sons whom they shall have brought with them, or who shall have been born in the same Island, in order that they may consequently be admitted to the honorable employs of the republic and the militia, according to the talents of each one.

5th. During the first five years, the Spanish or foreign colonists shall have the liberty to return to their former countries or ancient residences—and in this case they shall be entitled to take from the Island all the property and goods which they shall have brought into it, without paying any dues whatever, for taking them away—but of those which they have gained in the above-mentioned time, they have to contribute ten for a hundred.

9th. The liberty of the foreign colonists to return to their countries or ancient residences during the first five years is absolute, without limitation or condition, and they shall be able to take away their property, or dispose of it as they shall see fit.

In the case of war with the Power which is the natural country or sovereign of the domiciliated colonists, these do not lose the rights and advantages of their domicile in the Island of Cuba, although the five years from their establishment shall not have passed. Their property shall not be subject to embargo, sequestration, or any other of the provisions, ordinary or extraordinary, of the state of war. Those who, notwithstanding the war, wish to remain permanently in the Island, to accomplish their five years and naturalize themselves, shall be allowed to do so with perfect liberty, being of credit, good lives and customs. To those who prefer to absent themselves, sufficient time shall be conceded, so that with ease and convenience they can regulate their affairs and dispose of their property, being allowed to carry away all the property they brought with them, or an equivalent thereto, without payment of any dues whatever—and paying for what they have gained since, ten for a hundred, according to the 16th preceding article.

24th. The five years being past, and the foreign colonists wishing to naturalize themselves, shall repair to the Government with their letters of domicile, and they shall manifest that they oblige themselves to remain perpetually in the Island. The Government shall take the proper means of information, and their good qualities being certified, their continued residence for five years, landed property or industry, they shall be admitted to take the oath of naturalization, in which they shall promise fidelity to the Catholic religion, the King and the laws, renouncing everything foreign, all privilege and protection that would arise from being foreigners, and promising not to retain any dependence, relation, or civil subjection to the country of their birth—with the explanation, that this renunciation does not comprehend the relations or domestic correspondences of family or relationship, neither the economies of goods or interests, which every citizen stranger can maintain according to the royal schedule, and instruction of the 2d of September, 1791, and circulars since.

25th. With the declared requisites the Government shall

The law of 1817, as to settlers in Cuba, is not unlike our own law of naturalization. It gives him five years to become naturalized, and gives him, in the mean time, the absolute right to return to his native land; and in case war broke out, he had the right to remove with all his property to his ancient home. At the end of five years he was to come forward to announce that it was his intention to remain perpetually in the Island, to prove his religion and his good conduct, and then to take the oath of naturalization, by which he was required "to promise fidelity to the Catholic religion, 'the King and the laws, renouncing everything 'foreign; all privileges and protection that would 'arise from being foreigners, and promising not to 'retain any dependence, relation, or civil subjec-'tion to the country of their birth." This was complete naturalization, but could only be acquired after proof of five years' residence. He was then furnished with his naturalization papers, and the law declared that "naturalized strangers shall enjoy all the rights and privileges of Spaniards." But this oath Mr. Thrasher refused to take when summoned before the Captain General, and it is therefore res adjudicata, in his office, that that gentleman was never naturalized, but refused to surrender his allegiance to the United States, and was in consequence refused the rights of a naturalized subject of Spain.

And now as to the domiciliary oath. It does not profess to be an oath of allegiance; and if it did, it would be in violation of the Spanish laws. It would confer no right on Mr. Thrasher, and would subject him to no loss of privilege as an American citizen. The domiciliary oath required him to swear fidelity to the laws of Spain and the Indies. It was, in truth, no more than the declaration required by our law of an intention to become a citizen, accompanied by an oath. Indeed it was not so much, as the Spanish law did not require such an intention to be declared. I am aware the form of oath furnished in the executive document, which was palmed off upon Mr. Webster by the Spanish authorities, purports to be an oath of allegiance; but if Mr. Thrasher ever took such an oath it was extra-judicial, and not authorized by the law, and gave no right. It was obviously a form of oath which had been made under the law of 1791.

The second section of the law of 1817 contains the whole regulation in force at the time of Mr. Thrasher's domiciliation. By that law he took, in the language of the law, "an oath (juramento de fidelidad y vasallaje) of fidelity and submission, 'in which they shall promise to comply with the 'laws and general orders of the Indies to which 'the Spaniards are subject." It is noticeable that while one of the translations from the Department correctly renders vasallaje submission, it translates fidelidad, allegiance instead of fidelity; but nothing is gained by this translation, as it is allegiance to the laws, and not to the Crown of Spain. It is nothing more than the law of nations, under which, if a man comes here, he is bound to obey and not to violate our laws; but that does not make him a citizen of the country. It gives him none of the rights of an American citizen; for the principle is too plain to be controverted, that no man can be naturalized in a country until he complies with the laws and institutions of that country, which confers upon him the rights of naturalization. Mr. Thrasher did not do that. He refused to do it, which Concha himself admits. It is true Concha says he was something more than an American citizen; that he was domiciled, and had taken an oath to obey the laws and orders of the Indies to which Spanish subjects were compelled to submit; but he was careful not to say it was the oath of naturalization.

I have chosen to place this matter on the indisputable ground that Thrasher could not become naturalized without renouncing his former allegiance, and taking upon himself the allegiance of Spain, according to the Spanish laws. The judicial doctrine of this country goes the length of saying that no one can lose his allegiance until a method is provided for effecting it, by an act of Congress. Chancellor Kent, after a review of all the decisions, thus states the law:

"From this historical review of the principal discussions in the Federal courts on this interesting subject in American jurisprudence, the better opinion would seem to be, that a citizen cannot renounce his allegiance to the United States without the permission of Government, to be declared by law; and that, as there is no existing legislative regulation on the case, the rule of the English common law remains unaltered."

Concha rested the right of Spain to try Mr. Thrasher in the manner he was tried on the ground that the military tribunal by which he was tried was a regular tribunal of the Island of Cuba, created by law. What was it, sir? It was composed of a brigadier of the army, and six other officers. I shall not repeat what I have said in relation to there being no right to try an American citizen before a council of war; but I will content myself with this position, which cannot be successfully refuted: Although it were a regular tribunal, and had the right to try him, he was entitled to his counsel, his witnesses, his proofs, and his defense. I have never heard his own published account of the trial denied, as a truthful statement of the facts. It was communicated to Congress by the President. Mr. Thrasher says:

"On the 21st October, I was thrown into a dungeon of the city prison, and all communication with any person strictly prohibited. On the 25th, I was removed to my present dungeon, and the fiscal of the military tribunal made his appearance and began a judicial examination. On the 26th ultimo this was continued, and then I saw no one until the 4th instant, when the question was proceeded with, and on the 6th I was again questioned, and finally informed that I was accused of treason. At the same time I was required to select one from a list of officers that was presented to me, who should conduct my defense. Not knowing any of them, I chose at random, supposing he would consult with me and with my legal advisers, as is usual in such cases, in regard to my defense. On the 7th instant, I was, for the first time, allowed to see my friends, and to consult with them as to the best course to pursue.

"I conferred with our consul, and he passed several communications in my behalf to the Government here, all of which have been utterly disregarded and not replied to. On the 11th, I was informed that I was to be brought up the next day for sentence. I immediately wrote to my nominal defender, requesting him to come at once to consult with me, and to bring with him the proceedings, which are in writing. He replied, verbally, that he would come in the afternoon. He did not come, and I extended at once a protest against the proceedings, alleging that I had not been heard, and that neither myself nor my legal advisers had been consulted for a proper defense. I sent this to the president of the military commission that night, who refused to receive it, saying, it could only be admitted by the Captain General.

"The American consul, Mr. Owen, as soon as informed of this, proceeded to the palace and protested against sentence being pronounced, as I had not been heard in defense. In the morning, my nominal defender came to my prison to inform me that he had been allowed by the court only twenty-four hours to prepare my defense; that he had been occupied until that moment examining the proceedings, which are voluminous, and that within an hour he must return them to the fiscal.

"On the 12th I was taken before a court-martial, composed of a brigadier general and six officers of the army. The testimony and proceedings were read before I was brought into court, which is contrary to law and to custom, and when brought in I was asked what I had to say to the charges against me? I replied, I had not been furnished with a copy of the charges; that I had been denied access to the proceedings and testimony; that my nominal defender had neither consulted with me nor with my counsel, and that I now asked that my protest and petition for stay of proceedings should be admitted. I was told by the president of the court, that it should be considered. I was then removed to my dungeon, and heard nothing more of the proceedings until to-day, when I have been formally notified that I have been sentenced to eight years labor in chains at Ceuta, in Africa, with payment of costs."

Do you call such a proceeding a trial according to the usual course of proceedings? Do you call that complying with the provisions of the treaty? I can tell my friend from New York, that an argument of that sort will not prevail with any lawyer, because the treaty is positive that he shall have counsel, which was violated in this case. They would not let him select his counsel from Spanish subjects generally. They furnished him with a list of Spanish army officers from whom he was to select one. He selected, as he has said, at random, not knowing a thing about it. That Spanish officer, as a matter of course, instead of defending the accused, did everything in his power to convict him.

It is evident that the provisions of the treaty were denied him, not only as to counsel, but as to being present at the taking of the testimony, which was taken in writing out of court. He was not furnished with a copy of the charges which, together with the written testimony, was read over in court, and then the prisoner was brought in and asked what he had to say for himself. It is obvious that he was not allowed a defense but condemned unheard.

The excuse rendered by the Cuban authorities for not allowing Mr. Thrasher counsel was, that no counsel was permitted to appear in these cases before the military court, because it produced delay. It held back the victim from the "garote," and from chains, and the mines. Such an answer may content the present Administration; but it can hardly be a legal answer to a positive requirement in the treaty, that American citizens shall be allowed to employ such advocates and solicitors as they may judge proper in all their affairs, and in all their trials at law. Neither can it be a very satisfactory reply to an American, to assure him that all Spanish subjects are made victims of a similar barbarity.

It was not the usual course of proceeding, because no Spanish subject arrested as Mr. Thrasher was, could be tried before the council of war. The present laws of Spain, as stated in the work to which I have already alluded, declare:

"That conspirators being apprehended by the parties of troops, detailed for that purpose by the government, shall be judged by the ordinary council of war; but by the ordinary jurisdiction, if they were apprehended by the order of requisition, or in aid of the civil authority, except in case of resistance by the criminal to the troops. Then they shall likewise be judged militarily. In all other cases, according to article thirteen, the offenders who commit these crimes, shall be judged by the ordinary jurisdiction, even when the apprehension shall have been made by armed force, but with loss of special privilege. And in article fourteen, it is provided in the trials by this law, there shall not be any authority whatever, except such as shall be exercised by the ordinary and military jurisdictions, according to the limits which are here shown."

Mr. Thrasher's was not a military arrest. He was taken in the first instance to the office of police, and was in custody of the chief of police. His case was subsequently transferred to a military court. He was tried, therefore, in violation of the Spanish law, which gave jurisdiction of such a case only to the ordinary tribunals. The same remark is true of all those prisoners who came in and delivered themselves up under the proclamation of the Captain General, and of Breckinridge and Beach, of Kentucky, who were arrested at sea by a Spanish merchant ship, endeavoring to make their escape. Neither of them were military arrests, or made under such circumstances as gave the council of war jurisdiction of their cases.

The arrest of Breckinridge and Beach was a violation of the law of nations. Those gentlemen were in the Lopez expedition, but had made their escape in an open boat, and were a long distance from Cuba—outside of the league which limits the jurisdiction of any nation over the ocean—when they were captured by a Spanish schooner and brought into Havana. Concha, the Captain General, in reply to Commodore Parker, said that these men were pirates, and that he would try them as such. Now, the Spanish Government had no more right to seize those two men where they were captured, than it had to seize them in the streets of Washington city, unless the offense was piracy. They were, under these circumstances, brought into Havana and condemned by this military tribunal, which had no jurisdiction over them. I admit that, if they had returned voluntarily within the jurisdiction of the Island, they might have been tried by a competent court under the treaty. But having been arrested in violation of the law of nations, it was the duty of the Captain General to discharge them, and the duty of this Governmnt to demand their release.

The same was the case with the Contoy prisoners. They had only imagined a conspiracy, as we find in the old English books, that one used to be held guilty of treason who imagined the King's death. If anything criminal was fastened upon them, it seems that they only contemplated an expedition to Cuba. They were outside of the Spanish jurisdiction, anchored near an island in the sea, under the jurisdiction of Mexico. They were seized, and the Spanish authorities maintained that they had jurisdiction over them, because they were pirates. I believe that these prisoners were subsequently released, but that the vessels were not; and I understand from the honexpedite the letters of naturalization, by form of which they shall find the order in the royal exchequer ayuntamiento, and respective territorial jurisdictions, without costs or dues, as in the letters of domicile.

26th. The naturalized strangers shall enjoy all the rights and privileges of Spaniards, as likewise their sons and legitimate descendants, according to the 15th article of the preceding.

orable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMART,] that that subject remains now precisely where it was, and that the Government has taken no very efficient means to enforce satisfaction to the owners of those wrongfully-seized vessels. Let us make compensation, by an appropriation, to the Spanish Consul at New Orleans, whose property was destroyed by the mob. But let us also demand satisfaction for those violations of national law, and for the injuries which our own citizens have sustained in consequence of the violations of our treaty by the Spanish authorities.

A few observations in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from New York on the Crescent City affair. It seems to me to be undeniable, that it is not within the power of Spain to construe the treaty so as to break down the commercial intercourse between the two countries. Undoubtedly Spain might exclude a person from her shores dangerous to her safety. But the power must be exercised in reason, and not capriciously. They had the right to say that Mr. Smith should not land, but they had not the authority to say that the vessel should not come into port and discharge its cargo, and land its passengers and mails. It was not alleged that the ship, passengers, cargo, and mails were dangerous to Cuba, or even obnoxious to its authorities. They had no right to deny communication with the ship, unless its officers or crew had committed some offense against the revenue or other laws, and even then the remedy was by seizure and proceeding in admiralty. Mr. Smith exercised the right of every American citizen, guarantied by the Constitution, to publish his own opinions, if he exercised any right at all. He denies, however, having published anything. If he continued going there without landing, or violating their order not to land, from now to the day of judgment, and observed the institutions of Spain in Cuba, he might, when he returned home, have published his views, and Spain had no legal right to complain; it was no offense against her laws or jurisdiction. If she had a right to complain, she could only proceed through the judicial tribunals of this country; that might have been done in this country, as it was in England, in the case of Peltier, for a libel on Napoleon, and on the common-law principle of the greater the truth the greater the libel, there is no doubt Smith would have been severely punished. But to deny all commercial intercourse—to deny that the passengers should be landed, and the mails received, because "the individual, William Smith," published falsehoods in this country, relative to the Spanish authorities in Cuba, is too ridiculous an idea to be entertained by any man but a Spaniard.

I admit if the authorities of Cuba had addressed themselves to this Government in the first instance, through the Spanish Minister, and requested that that individual should not be permitted to go on a semi-official vessel, as a matter of courtesy, the request should have been complied with. But what right had the Spanish authorities in Cuba to take a matter for the diplomatic agents of the Governments into their own hands, and exclude a vessel from commerce on such frivolous pretense? Commercial treaties are worth nothing if our commercial marine can be dealt with in that manner with impunity.

Sir, I have made these observations, not because I entertain any sentiments of hostility to the present Administration, but because I wish to draw attention to the gross manner in which the rights of American citizens are trampled on by other Powers. Its frequency has erected itself into impunity. The time has arrived when the American, like Briton, should feel the protection of his country's flag in the remotest corner of the globe. That Government which does not protect its own citizens against foreign oppression, will soon sink beneath their contempt, and the scorn of the civilized world. The time has arrived when new life and energy should be infused into our foreign relations.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 15, 1853.

The Secretary of the Treasury reports:

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES.

The receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1852, were:

From customs		$47,339,326 62
From public lands		2,043,239 58
From miscellaneous sources		345,820 69
		49,728,386 89
Add balance in the Treasury July 1, 1851		10,911,645 68
		60,640,032 57
The expenditures for the same fiscal year were		46,007,896 20
Leaving a balance in the Treasury July 1, 1852		$14,632,136 37

(As appears in detail by accompanying statement A.)

ESTIMATES.

The estimated receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1853, are:

Receipts from customs, 1st quarter, by actual returns	$15,728,992 25
Receipts from customs, 2d, 3d, and 4th quarters, as estimated	33,271,007 75
		49,000,000 00
Receipts from public lands		2,000,000 00
Do. from miscellaneous sources,		300,000 00
Total receipts		51,300,000 00
Add balance in the Treasury July 1, 1852		14,632,136 37
Total means as estimated		$65,932,136 37

EXPENDITURES, VIZ:

The actual expenditures for the quarter ending September 30, 1852, were	$13,440,587 69
(As appears by accompanying statement B.)
The estimated expenditures during the other three quarters, from October 1, 1852, to June 30, 1853, are:
Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous	13,214,330 17
Expenses of collecting the revenue from customs	1,575,000 00
Expenses of collecting the revenue from lands	192,646 28
Army proper, &c.	8,689,530 21
Fortifications, ordnance, arming militia, &c.	705,620 18
Internal improvements, &c.	1,318,963 77
Indian Department	1,973,313 50
Pensions	1,070,686 53
Naval establishment, including dry-docks and ocean steam-mail contracts	7,454,300 66
Interest on the public debt	3,725,600 10
Redemption of stock of the loan of 1843	5,922,931 35
Purchase of stock of the loan of 1847	1,276,546 42
	$60,560,056 86
Leaving an estimated unappropriated balance in the Treasury, July 1, 1853, of	$5,372,079 51

This balance, it will be observed, exists after the application of $7,199,477 77 to the redemption of the public debt.

The estimated receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1853, and ending June 30, 1854, are:

Receipts from customs	$49,000,000 00
Receipts from public lands	2,000,000 00
Do. from miscellaneous sources,	200,000 00
Total estimated receipts	51,200,000 00
Add estimated balance in the Treasury July 1, 1853	5,372,079 51
Total means as estimated	$56,572,079 51

The expenditures for the same period, as estimated by the several Departments—of State, Treasury, Interior, War, and Navy, and Postmaster General, are:

Balances of former appropriations which will be required to be expended this year,	$6,879,883 28
Permanent and indefinite appropriations	9,172,889 68
Specific appropriations asked for this year	30,151,040 64
	$46,203,753 60

This sum is composed of the following particulars, viz:

Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous	$11,213,430 74
Expenses of collecting revenue from customs	2,100,000 00
Expenses of collecting revenue from lands	204,520 00
Army proper, &c.	9,311,808 64
Fortifications, ordnance, arming militia, &c.	2,191,647 48
Internal improvements, &c.	895,205 70
Indian Department	1,612,137 45
Pensions	2,023,512 00
Naval establishment, including dry-docks and ocean steam-mail contracts	12,664,222 05
Interest on public debt	3,400,638 54
Purchase of stock of the loan of 1847	586,631 00
	$46,203,753 60

Leaving an estimated balance in the Treasury, July 1, 1854, of $10,368,325 91

It will be seen, by reference to the foregoing statement, that the total cash receipts and means in the Treasury for the year ending on the 20th June, 1852, were $60,640,032 57. Of which there were received from customs, $47,339,326 62; from lands and miscellaneous sources, $2,389,060 27; and a balance in the Treasury at the commencement of the year of $10,911,645 68.

The expenditures for the same period were $46,007,896 20, which includes the following payments on account of the public debt, viz:

For interest, including that on $5,000,000 of 5 per cent. stock issued to Texas	$4,000,297 80
For the redemption of the principal of various loans	1,986,160 66
Reimbursement of revolutionary debt	1,460 31
Reimbursement of outstanding Treasury notes	300 00
Reimbursement of stock for the fourth and fifth installments of the Mexican indemnity	287,596 76
Total	$6,275,815 53
Besides which there was paid the installment of the debt of the cities of the District	60,000 00
The last installment due to Mexico under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo	3,180,000 00
Awards to American citizens under the same treaty	529,980 78
Making a total of	$10,045,796 31

included in the expenditures of the last fiscal year on account of the principal and interest of the funded and unfunded public debt, which, deducted from the above sum, reduces the expenditure to $35,962,099 89.

From this latter sum, however, may be still further deducted the following items, which form no portion of the regular expenses of the Government, viz:

Repayment to importers of the excess of deposits on unascertained duties	$846,918 86
Repayment of drawbacks, allowances for damages on imported merchandise, fishing bounties, &c.	544,452 38
Refunding duties under the act of 8th August, 1846	138,086 41
Refunding duties under the decisions of the Supreme Court, acquiesced in by the Department	221,985 87
Debentures, and other charges, refunded under various acts of Congress	113,307 73

A still further reduction may be made for the ocean mail service, which more properly belongs to the Post Office Department, the revenue and expenditures of which are entirely distinct from the general expenses of the Government, and which Department collects all the revenue from this ocean mail service	865,555 55
The expenses attending the Seventh Census is an expenditure accruing only once every ten years, and the amount under this head, in the expenditures of the last year, is	547,385 02
Making together	$3,277,691 82
If to this is added the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, and lands which previous to the year 1849 were deducted from the gross receipts, and the net revenue only paid into the Treasury, but which form items of expenditure during the last year to the extent of	2,249,715 38
Making altogether	$5,527,407 20

Which, deducted from the preceding sum of $35,962,099 89, would leave $30,434,692 69 as the regular and ordinary, including some considerable items of extraordinary expenditures of the Government for the last fiscal year.

It will be observed that the whole amount of the last installment to Mexico is included in the expenditure of the year; but the sum of $66,467 42 has since been refunded into the Treasury, and will appear in the miscellaneous receipts for the current fiscal year, being the profit accruing to the United States from gain in exchange in consequence of the said installment having been paid in the city of Mexico.

The balance remaining in the Treasury on the 1st July, 1852, it will be seen, was $14,632,136 37.

By the last annual report from this Department, the estimated total receipts and means from all sources for the year ending 30th June, 1852, were $62,411,645 68. The estimated total expenditures for the same period were $50,952,909 59; leaving an estimated unappropriated balance in the Treasury on the 1st of July last of $11,458,743 09.

The actual balance in the Treasury at that date was	$14,632,136 37
From which deduct the balance of appropriations already made for the same fiscal year, undrawn, but subject to draft, on the 1st July last, of	6,108,315 48
To the payment of which the actual balance in the Treasury on that date of $14,632,136 37 was liable, and the actual unappropriated balance in the Treasury on the 1st of July last was	$8,523,820 89

The estimated receipts for the current fiscal year, as submitted in December, 1851, were $51,800,000. The actual receipts so far as returns have been received for the five months ending the 30th November, being $22,220,299 20, indicate the then estimates of receipts to have been nearly correct.

The then estimated expenditures as submitted to Congress for the current fiscal year were $42,892,299 19, and the unappropriated balance in the Treasury on the 1st July, 1853, provided no additional appropriations beyond the estimates then submitted should be made by Congress, was estimated at $20,366,443. Congress, however, in its appropriations exceeded the estimates submitted by this Department (including provision for any deficiency in the income of the Post Office in consequence of the reduction in the rates of postage) about ten millions of dollars.

The actual expenditures for the current fiscal year, as appropriated and authorized by Congress, (exclusive of the sum to be applied to the redemption of the public debt,) therefore amount to $53,360,579 09, in place of $42,892,299 19, as estimated by the Department; and the balance in the Treasury at the end of the current fiscal year is estimated at $5,372,079 51, after allowing the sum of $7,199,479 77 as applicable to the redemption of the public debt.

This, however, it must be observed, is the unappropriated and not the actual balance which will be in the Treasury at the date specified. The actual balance undrawn at that date, provided Congress creates no unexpected demands upon the Treasury to be liquidated prior to July next, may be estimated at about $10,000,000, after having redeemed during the year more than $7,000,000 of the debt.

For the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1854, the total receipts are estimated at $51,200,000, which, with the estimated balance in the Treasury on the 1st of July next, will give as the estimated total means for the year the sum of $56,572,079 51.

The estimated total expenditures for that period are $46,203,753 60, leaving an estimated unappropriated balance in the Treasury on the 1st of July, 1854, of $10,368,325 91, without other deduction from the available means of the year, towards the reduction of the public debt, except the sum of $586,631 for the purchase from the land fund of the loan of 1847.

PUBLIC DEBT.

The public debt on the 20th November, 1851, was $62,560,395 26, exclusive of the stock authorized to be delivered to Texas by act of Congress of 9th September, 1850, amounting to $10,000,000; of which $5,000,000 of certificates were ready and awaiting the demand of that State, at the date of my last annual report; that amount has since been delivered to the authorized agent of the State of Texas; thus increasing the aggregate registered debt to $67,560,395 26. The following reductions have been made since the last annual exhibit of the public debt, up to the 1st of January:

On account of the debt of the District cities	$60,000 00
On account of the old funded and unfunded debt	2,143 39
On account of the loan of 1843	1,711,400 00
On account of the loan of 1846	9 74
Do do .1847	650,100 00
Do do 1848	5,000 00
Treasury notes paid in specie or received as such	50 00
Making a total of	$2,428,703 13

The public debt on the 1st of January, 1853, was $65,131,692 13, (as per statement,) exclusive of the remaining $5,000,000 deliverable to Texas under the act of 9th September, 1850, when the provisions of that law are fully complied with.

Since the above date an additional amount of the public debt has been redeemed to the extent of about $250,000.

The Department possesses no authority to purchase at a rate above par value any portion of the six per cent. loan of 1847, and which is only redeemable in 1867, except to the extent of what balance may remain in the Treasury from the receipts from the sale of public lands, after the interest on that loan has first been paid from such receipts. As the amount of that stock forms so large a portion of the public debt, it would be desirable that Congress should remove that restriction, by authorizing its purchase at the current market value. By thus giving a more extended scope to the application of any surplus funds in the Treasury for the purchase of the public debt, it would probably enable the Department to procure it on more favorable terms.

Some doubts have existed as to the direct and positive authority of the Department to purchase some of the other stocks at rates above their par value; and in order to remove all uncertainty on the subject, I would recommend that express authority should be vested in the Department to purchase at its discretion, at the current market value, any portion of the existing public debt, to the extent of any surplus means on hand, provided the available balance in the Treasury should never be reduced below five millions of dollars.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The receipts from duties on foreign merchandise for the last fiscal year exhibit a decrease as compared with the preceding year of $1,678,241 30. This is deemed but a temporary decline of the receipts from that source, whilst it shows how unstable is the reliance placed upon the large amounts, which in times of high prosperity are expected from that branch of the revenue.

The slightest disturbing causes felt in the channels of trade at once unfavorably affect the Treasury; so any favorable impetus given to commerce from causes often accidental, tends for the time to a sudden expansion of its revenues. This is observable to some extent in the receipts from duties on foreign goods for the periods above mentioned. The acquisition of our new Territories on the Pacific, followed by the development of their immense mineral resources, gave a corresponding extended basis for commercial operations. The sudden drain of foreign merchandise from the Atlantic ports to the Pacific left a vacuum to be filled by fresh and larger importations of foreign dutiable goods, which of course was followed by a corresponding increase of receipts into the national Treasury.

The repeated and disastrous conflagrations at the principal port of the Pacific, destroying millions of property in foreign goods, tended to a still further increase of foreign importations. The channels of trade, however, having once more accommodated themselves to these new circumstances, we find a gradual diminution in the year of nearly $2,000,000. A new discovery of mineral wealth, though not within the boundaries of our own country, yet within the reach of its enterprise, is followed by increased buoyancy in trade, and a corresponding increase in the revenues arising from it. By referring to my former annual reports, the views of this Department may be found somewhat in detail of the results which, in my opinion, may be expected to flow sooner or later from a legislation which tends so injuriously to affect, if not to a great extent to destroy, some of the prominent manufacturing interests of the country, by giving to the foreign producer the control of the supplies of our home market. The iron interest was cited, to show the effect of permitting the surplus foreign productions in all their various stages of manufacture to be thrown upon our markets at almost nominal prices, and consequently upon the payment of comparatively nominal duties. Importations of bar, pig, and other iron for the year ending 30th June, 1845, were 102,723 tons, producing duties amounting to $1,794,784; and for the year ending 30th June, 1852, the imports were 435,149 tons, producing duties amounting to $3,272,812. Thus it is seen that while the quantity imported has increased about four and a quarter times over that of 1845, the aggregate duties received is less than double the amount received from that source in 1845, and that, too, under a heavier rate of duty at the latter period.

This enormous increase in the importations of iron, at prices so far below the fair or usual cost of production, both here and abroad, while it produced no corresponding benefit to the Treasury, destroyed in a good degree the competition of our own producer and manufacturer. The result then foretold is now partially realized. The foreign producer, by a reduction of prices on his part, and of duties on our part, having possessed himself of the control of our market, raises the prices of iron, it is believed, beyond the remunerating point, and certainly far beyond the rates ruling during the period of the late hopeless struggle of our own manufacturer to sustain himself.

The effects of this state of things are felt in the very large increase of duties consequent upon the suddenly-enhanced prices of iron, which must be paid by our consumers, and with the most unfavorable influences upon our numerous railroad enterprises now in progress, whilst it is attended with no corresponding benefit to those whose capital, embarked in this branch of manufacture, has been totally lost. On the other hand, by this rise in the prices of iron, it may be expected that a new stimulus will be given to that branch of American labor, which may again be met by similar consequences, when it shall have become a formidable competitor with the foreign producer, ending in a destructive reduction in price, and a redundant supply.

Whilst the foreign commerce of the country, and the foreign market for its productions are undoubtedly of great importance, yet they both probably receive an undue share of consideration, for they respectively sink into relative insignificance when compared with our internal and coastwise commerce, and with the home market.

There are no records which will enable the Department to give the correct amount of our internal and coastwise trade; but some idea may be formed of its vast extent when it is recollected that the annual value of the agricultural, mineral, and manufacturing productions of the country is not less than three thousand millions of dollars, ($3,000,000,000,) as shown by the statistical returns of the late census; a large portion of which is transported by river, canal, or coasting vessels, or on railroads, and which in the course of trade changes hands several times before reaching the domestic consumer; making in the aggregate an amount of traffic counting by thousands of millions; whilst the whole amount shipped to foreign countries is but $150,000,000, being only one twentieth part of the entire production of the country, which thus finds an outlet in foreign markets.

The single article of coal annually transported coastwise, and in canal boats, or on railroads, is of sufficient bulk to furnish full cargoes for four times the quantity of all the American tonnage employed in foreign commerce, and probably affords the means of livelihood to a greater number of persons than the latter.

The coastwise trade to and from the American ports in the Gulf of Mexico is of itself probably nearly equal, in point of value, to the entire export of American productions to foreign nations.

A striking difference between the magnitude and importance of the home market and the foreign one, is to be found in the statistics of exports of what is familiarly called the famine year of 1847. There was some difficulty at that time in procuring sufficient shipping, including both American and foreign, to convey our breadstuffs to the famishing nations of Europe; and yet our entire exports during that year of the two principal articles of food—Indian corn (maize) and flour—were only about three per cent. of the former, and about ten per cent. of the latter, estimated on the whole crop produced in the United States; leaving ninety-seven per cent. of the Indian corn and ninety per cent. of the wheat crop for the supply of the home market, where it was actually consumed. Our exports of breadstuffs at present are only about one third of what they were during the above year of unusual demand; exhibiting in a still more striking contrast, the immense difference between the home and foreign markets in favor of the former.

The mere tolls collected by the canals and railroads on the transportation of merchandise for the internal trade of the country, exceeds in amount the total value of all the breadstuffs purchased from us by foreign nations.

The annual value of the crop of Indian corn, of wheat, and of hay, each respectively, is fully equal to the entire value of our productions exported to foreign countries. The annual amount of the manufactures in the States of New York or Pennsylvania, in either of those States, greatly exceeds the value of such exports; and even those of the comparatively small State of Massachusetts is fully equal to all the productions of the country consumed by foreign nations.

The latter State probably consumes breadstuffs that are produced in the middle and western States to a greater amount than is shipped to all Europe, with the great additional advantage of this being a regular and uniform demand, not depending on European crops or the caprices of foreign Governments in the regulation of their commerce and the assessment of arbitrary and ever-varying duties, according to their own actual wants and circumstances. Yet all these immense agricultural, mineral, and manufacturing interests, which are almost exclusively connected with the internal trade of the country and the home market, receive greatly less attention and consideration from the community than the comparatively small amount of our foreign commerce.

My views of the beneficial results which would follow a tariff with fixed and reliable, rather than with sliding, and consequently uncertain rates of duties, have undergone no change. I now recur to them as a duty imposed upon me by the acts establishing the Treasury Department.

The importations of foreign merchandise, (table —,) for the fiscal year ending 30th June last, amounted to.....$207,109,738

The exports for the same period were, of domestic merchandise.....$154,930,447

Foreign merchandise re-exported..... 12,037,043

Total exports.....$166,967,490

The imports of specie, during the same period, were..... $5,503,544

And the exports of the same..... 42,674,135

In tobacco, (table T,) the exports show an increase in quantity of 41,152 hogsheads, and of value of $812,032, having been in 1851, 95,945 hogsheads, valued at $9,219,51; 1852, 137,097 hogsheads, valued $10,031,283.

The exports of rice were 119,733 tierces, valued at $2,470,029—being an increase in quantity of 14,143 tierces, and of value, $299,102, as compared with the previous year.

The exports of breadstuffs and provisions amounted to $25,856,337; being an increase of $3,907,686.

The aggregate exports of domestic merchandise show a decrease, as compared with the previous year, of $24,349,585.

The exports of specie show an increase of $13,201,383, and an excess of exportation over importation of $37,170,591. (See table.)

MINT.

The operations of the Mint, particularly at Philadelphia, at which point the greater portion of all gold dust and bullion concentrates for assay and coinage, have been conducted with a remarkable degreee of promptness and dispatch, such as to remove all cause of complaint on the part of depositors, notwithstanding the enormous amounts of gold dust which have been and still continue to be received at that institution.

The coinage at the Mint for the year ending 31st December, 1852, was as follows:

Gold—6,094,765 pieces, of the value of.....	$51,505,638 50
Silver—27,549,505 pieces.....	847,310 00
Copper—5,162,094 pieces.....	51,620 94
Total.....	$52,404,569 44

The full returns for the last quarter of the year have not been received from the branch Mints, but the probable amount of their coinage will be about $4,700,000, of which the proportion at the branch Mint at New Orleans will be $3,800,000, and the remainder about equally divided between the branch at Charlotte, North Carolina, and Dahlonega, Georgia.

In accordance with the act of last session, proposals have been invited by public advertisement, both here and in California, for the erection of a Mint at San Francisco, in accordance with plans prepared with great care under the direction of this Department. I, however, have great doubts whether any proposals will or can be made for the erection of a suitable building, and the supply of the needful machinery, for the sum of $300,000, to which amount Congress has restricted the expenditure, including both of these objects.

Even, however, should proposals be made which would be satisfactory, and could be accepted by the Department, no progress could be made with the work until Congress authorizes the purchase of a site, and makes the needful appropriation therefor, as, from the best information now in possession of the Departmeut, none of the public reserves in that city afford proper and eligible locations for this building.

By the act of the 30th September, 1850, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1851, Congress authorized the appointment of an United States assayer for California, and directed a contract to be made by this Department with the proprietors of some well-established assaying works, for assaying gold and forming it into bars and ingots, under the supervision of the assayer. A contract was concluded, and ample security required for its faithful performance, and the contractors were limited in their charges for the services rendered by them, to the rate fixed by the Legislature of California in establishing a State assay office.

The Department was induced, with a view to furnish, so far as it had the power, a safe and convenient currency to the people of California, to authorize the receipt of the issues of the assay office thus established, for public dues, especially as they have all the essential requisites of coin, and as this was believed to be the object of Congress.

The general appropriation act of the last session contained a provision, by which the further receipt of these issues was prohibited; and in obedience thereto, the instructions under which they had been received were revoked.

The Department has reason to believe, from petitions addressed to it by a public meeting of the merchants of San Francisco, and from information received through other reliable sources, that much inconvenience and embarrassment has resulted from this legislation. It remains with Congress, however, to say what relief shall be extended, and the subject is submitted to their consideration.

The inconvenience arising from the scarcity of silver coinage still continues, and to such an extent as calls loudly for some legislative action to remedy the evil. Whether the present premium which silver bears, in comparison with gold, arises from the continued heavy influx of the latter and its consequent depreciated value, or from a special and unusual demand in Europe for silver, or from both causes combined, is not very material to discuss at present; for if it arises from either or both of these causes, there is no reason for believing that there is any present prospect of either being removed so as to create any reduction in the value of silver.

If, as I believe is the fact, this difference in the relative value of the two metals arises from the immense and increased supply of gold which has been furnished from California and Australia, there can be but little doubt such difference will continue to increase, as there is no present indication that there will be a reduced supply from those sources, but, on the contrary, every prospect of a still further increase.

This state of things has banished almost entirely from circulation all silver coin of full weight, and what little remains in the hands of the community consists principally of the worn pieces of Spanish coinage of the fractional parts of a dollar, all of which are of light weight, and many of them ten to twenty per cent. below their nominal value.

I see no remedy for this great existing evil but the adoption of the principle embraced in the bill which passed the Senate during the last session, making a new issue of silver coinage, of such reduced weight as will allow it to circulate with the gold coinage of established weight and fineness.

The principal objection which has been urged against the proposed new silver coinage is, that it could not, without a violation of contracts, be made a legal tender for the payment of debts, and that gold would therefore hereafter be the only legal tender. It is true that heretofore the laws of the United States have recognized the coin of either metal as a legal tender; and if it was at the option of the creditor to select which he would receive, there would be a very serious objection to changing either the weight or standard fineness of any portion of the coin. But this is not the fact, as it rests with the debtor to say with which description of coin he will pay his debts; and the natural and inevitable consequences of the premium which silver now bears have been to establish, practically, gold as the only legal tender. Nor can any legal or equitable objection be advanced to continue gold as a legal tender, as it is not proposed to reduce either the weight or the fineness of that description of coin; so that every creditor will continue to receive precisely the same quantity of gold for any given sum as at the time he may have made his contract. Nor does the present, or any future increased depreciation in the value of gold form any just reason against its being continued as a legal tender, at its present weight and fineness; for such depreciation in its actual value, if not in its relative one as regards silver, has been progressing gradually for some centuries, and all that can be said is, that the depreciation is more rapid at this time than formerly, and it is but a natural result of the uncertainty and want of stability in human affairs.

In the present state of things, as connected with this subject, not only the public service, but also the wants and convenience of the entire community, require that some measure should be adopted to furnish a silver currency; and the subject is, therefore, respectfully but earnestly recommended to the prompt attention of Congress.

I would again call the attention of Congress to the subject of making Mint certificates receivable in all dues to the Government, and dispensing with the present bullion fund, which is maintained at an annual expense of from $350,000 to $400,000, which might be saved in interest by the application of that fund to the redemption of the public debt, besides the great advantages to the business community and the general trade of the country, by throwing the amount of that fund into circulation, instead of keeping it constantly as dead capital in the vaults of the Mint.

The amount of the bullion fund during the last year has been nearly $7,000,000, and it has been applied to the immediate redemption of Mint certificates, so soon as the deposits of gold dust were assayed and their value ascertained, which has generally been in from twenty-four to forty-eight hours after such deposits were made; and the bullion fund was then made good so soon as such assayed gold could be worked into coin, to be again employed in the redemption of other certificates.

The plan which the Department would recommend would be, to issue certificates under the authority of Congress, to be duly registered and signed at the Treasury, to the needful amount, say six or seven millions of dollars, in sums of $100, $500, $1,000, $5,000, and $10,000 each, payable to the order of the Treasurer of the Mint, to be distributed in due proportions to the Mint and its respective branches; and so soon as any deposit of gold bullion was assayed and its value ascertained, to pay the amount to the depositor in the above certificates, except the fractional part of one hundred dollars, which would always be paid in coin. These certificates being receivable in payment of dues to the United States would at all times command their full par value, and would promptly and cheerfully be received on deposit as cash by the banks and held by them as specie capital, until their customers required them for the payment of duties or lands. They would accumulate principally at the great marts of commerce in the Union, and could be transmitted by mail by the different receiving officers to such points as the Treasury might direct, avoiding all the risk and expense which now attends the transfer of public funds in specie from points where it is collected and not required for public expenditures.

As these certificates were paid in at the large commercial seaports, the gold, so soon as coined, could be sent to such points from the Mint or the branch which may have issued the certificates, and the latter would then be returned to the Mint or its branch for the purpose of being again issued to new depositors. The expense of transmitting gold coin to the points where it might be required in order to redeem the certificates which had been received by the public officers, would of course be paid by the United States, and would require but a small sum, probably not the twentieth part of the amount which would be annually saved in interest by applying the present bullion fund to the redemption of the public debt.

No objection could be urged to this plan on the ground that it would be a paper currency, for it is merely a certificate for an amount of gold already actually in possession of the Government. These certificates would not be intended for circulation, nor would they circulate from hand to hand, but would remain with banks, bankers, or individuals until required for a payment to the Government; and the receiving officer should not be permitted to reissue, but only to hold them until they are replaced with the gold in legal coin from the bullion for which they were originally issued.

These certificates should likewise always be redeemable at the Mint after a reasonable time being allowed for the coinage of the gold bullion, which might be fixed at not exceeding twenty days after the bullion had been assayed.

It is not proposed that the certificates thus issued by the Mint and its different branches should be indiscriminately and generally received at all points of the Union, as in such case the fluctuations and the great difference in the rates of exchange between different places would cause them to be used as remittances, and throw a heavy expense upon the Treasury for the transportation between distant points of large amounts in specie, sufficient to equalize exchanges, at least to the extent of the issue of such certificates. In California, for instance, the exchange on the Atlantic States is usually at about four per cent. premium; and, consequently, all the issue of Mint certificates there would be immediately forwarded to New York, to be used at this latter point in payment of duties; and the United States would be obliged to transfer at a heavy expense all the coinage of the branch Mint at San Francisco, in order to redeem its certificates in New York.

The remedy for this would be, to make the issues of the Mint, and its existing, or any new branches in the Atlantic States, to be receivable only at the Atlantic sea-ports; those issued by the branch Mint at New Orleans to be receivable only at the ports on the Gulf of Mexico; and all the above at any of the land offices in the Atlantic and western States; whilst the issues of the branch Mint at San Francisco, so soon as it is put into operation, shall be receivable at all the custom-houses and land offices on the Pacific.

If the present system is to be continued, and a bullion fund of seven millions is to be maintained, the balance in the Treasury cannot conveniently be reduced below twelve millions of dollars, as the system of an Independent Treasury cannot be conducted with a less available balance than five millions, so as to have the needful amount at all times at the numerous points where the public expenditure is made.

SURVEY OF THE COAST.

It gives me great pleasure to refer to the progress of this important work during the last four years. The whole coast is divided into eleven sections, and in ten active operations have been carried on during this whole period. With only one link of twenty-six miles south of the Chesapeake to be filled up, an unbroken triangulation now extends from the mouth of the Kennebec river, in Maine, to the harbor of Beaufort, in North Carolina. The topography and hydrography have made corresponding progress. The harbors of Portsmouth, New Hampshire; Newburyport, Ipswich, Gloucester, Salem, Wellfleet, Massachusetts, and others, have been surveyed. New shoals have been discovered and sounded out in the vicinity of Nantucket. The dangerous shoals along the sea-coast of Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, Hatteras shoals and Frying-Pan shoals, have been made known to the navigator in excellent preliminary charts. The survey of the Chesapeake bay is now nearly completed, and that of the rivers flowing into it has been commenced. Some of the most important harbors on the southern coast, as Hatteras inlet, Ocracoke inlet, Beaufort harbor, Cape Fear entrance, Roman Shoals, Charleston harbor, North Edisto river, Tybee entrance, and the Savannah river, have been surveyed, and the charts are, or soon will be, published. The survey of Georgetown harbor, in South Carolina, and of the entrance of St. John river, Florida, have been commenced. The triangulation and reconnoissance of the vicinities of Cape Fear entrance, Georgetown harbor, Cape Roman, Charleston, North Edisto, Savannah, and entrance to the St. John's, are gradually and steadily advancing. In a few years an unbroken series, with points well-determined by astronomical and other observations, will cover the coast from the Penobscot river in Maine, to the St. Mary's in Florida. The progress of the survey on the Florida reef and the shores of the peninsula is entirely satisfactory, in view of the limited appropriations, compared with the vast extent and variety of the whole work. The entire reef and western shore has been examined in a preliminary way, and nearly one half of the survey of the reef has been made. The important harbor of Cedar Keys, on the western shore, has been examined. A reconnoissance has been made of about one half of the distance between St. Mark's and Mobile bay, and an examination of St. Mark's river. The triangulation and topography now extend from Mobile bay to Lake Ponchartrain, and nearly all the hydrography has been completed, and an examination made of the delta of the Mississippi. Galveston bay has been surveyed, excepting a small portion of the hydrography, and the triangulation now extends to the vicinity of Matagorda bay. Preliminary charts have been published of Galveston and Mobile bays, of the Mississippi delta, St. Mark's, Cedar Keys, Key West, Cape Canaveral, Mosquito inlet, and St. Andrew's shoals, and these will soon be followed by others. On the western coast, in consequence of the extraordinary difficulties in securing hands and means, owing to the discoveries of gold, the survey did not fairly get under way till about three years since. A very good preliminary reconnoissance has been made of the whole coast from San Diego to the Straits of San Juan de Fuca, and of nearly every important harbor, embracing San Diego, San Simeon, Santa Barbara, San Pedro, Point Conception, the harbor of Coxo, San Luis Obispo, Point Pinos, and the harbor of Monterey, Santa Cruz, Catalina Island, including both anchorages, Cuyler's harbor, Prisoner's harbor, San Clemente, Mare Island straits, Trinidad and Humboldt bays, and entrance of the Columbia river. Charts of all these harbors have been furnished and distributed, excepting the harbor of Santa Barbara, which is now in the hands of the engraver. Charts of the coast from Monterey to the mouth of the Columbia river, published two years since, and that from San Diego to San Francisco, are now undergoing the last revision. The charts of the surveys north of the mouth of the Columbia river are daily expected, and will be published as early as practicable. Besides the coast, several of the harbors have been carefully examined. In addition to this, good progress has been made in the survey of the waters of San Francisco bay. A plan of the city has been published, to which will soon be added the adjacent topography. The triangulation embraces the waters of San Francisco and Suisun bays, extending from Mare Island straits to the entrance, and for several miles up and down the coast. The topography has been completed for a chart of San Francisco bay, and the hydrography will be executed the coming winter. The triangulation of the Columbia river has been extended thirty-three miles from its mouth.

A commencement has also been made in the survey of the Santa Barbara Islands, including the land surveys, by the geodetic method. In connection with this rapid progress of the survey on this coast, observations have been made for latitude and longitude, and the magnetic variation. The geographical position of the coast, from the Straits of San Juan de Fuca to San Diego has been established; the latitude and longitude of the most important headlands having been determined by sufficiently numerous and reliable preliminary observations. The latitude of seventeen stations, and the longitude of nineteen stations, and the magnetic variations of seven stations, have been thus determined. On the Atlantic and Gulf coast the usual attention has been given to the same subject. Magnetic observations have been made at thirty-three stations. Sixteen longitude and seventeen latitude stations have been occupied, and ten base lines measured. A great extension has been given to the method of determining the longitudes of cardinal points by using the electric magnetic telegraph—a method admitting of a degree of precision not hitherto attainable by other means. The exploration of the Gulf stream has been continued. Great progress has been made in publishing the results of the survey. Forty-two charts, elaborate and highly finished, and forty-two preliminary charts have already been published, and twenty-seven sheets are in various stages of engraving. The geographical positions determined by the survey from its commencement to July, 1851, have been published. The latitude and longitude of over three thousand two hundred points have thus been given to the public, and furnishing information of great value for general and local purposes. Many special examinations have been made to determine the proper sites for lights, light-boats, beacons and buoys, along the whole coast from Maine to Texas; and, as regards the western coast, the entire duty of selecting sites has devolved upon and been performed by the Coast Survey. It gives me great pleasure to acknowledge the promptitude with which this duty has been performed, and my confidence in the results thus reached.

It has been an arduous and responsible duty, requiring in each case a personal examination, and in many cases accurate surveys of the localities. Much valuable information has also been furnished in connection with the river and harbor improvements, greatly expediting the plans for prosecuting these works, and making available the results of the surveys and the personal examination of the superintendents to this branch of the public service.

In view of the very extensive correspondence which necessarily appertains to such extended and varied operations, it is respectfully recommended that the same authority as to receiving or sending official communications connected with the survey, now exercised by the several bureaus of this Department, may be extended to the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, and to the assistant in charge of the Survey Office, the Superintendent being necessarily absent in the field much of his time. The duties of franking now thrown upon this Department are extremely onerous, while it produces delay incompatible with that prompt dispatch of the business of the Survey always to be desired.

MISCELLANEOUS.

In pursuance of the act of 31st August last, authorizing the formation of a Light-house Board, one officer of engineers of the Army, and one of the Topographical Engineers, two naval officers of high rank, and two civilians of distinguished scientific acquirements, have been designated by the President to form this Board, and one officer of the Navy and one of the Engineers as secretaries. The Board so constituted immediately organized, and entered upon the duties assigned them by law. The clerks employed upon the light-house business being one temporary clerk from the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and four from the Fifth Auditor's bureau, were, as required by law, transferred to the office of the Light-house Board.

The Board has been assiduously engaged in the proper duties assigned it. From the practical knowledge and high professional and scientific attainments combined in the eminent gentlemen comprising it, there is no reason to doubt that all the benefits contemplated by this new organization of that branch of the public service will be fully realized.

A detailed report of the operations of the Board, comprising such changes and improvements in the present system as in its judgment have become necessary, is submitted with the present report.

Under the act of the 31st August last, providing for the construction of not less than six revenue cutters, the Department advertised for proposals for the building of six vessels of designated size and finish. Proposals have accordingly been received, and the contract for the whole number has been awarded to the lowest bidder, under ample security for its faithful execution. The appropriation made will be sufficient for the construction of said vessels, and their perfect equipment for service.

Of the several custom-houses authorized, or in course of construction, that at New Orleans has progressed as fast as circumstances would permit; that at Savannah has been completed and occupied; at Charleston the foundation is progressing with all possible dispatch. Sites have been purchased, and proposals publicly invited for the erection of custom-house buildings at Mobile, Norfolk, Bangor, Louisville, St. Louis, and Cincinnati. Sites have been selected at Bath and Waldoboro', Maine, and Wilmington, in Delaware; and their purchase will be completed when the cession of jurisdiction shall have been obtained from the States in which they are respectively situated, in accordance with the requirements of the joint resolution of September, 1841. A site has been selected for the building authorized at Richmond, Virginia. So much of the appropriation, however, will be absorbed by its purchase that it has been deemed advisable to delay for the present any steps towards the erection of the building, with the view of requesting from Congress an additional appropriation and the removal of the existing restriction as to the amount of expenditure. Contracts have been made for the erection of the custom-house buildings at San Francisco, in California, and Pittsburg, in Pennsylvania; and the buildings will be prosecuted to completion with the utmost possible dispatch. The restrictions imposed upon the Department by limited appropriations in the various acts authorizing the erection of custom-houses and post offices, forbid in many the erection of fire-proof buildings, or the adoption of plans embracing a style or material comparable with many of the local public or private buildings in the same places.

Within these limited appropriations in many cases accommodations must be provided for the custom-house, post office, United States courts, offices for United States marshal, and clerks of the United States courts. The great value of the papers which must necessarily collect within the buildings embracing the above-mentioned offices, demand that every precaution should be taken on the part of the Government to prevent their destruction by fire. Some of the appropriations at the control of the Department have been reduced by the purchase of the necessary site, or were originally so limited as to render it doubtful if the contemplated buildings, with proper accommodations, can be erected without additional appropriations being made. Special communications in relation to some of these will be made to Congress as soon as specific information can be obtained.

The contract for the extension and reorganization of the Baltimore custom-house building has been concluded, in conformity with the act of the last session.

The great distance and consequent difficulty and delay in communicating with Oregon has prevented any definite progress being made in the erection of the proposed building at Astoria.

The operations of the Department arising out of the provisions made for sick and disabled seamen, are becoming daily more onerous and extended.

In consequence of the rapid expansion of our commerce, both foreign and domestic, the funds arising from the monthly contributions of twenty cents from the parties for whose benefit this truly beneficent system has been established, are insufficient for their relief, without the addition of direct appropriations by Congress.

The previous appropriations from the Treasury for the relief of sick seamen have amounted to $969,069 34, besides $928,319 20 for the purchase of sites, the erection of hospital buildings, furniture, repairs, &c.

The Department recommends a continuance of the appropriations for the relief of sick seamen and boatmen, to the needful extent for supplying the deficiency in the amount received from the hospital fund; but it is not at present prepared to advise the erection of more marine hospitals. The experience of the Department induces me to believe that it is in every way preferable to make an arrangement for the care of sick seamen with local hospitals of high standing, which are under the immediate and vigilant supervision of citizens of the highest respectability, at the respective places. Such arrangements exist at New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, and at some other points, at a fixed weekly rate for each seaman, the cost of which is greatly less than it would be in a public hospital, and where the care and attention which the patients receive are fully equal to what they could possibly obtain in a Government institution, and their medical treatment is also under the direction of the most eminent professional talents and experience. In all places where a similar arrangement can be made, I am of opinion it should be preferred, rather than erect other marine hospitals in addition to those already authorized, as I believe both the comfort of the sick, and economy of expenditure, would be promoted by the adoption of the former plan.

Under the system which has been so long and so steadily pursued by the Government as regards this useful, but generally improvident class of men, there is probably no instance where so much relief is granted, and so generally distributed, and with so much advantage to the parties interested, as that by the marine hospital fund under its present regulations.

While the benefit of this fund is extended to almost all the collection districts of the United States, hospitals are completed and in full operation at Chelsea, near Boston, Massachusetts; Norfolk, Virginia; Ocracoke, North Carolina; Cleveland, Ohio; Chicago, Illinois; Pittsburg, Pennsylvania; Louisville and Paducah, Kentucky; Natchez, Mississippi; New Orleans, Louisiana; Mobile, Alabama; and Key West, Florida. Appropriations have been made, and buildings authorized to be erected at Napoleon, Arkansas; St. Louis, Missouri; San Francisco, California; Evansville, Indiana; Portland, Maine, and Vicksburg, Mississippi.

Estimates of appropriations for the completion of the buildings at St. Louis, and for the fencing and heating of buildings, and work necessary for their protection at Chicago, in Illinois; Cleveland, in Ohio; Pittsburg, in Pennsylvania; Louisville, in Kentucky; Paducah, Napoleon, and Natchez, have been submitted.

These estimates are based upon a careful calculation of the amount and quantity of work to be done, and are deemed indispensably necessary for the buildings and grounds referred to.

A contract has been made for the buildings at San Francisco, and those at Napoleon and St. Louis are nearly completed; that at St. Louis has been delayed, awaiting a further appropriation.

A site has been purchased at Evansville, but the balance of the appropriation is not sufficient to erect a suitable building, and an additional appropriation of $20,000 is respectfully submitted.

A site has been selected for an hospital at Portland, Maine, but the Department has not yet taken final action on the report of the commissioners appointed to select it.

The following statements connected with the subject accompany the present report, viz:

Statement T exhibits the whole amount received from the monthly contributions of seamen under the act of 16th July, 1798, up to 1st July, 1852.

Statement U, exhibiting the amount appropriated by Congress for the purchase of sites, erection of marine hospitals, furniture, &c., designating the respective points and the amount of appropriations for each place.

Statement V, exhibiting the present state of the hospital fund arising from the monthly contributions of the seamen, and the appropriations by Congress for their relief.

The Supreme Court, in the case of Lawrence vs. Caswells, decided that no return of duties could be claimed by parties who had not at the time of making the entry entered a written protest declaring specially the grounds on which they objected to pay the duties; and the Department has felt itself bound by that decision, and has since declined to refund any duties alleged to be illegally assessed, except in cases where such written protest was made at the time, or where it evidently arose from a clerical error. This course involves great hardship in many cases where even the same parties, having in certain entries made a regular protest, have received back the duties erroneously assessed, agreeably to legal decisions; whilst in other cases, precisely similar in every respect, but where the formality of a protest was not observed, no return can be made under the above decision of the Supreme Court. I would recommend these cases to the favorable action of Congress, by investing in the Treasury Department the power to return duties in all cases which may be similar to those on which the Supreme Court may have made decisions in favor of the claimants, even if no protest has been made at the time by the parties.

The attention of Congress was called at the last session to the necessity of a law—and one was framed for the purpose but not acted on—to check the multiplicity of suits against the collectors of the customs for duties alleged to be improperly collected, by obliging the same parties to consolidate all their suits of a similar kind in one action; and also where one party had already entered a suit that no others involving the same principle should be instituted, on the Treasury Department agreeing, upon notice from other claimants, that the decision of the suit which may have been already entered, should govern in the settlement of the others. As it now is, the same parties, vexatiously and with the view to increase their costs, will enter separate and numerous suits, all precisely similar in the facts and circumstances.

It is also essential that in all suits against collectors there should be the right of appeal to the Supreme Court without regard to the amount, as there are numerous decisions made in the lower courts, involving important principles, which would probably be reversed, were an appeal granted, but which the amount involved does not admit of an appeal under existing laws.

Congress at its last session having appropriated the sum of $10,000 for locating surf-boats on the coast of the United States, the Department called upon the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for a report showing the points where they could be most advantageously employed for the purpose of saving life and property from shipwreck. This report has lately been received, giving twelve points on the coast of Maine and Massachusetts as suitable locations; and orders will immediately issue for the supplying the same with the requisite boats and their appurtenances; and as soon as other suitable locations along the coast are furnished this Department from the Office of the Coast Survey, measures will be immediately taken for furnishing them likewise. Numerous reports have been made to the Department of the great saving of life and property on our coast by means of these boats; and I would respectfully suggest that a further appropriation of $10,000 be made for this laudable object, and that power be granted this Department to expend, from time to time, such portions of it as may be required to keep the boats and fixtures in repairs for immediate use, and compensate persons for taking care of them.

The subject of the fisheries being one of high importance, and having recently attracted great and general attention, I transmit herewith a highly-interesting and valuable report prepared for this Department by Lorenzo Sabine, Esq., embracing:

1. A report on the fisheries of France, Spain, and Portugal, in the American seas.

2. A report on the fisheries of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Cape Breton, Prince Edward's Island, Magdalen Islands, Bay of Chaleurs, Labrador, and New Brunswick.

3. Report on the fisheries of the United States.

4. Review of the controversy between the United States and Great Britain as to the intent and meaning of the first article of the Convention of 1818.

The following statements accompany the present report, viz:

A. Statement of duties, revenues, and public expenditures, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1852, agreeably to warrants issued, exclusive of trust funds and Treasury notes funded.

B. Statement of duties, revenues, and public expenditures, for the first quarter of the fiscal year, from July 1 to September 30, 1852, agreeably to warrants issued, exclusive of trust funds and Treasury notes funded.

C. Statement of advances from the Treasury on account of the expenses of each custom-house in the United States during the year ending on the 30th June, 1852.

D. Statement of the number of persons employed in each district of the United States, for the collection of customs, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1852, with their occupation and compensation, per act 3d March, 1849.

E. Statement of the public debt on the 1st January, 1853.

F. Statement of the redemption of Treasury notes during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1852.

G. Statement exhibiting the total value of imports, and the imports consumed in the United States, exclusive of specie, during each fiscal year from 1821 to 1852; showing, also, the value of the domestic and foreign exports, exclusive of specie, and the tonnage employed during the same periods.

H. Statement exhibiting the value of imports annually, from 1821 to 1852, designating separately the amount of specie, free and dutiable goods, respectively.

I. Statement exhibiting the value of certain articles imported during the years ending on the 30th of June, 1844, 1845, 1846, 1848, 1849, 1850, 1851, and 1852, (after deducting the reëxportations,) and the amount of duty which accrued on each during the same periods, respectively.

K. Statement exhibiting the amount of coin and bullion imported and exported annually, from 1821 to 1852, inclusive, and also the amount of importation over exportation, and of exportation over importation during the same years.

L. Statement exhibiting the quantity and value of wines, spirits, &c., imported annually, from 1843 to 1852, inclusive; and also showing the foreign cost per gallon under specific and ad valorem duties.

M. Statement showing the value of goods remaining in warehouses at the close of each quarter, from the 30th of September, 1847, to the 30th of June, 1852, as exhibited by the quarterly returns of the collectors of the customs, under the provisions of the act of the 6th of August, 1846; and also the amount of duties payable thereon.

N. Statement exhibiting the value of dutiable merchandise reëxported annually, from 1821 to 1852, inclusive; and showing also the value re-exported from warehouses under the act of August 6, 1846.

O. Statement exhibiting the value of foreign merchandise imported, reëxported, and consumed, annually, from 1821 to 1852, inclusive, and also the estimated population and rate of consumption, per capita, during the same periods.

P. Statement exhibiting the value of merchandise and domestic produce, &c., exported annually from 1821 to 1852.

Q. Statement exhibiting the quantity and value of cotton exported annually, from 1821 to 1852, inclusive, and the average price per pound.

R. Statement exhibiting the aggregate value of breadstuffs and provisions exported annually, from 1821 to 1852.

S. Statement exhibiting the quantity and value of tobacco and rice exported annually, from 1821 to 1852, inclusive.

All of which is respectfully submitted,

THO. CORWIN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. LINN BOYD,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

COLONIZATION IN NORTH AMERICA.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

TUESDAY, January 15, 1853,

On the Resolutions of Mr. CASS, relative to colonization in North America.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the joint resolution declaratory of the views of the United States respecting colonization on the North American continent by European Powers, and respecting the Island of Cuba; which is as follows:

"Be it resolved, &c., That the United States do hereby declare that 'the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European Power.' And while 'existing rights should be respected,' and will be by the United States, they owe it to their own 'safety and interests' 'to announce, as they now do, that no future European colony or dominion shall, with their consent, be planted or established on any part of the North American continent.' And should the attempt be made, they thus deliberately declare that it will be viewed as an act originating in motives regardless of their 'interests and their safety,' and which will leave them free to adopt such measures as an independent nation may justly adopt in defense of its rights and its honor.

"And be it further resolved, That while the United States disclaim any designs upon the Island of Cuba inconsistent with the laws of nations and with their duties to Spain, they consider it due to the vast importance of the subject, to make known, in this solemn manner, that they should view all efforts on the part of any other Power to procure possession, whether peaceably or forcibly, of that island, which, as a naval or military position, must, under circumstances easy to be foreseen, become dangerous to their southern coast, to the Gulf of Mexico, and to the mouth of the Mississippi, as unfriendly acts, directed against them, to be resisted by all the means in their power."

The question pending was on the following amendment offered by Mr. HALE:

"And be it further resolved, That while the United States, in like manner, disclaim any designs upon Canada inconsistent with the laws of nations, and with their duties to Great Britain, they consider it due to the vast importance of the subject to make known, in this solemn manner, that they should view all efforts on the part of any other Power to procure possession, either peaceably or forcibly, of that Province, (which, as a naval or military position, must, under circumstances easy to be foreseen, become dangerous to their northern boundary, and to the lakes,) as unfriendly acts directed against them, to be resisted by all the means in their power."

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, the question of the recolonization of any part of this hemisphere by the European Powers has occupied the attention of the American people for many years, with more or less interest, as passing events seemed to render the effort more or less probable. The general subject, as well as the principles involved in it, has been so often discussed that I do not propose to enter into a very full examination of our rights and condition connected with this important topic, but rather to present the general considerations belonging to it.

Two Presidents of the United States have, by solemn public acts, in their messages to Congress, declared and maintained the principles respecting American exemption from European dominion, which are laid down in the first of the resolutions before us, and have distinctly and satisfactorily established not only our right but our duty to do so, as one of the great elements of our national safety and prosperity. Mr. Monroe, in 1823, said:

"We owe it, therefore, to candor, and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those Powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European Power we have not interfered, and shall not interfere. But with the Governments which have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European Power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States."

Mr. Polk, in the same spirit, in 1845, said:

"The people of the United States cannot, therefore, view with indifference attempts of European Powers to interfere with the independent action of the nations on this continent. The American system of government is entirely different from that of Europe. Jealousy among the different sovereigns of Europe, lest any one of them might become too powerful for the rest, has caused them anxiously to desire the establishment of what they term the 'balance of power.' It cannot be permitted to have any application on the North American continent, and especially to the United States. We must ever maintain the principle, that the people of this continent alone have the right to decide their own destiny. Should any portion of them, constituting an independent State, propose to unite themselves with our Confederacy, this will be a question for them and us to determine, without any foreign interposition. We can never consent that European Powers shall interfere to prevent such a union because it might disturb the 'balance of power' which they may desire to maintain upon this continent. Near a quarter of a century ago, the principle was distinctly announced to the world, in the annual message of one of my predecessors, that 'The American continent, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European Power.' This principle will apply with greatly increased force, should any European Power attempt to establish any new colony in North America."

In some remarks upon this subject in the Senate a few days since, I alluded to, rather than considered, the general grounds upon which this claim of independent action for the nations of the American continent rested for its assertion. I shall not repeat those views, contenting myself with saying that this right of exclusion results from the condition of this continent, and from those general principles of the public law of the world, by which it protects the interests and safety of nations in the varying circumstances in which they may be placed. The history of that code shows that it has a power of adaptation to the advancing conditions of nations, and that rigid inflexibility is not one of its attributes. The changes introduced into it by the discovery of America in the establishment of the principles of occupation and settlement, are familiar to all, and furnish an illustration of this progressive improvement. The right of recolonization would necessarily lead to the renewal, indeed, to the perpetual domination of European Powers, and their colonies, wherever planted, would become parties with the mother countries in all their wars, though far beyond the true sphere of their causes and objects.

We should thus find ourselves in juxtaposition, it might be, and at any rate within the reach of the action of communities, rendered enemies by the disputes, too often frivolous, and almost always indifferent, of nations on the other side of the Atlantic. Such a state of things, bringing wars to our coast, to our inland boundaries even, and interrupting the peaceful and profitable avocations of a whole continent, to gratify the pride or jealousy, or some other equally unworthy passion of ministers or mistresses, where these are the depositaries of power, would be "dangerous to our peace and safety."

But I do not know that the general principle of this claim of exemption is contested. Certainly it cannot be upon any just grounds. Our Executive Government has assumed it upon full consideration, and the history of our negotiations with England, to be found in the interesting account given by Mr. Rush, our able and faithful representative, of his mission to that country, proves beyond doubt, that although the British Ministry were opposed to our anti-colonization doctrine, lest it might interfere with ulterior objects of aggrandizement on their part, yet, they entirely concurred in the application of the principle to the recently-emancipated Spanish Colonies, which in fact, conceded the right of the United States to extend the same policy to any portion of the continent not then actually possessed by a European Power. And Mr. Monroe distinctly announced this fact, saying:

"It is gratifying to know that some of the Powers with whom we enjoy a very friendly intercourse, and to whom these views [concerning the condition of the Spanish-American States] have been communicated, have appeared to acquiesce in them."

When Mr. Canning announced to Mr. Rush that "England could not see the transfer of any portion of them (these same States) to any other Power with indifference," she acted upon considerations much more applicable to our condition than to hers, and which are coextensive with the continent. There is great force in the remark of that eminent British statesman upon our situation and political duties:

"It concerned the United States under aspects and interests as immediate and commanding, as it did or could any of the States of Europe. They were the first Power on that continent, and now confessedly the leading Power. They were connected with Spanish America by their position, as with Europe by their relations. And they also stood connected with these new States by political relations. Was it possible they could see with indifference their fate decided only by Europe? Could Europe expect this indifference? Had not a new epoch arrived in the relative position of the United States towards Europe, which Europe must acknowledge? Were the great political and commercial interests which hung upon the destinies of the new Continent to be canvassed and adjusted in this hemisphere (Europe) without the coöperation or even knowledge of the United States?"

These words of wisdom of one of the most enlightened men of England, commend themselves, by their justice and liberality, to the consideration of every true American, and they are not the less just and liberal because they were urged with a view to induce our Government to become a party to a European Congress for the arrangement of American affairs. It was wise to reject the proposal; it is not less wise to acquiesce in the doctrine which led to it, and to make it ours by its practical enforcement in our own way, as a question of American policy, beyond the just sphere of European interposition. When such statesmen as Mr. Monroe, Mr. Polk, and Mr. Canning, unite in their general views of our rights and duties, those of us who believe in this salutary doctrine, and in the expediency of enforcing it, may well bear the censures, and sneers, and ridicule, and reproach, which our efforts encounter from some, because we go too far, and from others, because we do not go far enough, while the cautious and the timid see in every assertion of national rights and honor, a fearful cloud impending over our country, ready to burst upon us, and sweep away our prosperity, if not our existence.

One third of a century has passed away since these diplomatic discussions, and if our position and circumstances, being the oldest of the family of nations in the western hemisphere, conferred upon us at that time, such rights, accompanied by such duties, how much stronger is the appeal of this policy of continental independence to our earnest attention now, when time has developed our strength and our danger, and when our American interests are primary, and those which connect us with Europe but secondary in importance, and when, from day to day, this disparity is increasing.

This, then, being our settled plan of policy, and having been so announced to the world by two Chief Magistrates of our country, why, it may be asked, does it become necessary for Congress to interpose, and by a legislative declaration, reaffirm it? The nature of our Government furnishes a satisfactory answer to this question. Though there is no doubt but that these Executive declarations were beneficial in their operations, and aided in checking schemes of aggrandizement, which, had they gone on, would have changed the political aspect of the country south of us, and greatly to our injury, still they have not been wholly regarded, as events upon the La Plata and in other regions have practically demonstrated, and occurrences now going on in Central America, and which, from day to day, occupy the earnest attention of the Senate, showing the steps by which the merest shadow of possession becomes a claim, and a claim a title, which carries with it dominion and sovereignty, treaty or no treaty. These occurrences announce that our declared policy of exclusion will be still further disregarded, unless authoritatively reaffirmed in the name of the American people. An experiment is making upon our forbearance, or rather upon our apprehension, and as it is resisted or submitted to, it will be abandoned, or pushed to results which no nation now ventures openly to avow. It is but a few years since, that a principle looking to an American balance of power, was announced by the French Prime Minister, Mr. Guizot, in the Chamber of Deputies, in relation to occurrences at Buenos Ayres, utterly inconsistent with the true American doctrine; and no doubt our own negligence, or rather our timidity, has encouraged this spirit of presumption, and led to the belief that we do not intend to carry out our own principles, and that, therefore, they may be safely disregarded by other nations.

I repeat, that the nature of our Government furnishes a satisfactory solution of this course of foreign policy. The annunciation of our views upon this subject was intended to warn the Powers of Europe of our policy, and thus to prevent the violation of its principle. But upon this, as upon many other occasions, we halted in our course, and did not come up to our work. We did not keep on the line of political knowledge. We should have added the solemnity and the force of a legislative concurrence to these Executive declarations. Such annunciations, when made by the head of a European State, are made authoritatively, because, he who uses them, has the power to enforce them. They become settled maxims of policy, and other nations are aware that they cannot be interfered with, except at the hazard of war. But it is far different here. Great principles of national conduct depend essentially upon public sentiment, and can only be enforced in the last resort by the action of Congress. Public sentiment has, I believe, with almost unexampled unanimity, approved this principle, but Congress has never, by action or declaration, given to it the sanction of its authority. That decisive measure should have been taken when the Executive first promulgated the doctrine. The claim, therefore, has rested barren among our archives, only to bear certain fruit when the Legislature of the Republic adopt as its own.

An able and distinguished Senator from Ohio, now no longer among us, (Mr. Allen,) seeing the importance of this policy, and foreseeing the necessity of making it our own, and respected as such, by a more signal public act, attempted, some six or seven years since, to press the subject on the consideration of Congress, but his exertions, which deserved a better fate, were fruitless, and we compromitted alike our honor and our interests, by shrinking from a responsibility not less noble, in my opinion, than it was important. The Senate, if I recollect aright, refused even to consider the subject. We would not denounce interference, because that would be to interfere. And we should thus be led, but how I know not, into entangling alliances, the bugbear of American politics, which raises its spectral front, whenever it is proposed to take a decided step in our foreign intercourse. This national timidity never did any good, and never will. There are positions in the progress of a people, when firmness is not only wisdom but safety; and one of these we have now reached.

Mr. Monroe, when he first announced this policy, considered the occasion proper for the assertion of "a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved." If the circumstances to which he referred justified this great and untried measure at that day, much more do the circumstances in which we are now placed justify the most solemn declaration of our adherence to it. Some of the independent States of Spanish origin seem to be hastening to dissolution, and almost all of them are weak, unquiet, agitated, and with elements of destruction in more or less active operation.

The most important in extent, in population, and in natural resources, and the one which, from its coterminous position, has the most intimate relations with our peace and interests, is precisely the Power whose fate appears to be the most doubtful. Its internal agitations announce one of those catastrophes, whose consequences are beyond the reach of human sagacity.

It is impossible but that this state of things should have attracted the attention of European statesmen, and have given rise to schemes, more or less matured, for turning the circumstances to the advantage of the two great Powers most likely to interfere, because most interested, and most capable of making their interference felt. We cannot disguise from ourselves that our progress and prospects, while they are a reproach to many of the Governments of the Old World, have excited their enmity by the contrasts they exhibit, and by the dangerous example they offer to the oppressed masses, inviting them to do as we have done, and to become free, as we are free. He who does not know that there is not a Government in Europe, which is a friend to our institutions, has much to learn of the impressions that our past, and present, and probable future, are producing among them. And while we should watch their designs with constant, even with jealous care, it does not become us to magnify either our own danger or their power. I have no fear of a direct attack upon this country. I do not believe that such a project is even among the reveries of the most dreaming statesman now on the stage of action. But what we have to apprehend is plans for arresting our extent and prosperity, the seizure of positions by which we might be annoyed and circumscribed, and the creation of an influence, and of schemes of policy, offering powerful obstacles to our future advancement. Motives have always existed and been in operation for checking our progress, but recent events have added as well to their number as their gravity. We have acquired an extensive territory upon the shores of the great ocean of the west, and our flag waves in the breeze that comes from the islands and continent of Asia.

Think you, Mr. President, there is a maritime nation in Europe which does not desire that every possible obstacle should be interposed in the way of all communication between the eastern and the western portions of this magnificent republican empire? Not one; and Nicaragua routes, and Panama routes, and Tehuantepec routes, and all others, if there are any others, to be used by us, are so many abominations in their eyes, to be tolerated only till they can be closed upon us by the occupation of commanding positions whenever opportunities can be found, or made for seizing them. Considerations of this nature, far more than their intrinsic value, give importance to Honduras, to the Colony of the Bay of Islands, to Sonora, to Chihuahua, and to other points where European intrigues have been at work to obtain possession. All we want is a fair and equal field for exertion, and if we have not industry and enterprise enough to hold our own way in the great career of advancement, we deserve to fall behind our rivals and cotemporaries, and ought to find no one "to do us reverence." But I have no fear of this, nor indeed has any one else. It should, therefore, be a cardinal maxim of our policy, to preserve, as far as we can, the integrity of the cisatlantic Republics, for it is almost as much for their interest as it is for ours, that these great lines of communication should be opened to all the world, and free to the competition of every nation.

There has recently been an attempt to wrest Sonora from the Mexican dominion, which at first attracted some attention in this country; but it has apparently failed, and the effort seems now rather to be ridiculed than condemned. The circumstances connected with the origin of that movement, are obscure, but public rumor at first assigned it indirectly to French agents, made with a view to the extension of the jurisdiction of their country over that region. There are strong reasons for believing that this conjecture was correct, though to what extent those concerned acted from authority, will probably never be known, especially as the result was unfortunate, and such an event generally leaves these secret political agents to meet the consequences of their own responsibility. But it is not a little curious that it was known here that such a movement would be made, before we had any actual information of its occurrence, and it was understood to be under the direction of French interests, and with the design of French acquisition. I received a letter myself, from a quarter I am not at liberty to disclose, some days before we heard of the enterprise, which I mentioned to my colleague and to other gentlemen, foretelling the movement and coupling it with designs of permanent annexation. And a document has since reached this country, which is worthy of our attention, and which goes far to confirm these anticipations. It is a memoir, published recently at Paris, by Mr. Dupasquier de Dommartin, for the purpose of drawing the attention of European Powers, and especially of France, to the purpose of colonizing Sonora and Northern Mexico, as the only means of checking the rapid and formidable growth of the United States, and preventing for ever the acquisition of a railroad from the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean. The writer has devoted himself for some time to the careful study of this subject, has thoroughly explored the region of which he writes, and has laid the foundation for the policy he recommends, by procuring, through the aid of the French Minister in Mexico, large grants of land for the purpose of colonization, from the local authorities of Sonora and Chihuahua.

It is well remarked by the New York Times—to which paper I owe the above extract, as well as the translated memoir—that the fact of the commencement of such a colony, with the open avowal of such a purpose, is, of itself, sufficient to command the prompt attention of the American people and Government. And the interest is increased by the consideration, that such an appeal is thus publicly made for coöperation in the plan; made, too, in the French capital, where no such publication could appear, without the consent of the Government, that a French company obtained exclusive grants in Sonora; and that an attempt has been made to wrest that region by arms from Mexico. All these may, by possibility, be accidental coincidences, and not coöperating causes; but the suggestion requires a good deal of national charity, before it can become even credible. I wish there was time to lay this memoir before the Senate, for it is a very significant document, advocating the very policy from which we have most to fear in all our foreign relations. But I must confine myself to a very general summary of it. The writer adverts to our commercial interests, and to their extension; to our object to obtain absolute command of the commerce of the world, and to the certainty with which our projects of aggrandizement will be effected, from the wonderful progress we are making, and shall make, unless Europe interferes to prevent it. He then considers the condition of Mexico, with a view to show, that from her state of weakness and division, she will fall a prey to the grasping rapacity of the United States, unless saved by European colonization. He also gives a narrative of his explorations in Mexico, and of his efforts to lay the foundation for carrying his designs into effect. This brief abstract must suffice for the general purpose I have in view. I shall add to it the summary made by the author himself. He says:

"From the preceding there result two facts: First, that Mexico possesses the key of the Northern Continent, of the Atlantic and the Pacific, by land and by these two seas, of all the commerce which is carried on there. Second, that the existence of Mexico, pressed on all parts by the United States, hangs only by a thread."

"The whole question is now reduced to knowing if Europe will permit the United States to obtain so much power."

A French periodical, of high and established character, The Annuaire des Deux Mondes, for 1852, has some remarks strongly corroborative of the importance of the suggestions of Mr. Dupasquier de Dommartin. "Some attempts," says that journal, "to afford a remedy for Mexican difficulties, have meantime been recently made. We mention the commencement of the colonization of the State of Sonora, which has been greatly aided by the French Minister." He who supposes that a French diplomatic agent would take such a step, without the instructions of his Government, knows nothing of that punctilious sentiment of duty which animates his corps, and little of the responsibility he would encounter. "Three hundred Frenchmen," says our authority, "collected from different parts of the Republic, are already settled upon the lands granted by the Government. Within a few years, a Frenchman, Mr. Dupasquier de Dommartin, has shown a lively interest in the projects of colonization." * * * "This," the adoption of his plans, "will be the surest dyke against the usurpation of the American race." * * * * * * * "There is also involved the great interest of England for Europe, in not allowing to be accomplished, in spite of her, perhaps against her, and to her detriment, this new dismemberment of the Spanish-American Empire." The Courrier des Etats-Unis, published at New York, the well-known organ of the French Government in this country, in an article, a few days since, made a very pregnant allusion, whether carelessly or carefully I know not, but certainly well worthy of attention: "As yet," says the Courrier, "France has not set her foot on the American continent. We may fear what she will do, we admit, but in good faith she does not yet merit the least crimination." This is honest enough, indeed, whether intended as a prophecy or as a warning. It may be that it will be found expedient to irradiate the new empire with the luster of conquest; and it also may be, that the great augmentation of the French Navy is connected with the designs upon this continent, so distinctly portrayed in the quotations I have made. Nothing is lost by a provident forecast.

Now, it can hardly be doubted by any man who is familiar with the course of European interposition, that if the effort just made to overthrow the Mexican Government in Sonora had succeeded, ere long the country would have passed into the possession of France, unless prevented by our remonstrances, or by armed intervention. As it failed, we shall not know its true history until we read it in another attempt, and perhaps a successful one. That, however, will not be made, if we are true to ourselves, by announcing and continuing to manifest a determination to resist it, or any similar scheme of European aggrandizement.

It is obvious, from the foregoing recapitulation, that our policy and purposes are attracting the attention of Europe; and whatever difference of opinion may prevail respecting the true origin and objects of the recent movements in Sonora, it is equally obvious that we may look for similar explosions, from time to time, with results far more injurious to us, unless anticipated and prevented by a prompt, bold, and decisive declaration, made to be enforced with all our power, should circumstances be grave enough to require us to put forth our whole strength.

If, then, we have a right to insist upon this principle of American exemption, and if the condition of things, here and elsewhere, may render the exercise of this right essential to our interest and our safety, and, still more, if the original annunciation of the doctrine meet, as it unquestionably does, the general approbation of the country, what objection can there be to its reaffirmation by Congress, the depository of so much of the power of the American people? Why this course is rendered necessary, I have already explained, and have shown that the time which has intervened since its first proclamation, and the circumstances, which have almost reduced it to a dead letter, have produced the impression, which evidently prevails in Europe, that we are not prepared to enforce it, as the war-making authority has refused or neglected to sanction it—why, I repeat, withhold this action, and leave us thereby to encourage untoward events, which due firmness, on our part, might anticipate, and would probably prevent? The decree stands recorded in the history of our Executive acts. It is essential to its vitality, that it should now take its place in the acts of the Legislative Department. Why not? Do you mean to leave it without effect, and abandon it to its fate, and not even attempt to enforce it? If so, it would be much more honorable to repeal it. Or do you desire its efficient action in great exigencies, which may come, probably, indeed, will come, for if you do, you must fortify it by the declaration of your zealous concurrence, and, if need be, your powerful coöperation. Or are we afraid to speak out boldly, plainly, as becomes the American people, trusting to the miserable policy of expedients, instead of asserting our rights and our determination to maintain them? It may be consoling to observe, at least for those who need the consolation, that a legislative declaration would, to say the least of it, have a strong tendency to prevent attempts, which, without such an imposing measure, would doubtless be made; for assuredly a contest with the United States for the acquisition of territory in North America, the very seat of our power, would not be hazarded without very powerful considerations, which it is difficult to foresee, in the face of the exertions of this country, putting forth all its strength.

So much for this project of reconverting the American continent into European colonies, and for the position it is our duty to assume and maintain in relation to it. And now for the second resolution, which looks to the present and the future of the Island of Cuba.

But before proceeding to the consideration of it, it is proper to remark, that its form has provoked a good deal of animadversion and some opposition, because the desire of the United States to purchase Cuba is not distinctly announced upon this occasion. Mr. President, it is an occasion which is not appropriate to such a declaration. Our present purpose, in this appeal to the world, is to announce our policy, should any other nation attempt to obtain possession, by the consent or without the consent of Spain, and in the conviction that such a solemn procedure will have a tendency to prevent designs which might otherwise be undertaken. But our purchase of Cuba is a question between us and Spain, and requires no public annunciation to other nations, and to make it, would be a sacrifice of our own self-respect.

So far as respects my own personal views, these I have already explained to the Senate. I desire the possession of Cuba, earnestly desire it, whenever we can justly obtain it, and the sooner that time comes the better; for then will be finally settled one of the most delicate questions—the most delicate, perhaps, in our foreign policy, always liable to embarrass us by grave conjunctures more easily to be seen than to be guarded against. As to the means, though, as I have already said, I am prepared to advocate its purchase, even at the most liberal price. Still, I should prefer its acquisition by the action of the people of Cuba—and a noble tribute it would be to our institutions—in the exercise of their power as an independent nation, could they succeed by any arrangement with Spain in procuring her recognition of that condition, or should they be able and prepared to establish their right to a place in the family of nations.

There are two questions involved in this subject of Cuba: one of right, the other of expediency. Whether we can do anything justly, and if we can, what and how much we ought to do. This great measure of policy, connected with the destiny of that important insular position, has long occupied the attention of the American people, and the considerations bearing upon it have been so often and so elaborately presented, that I shall confine my present remarks within the narrowest compass which the gravity of the inquiry will permit. We are all aware of the recent circumstances which have attracted and arrested public attention; and though the crisis they appeared to foreshadow has passed away, still there are elements of difficulty arising out of the uncertain condition of the Spanish monarchy, both metropolitan and colonial, which must be in active operation, ever liable to produce results gravely affecting our vital interests.

The right of one country to occupy or control portions of the possessions of another, is deducible from the great law of self-defense, which is as applicable to communities as to individuals. There are many instances in modern history of the application of this doctrine, and the code which regulates the intercourse of nations, and which adapts itself to the existing circumstances of the world, recognizes this power of self-preservation. Like other human pretensions, this is liable to abuse, and has been greatly abused in Europe, and especially by the usurpations, arising out of the balance of power—a principle avowedly introduced for the protection of the weak against the strong, but practically perverted to make the strong more powerful, and the weak more dependent. A nation, feeling the responsibility of its conduct towards God and man, and sensible of its own duties, should take care, when driven to avert danger by anticipating it, that it does not mistake a spirit of aggrandizement for the just claims of self-defense, and seize the fleet of a friendly Power, a Danish fleet, for example, as a mere instrument of maritime supremacy.

The true principle is well laid down in our own legislative history, and was announced in the resolution of Congress of March 3d, 1811, which declared:

"Taking into view the peculiar situation of Spain, and of her American provinces, and considering the influence which the destiny of the territory adjoining the southern border of the United States may have upon their security, tranquillity, and commerce: Therefore

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States, under the peculiar circumstances of the existing crisis, cannot, without serious inquietude, see any part of the said territory pass into the hands of any foreign Power, and that a due regard to their own safety compels them to provide, under certain contingencies, for the temporary occupation of the said territory. They at the same time declare, that the said territory shall, in their hands, remain subject to future negotiations."

And in the act of Congress, passed on the same day, for the purpose of carrying this declaratory resolution into effect, it is provided that the President "be authorized to take possession of the country east of the Perdido river, and south of the State of Georgia and of the Mississippi Territory," among other events, in case it should be delivered up by the local authority, "or in the event of an attempt to occupy the said Territory by any foreign Government."

This is our doctrine and our policy, and the very proposition of the French and British Governments to our own, to regulate, by a tripartite treaty, without the participation of Spain, the future condition of Cuba, is itself a concession of the right to direct and control peculiar positions upon whose fate important interests depend.

Does the Island of Cuba present those paramount considerations connected with our safety and prosperity, which justify the United States in the exercise of a vigilant supervision over its destiny, and in the adoption of decisive measures for its possession, should any other nation seek to obtain it by force or by purchase? The importance of the question, rather than any difficulty in its solution, deserves a passing consideration, and in referring to it, I must repeat views I have heretofore presented to the Senate upon this subject.

The Gulf of Mexico is the reservoir of the great river of the North American continent, whose importance it is as difficult to realize, as it is the value of the country which must seek an outlet to the ocean through its waters. That country is nearly equal to all Europe in extent, embracing twenty-five degrees of latitude, and thirty-five of longitude upon the great circles of the globe. This vast basin extends from the summit of the Alleghany to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, and its population now equals eight millions. The man yet lives, who was living when almost the first tree fell before the woodsman's stroke in this great domain; and the man is now living, who will live to see it contain one hundred millions of people. Already the hardy western pioneer has crossed the barrier of the Rocky Mountains, and the forest is giving way before human industry upon the very shores that look out upon China and Japan. The Mississippi is the great artery of this region; which, drawing its supplies from the fountains at the north, pours them into the ocean under a tropical sun, and drains, in its own course, and in the course of its mighty tributaries—tributaries in name, but equals and rivals in fact—the most magnificent empire which God, in his providence, has ever given to man to reclaim and enjoy. I have myself descended that great stream two thousand miles in a birch canoe, admiring the country through which it passes in a state of nature, and lost in the contemplation of what that country is to be when subdued by human industry. The statistics of such a region, in years to come, is a subject too vast for calculation. Its extent, fertility, salubrity, means of internal navigation, and the character of the people who will inhabit it, baffle all efforts to estimate its productiveness, the tribute which its industry will pay to the wants of the world, and the supplies which the comfort and habits of its people may require.

During the palmy days of Napoleon, it is said that one of his projects was to convert the Mediterranean into a French lake. England has nearly done what defied the power and ambition of the Great Conqueror. She has almost converted it into an English lake, in time of war. Gibraltar commands its entrance, Malta the channel between Sicily and Africa, and the Ionian Islands the waters of the Levant. There were good reasons for believing, a short time since, that England was seeking to obtain a cession of the Island of Crete, the ancient kingdom of Minos, which would give her the port of Canea, that I found one of the most magnificent harbors in the world, equally capacious and secure. If England, in the pursuit of the same system, should acquire similar commanding positions on the Gulf of Mexico, that great reservoir would become a mare clausum, and no keel would plow it, nor canvas whiten it in time of war, but by her permission. Now, sir, looking to the extent of our coast in that direction; to the productions which must pass there to seek a market; to the nature of our population; and to the effect upon all these, which a permanent naval superiority would produce—where is the American who is not prepared to adopt any measures to avert such a calamitous state of things? Who can fail to see the nature of the predatory warfare which England would carry on in all times of hostilities, from her various positions, which would encircle the Gulf, from the Bahamas to Cuba and to Yucatan? And who, also, can fail to see, that even in time of peace, her many harbors would become places of refuge for a certain class of our population, and that perpetual collisions would occur, involving the peace of the two countries?

The Gulf of Mexico, sir, must be practically an American lake, for the great purpose of security, not to exclude other nations from its enjoyment, but to prevent any dominant Power, with foreign or remote interests, from controlling its navigation. It becomes us to look our difficulties in the face. Nothing is gained by blinking a great question. Prudent statesmen should survey it, and as far as may be, provide for it. We have, indeed, no Mount Carmel, like that of Judea, nor prophet to ascend it, and to warn us against a coming storm. But the home of every citizen is a Mount Carmel for us, whence we can survey the approaching cloud, even when no bigger than a man's hand, which threatens to overspread the political atmosphere, and to burst in danger upon his country.

So long as Cuba is held by its present possessors, neither we nor the commercial world have anything to fear from the projects of England or France; for the latter country also has its schemes of territorial and mercantile aggrandizement, as is apparent from the considerations I have already presented to the Senate. Spain is not now in a condition, and in all human probability never can be, seriously to annoy us, even if she had the disposition, and we may well rely upon her want of power and her want of will, and rest satisfied that her most precious dependency, the Queen of the Antilles, will not be hazarded by converting it into a military and naval arsenal for interrupting and seizing our commerce and devastating our coasts. But let the dominion be transferred to England or France, and where are we? The mouth of our great river might be hermetically closed, and the most disastrous injuries inflicted upon us. I need not pursue these considerations further, for he who is incredulous to their force, would not be driven from his incredulity by any effort of mine.

Such being the intimate relations between this island-fortress and our safety and prosperity, are there such indications of danger as to call upon a provident nation to decide upon its course promptly, and to pursue it inflexibly? The signs upon this subject are neither few nor doubtful. I am not going to review them. But no man of ordinary sagacity, looking to the acknowledged policy of France and England, can question the desire of both of them to acquire this commanding position. And a characteristic incident occurred not long since in the House of Commons, which shows the views of British statesmen upon this subject. Lord George Bentinck, one of the most distinguished public men of England, and then the Tory leader in the Commons, in a discussion which took place there, said:

"He had read in the Times an extract from a United States paper, in which it was stated, that if the United States did not possess herself of Cuba, Great Britain would, and that England had a greater claim, by one hundred fold, to Cuba than the United States had to Mexico, because a sum of £45,000,000 was due to British subjects, and Cuba was hypothecated for the debt, &c., &c. He would therefore say at once, let them (the British) take possession of Cuba, and settle the question altogether. Let them distrain upon it for the just debt due—and too long in vain—from the Spanish Government."

And then comes the true key to the English heart:

"Then depend upon it," continued the speaker, "when Great Britain possessed the Havana, as once she did in 1762, when she held it for about a year, and then exchanged it for the Floridas, and WHEN SHE COULD CUT THE TRADE OF AMERICA in two, no more boasts would be heard of what the United States could do," &c.

The importance of Cuba to our interest seems to be pretty well appreciated in the halls of British legislation. This last candid avowal of a design and a desire to cut in twain the commerce along our southern coasts, would find its proper place in a precious article published some years since in Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine, entitled "A War with the United States a Blessing to Mankind," filled with some of the most cold-blooded suggestions that ever marked even that notorious receptacle of vile slanders against this country. The present security of Cuba from European interference, independent of our position, is to be found in the jealousy of France and England. And could this be removed by any scheme of partition, the mortgage would be foreclosed, for France also has a similar lien, and the property transferred as soon as the process could be completed. And we are reminded, in the recent correspondence between Mr. Everett and the Ministers of France and England, on the subject of the proposed tripartite treaty, suggestively or significantly, as may be, that the hypothecation is yet in full force as "British and French subjects, as well as the French Government are, on different accounts, creditors of Spain for large sums of money." How soon the creditors may distrain, in the language of Lord George Bentinck, may depend upon our course. I am satisfied they will resort to no such remedy, should we keep on Mr. Canning's line of political knowledge, and say, if you touch the island, that act will be a declaration of war against the United States.

Besides, no man can look at the aspect of Europe without feeling assured that, from day to day, collisions may arise between nations, and internal convulsions may shake the very frame of society. And wars may thus break out, extending their effects through the globe. The Spanish monarchy, it may be, is incapable of rejuvenation; I do not know how that may be, and I leave it to a wiser or to a rasher man than I am to speak confidently. But certainly that kingdom is marked with the signs of some approaching catastrophe. If the new French Empire follows the traditions, as it inherits the name and institutions of the old, which rose and fell with its founder, the greatest name, in my opinion, in modern, if not in ancient European history, it will soon make itself felt in the Hesperian Peninsula, and become the arbiter of its fate. To rely, as some profess to do, upon the security which the present state of things in Europe gives to the Spanish dominion in Cuba, is to neglect the most obvious dictates of policy, and to abandon an object of vast importance to the mere chance of events.

The correspondence to which I have just alluded gives rise to some serious reflections. Before adverting to these, however, I desire to express my warm approbation of the letter of Mr. Everett. It is worthy of his character, and it is marked by a lofty patriotic American feeling. I have seldom seen a document more conclusive in its argument, or more beautiful in its style or illustrations. If it had announced openly that we desire to purchase Cuba—and that declaration would have been appropriate to the occasion—I should have given to it almost my unqualified adhesion; but even with that omission, I feel proud of it, as an American State paper.

And I thank Mr. Everett for the reproof, or retort, be it one or the other, caustic, though a little reserved, as became his position, but plain enough withal, which he administered to his diplomatic correspondents on the subject of our territorial acquisitions, compared with those of France and England. If there is one chapter in the whole history of human hypocrisy, from the time of the parable of the Pharisee, who thanked God he was not as other men, and especially as that Publican, down to the last diatribe against the grasping propensity of the United States, more remarkable than any other for its inconsistency, it is that which records the boasts of European self-disinterestedness, compared with that PUBLICAN on the western side of the Atlantic, who covets all he sees, and snatches all he can. Mr. Everett's defense of the history of our acquisitions is unanswerable, as well with relation to the means by which they were obtained, as to the meliorations resulting from them. Truly has he said, "Every addition to the territory of the American 'Union has given homes to European destitution 'and gardens to European want." And he might have added, with equal truth, freedom and the rights of man to European vassalage. He says, rather slyly, that the extensive accessions made to French and English dominion, "have created no uneasiness in the United States," and that "probably," he speaks with diplomatic doubt, "probably" our accessions of territory, while following the example set us, "caused no uneasiness to the great European Powers." Well done, Mr. Everett! well done! Addison could not have managed this retort with drier humor, nor in a happier vein of irony.

But to return to my remark, that this correspondence gives rise to some serious reflections. Why was this proposition for a tripartite treaty submitted to the United States? Not with the slightest belief that it would be accepted. There was not a member of the French or of the British Cabinet, who did not know as well before the project was referred to us as after, that the offer would be peremptorily rejected. They all understand our principles and our policy. They knew we were opposed to these "entangling alliances," for these are truly so; and they knew our views with respect to Cuba, and that we would not sacrifice our permanent interests to any such scheme.

Then why this solemn farce of an invitation to do what it was known we would not do? Well, sir, there is but one rational answer to this inquiry. Those two Governments are able to say to us, now and hereafter, we shall take our own course with respect to Cuba. We have asked your participation in the measures necessary for its security, and you have declined to join us. We are free to act as we please. We have given you warning that we do not recognize your right to acquire that island, and that we shall "discountenance" all efforts that you may make to obtain possession of it. This declaration is explicitly made by the French Government, and the same view is easily deducible from the letter of Mr. Crampton, where he speaks of there being something equivocal in the declaration of the United States in consequence of the "juxtaposition" of the words "European" and "Power," and inviting a plain disavowal of our intention ever to obtain possession of Cuba. This, of course, he neither got, nor expected to get.

Thus, then, stands this matter: France and England have assumed the right to decide upon the destiny of Cuba, and have asked the concurrence of the United States in their proposed arrangements. This has been declined, and the two Powers, upon their own principles, are free to regulate the whole subject, so far as they can agree in their policy. If they cannot do that, each of them will probably await the chapter of accidents, protesting or seizing, as one or the other may be in the ascendant—provided, however, that we sit still and philanthropically cry peace, peace, when there is no peace.

Now, sir, I have endeavored to shew why these resolutions should pass. I have endeavored to show both our right and our duty to adopt them, and also that their adoption would have a powerful operation in checking projects of aggrandizement, which, without our influence, will go on to their consummation. I do not presume to say that this solemn proceeding alone will, under all circumstances, secure our immunity from these dangers. But I do say, it will be heard, and not unheeded; and projects which, without it, would be, and perhaps promptly, carried into effect, will be, if not abandoned, at least delayed, till a more convenient OPPORTUNITY—which will come when pusillanimity guides the councils of our country, and not till then. Why, then, not say what we mean, and do as we say? Gentlemen opposed to this course, while they avow their indisposition to act, acknowledge, also, that our policy must be enforced by war, if necessary, should the effort be made to thwart it and to endanger our safety.

A highly estimable member of the House of Representatives, for whom I have much regard, has recently remarked that "he was not willing to sustain the resolution." "He was opposed to serving a John Doe and Richard Roe notice to the world," though he avowed his determination to act by force if European colonization should be attempted, or if there should be danger of any maritime nation taking Cuba. Then why not say so? The declaration may do good, and can do no harm. No American, Mr. President, has the right to undervalue his country, by saying that the avowal of a firm resolution on her part to resist an unjust policy, deeply affecting us, will be received in Europe with indifference, or lightly regarded. No, it is not so; and without the fear of any imputation of self-exaltation, we may influence by a higher standard than that. If, indeed, we do nothing, by our own differences and discussions, to cast suspicion upon our ultimate course, leading the politicians of Europe to believe, that when the trial comes, the record containing our words will never be inscribed with our deeds; far better is it to do nothing, than thus prove recreant. I repeat, sir, why not say, in good faith, what in good faith we mean? These annunciations to the world of a fixed course of policy, in certain contingencies, to be foreseen or apprehended, are common occurrences in the intercourse of nations, and therefore to be decided on, under existing circumstances. Why not serve a John Doe and Richard Roe notice to the world? Passing by the sneer, in which I join, upon the clumsy contrivances of the common law, by puerile fictions to do indirectly what should be done directly, and looking to the object and not to any form of expression, even though rendered unpalatable by its associations; the serving of that notice is precisely what we may do, as a just nation; what we ought to do, as a wise nation; and what it becomes us to do, as a frank and republican nation.

Did not our fathers issue a John Doe and Richard Roe notice to the world, on the fourth day of July, 1776, when we assumed a place among its independent communities; and did they not then announce certain great principles as fundamental articles of our political faith? And did not the Emperor of Russia, but the other day, issue also his John Doe and Richard Roe notice, in the form of a Muscovite decree, proclaiming to Christendom that nations should not be independent, contrary to his pleasure?—for such is the meaning of that memorable State paper, when divested of its diplomatic redundancy. And is not modern history full of these declarations, more or less just or unjust, as well as more or less grave, down to the blockading of a port even, which is made known by the same process?

So much for these two old pillars of the common law, thus converted into pillars of the public law of the world. And I take this occasion to add, that I saw with dismay, that these two reverened personages had been recently put to death by the British Parliament!—the most prominent event in human progress that has occurred in my day! The old dry bones are really beginning to shake. I have no doubt, but that this irreparable loss has been sincerely deplored, as well in England, as in this country, by many a devout believer in the doctrine that all changes are changes for the worse; and that unless a head is covered with a horse-hair wig, whatever may be inside, the outside renders the man utterly unfit for a judicial station.

"Oh, the virtue of horse hair!" said the waggish Progressivists of the Edinburgh Review.

But, sir, these resolutions, or equivalent ones, embodying the same principles, will pass the Legislature of the United States. Their passage is but a question of time. They may fail to-day, and they may fail again. Timidity or immobility may overrule that firm sagacity which befits our condition. It is just as certain that these principles themselves will be permanently ingrafted into the American policy, and in the most imposing form, as it is that they are now ingrafted in the hearts of the American people.

My friend, the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] said the other day, with that ex cathedra manner which distinguishes his vaticinations, not always remarkable for their fulfillment, that we should back out of this declaration, if made, as we always do. The sentiment is not very patriotic, nor is the assertion correct; nor, indeed, is it redeemed by the charm of novelty. I heard the same taunt in 1812, though in different terms. The phrase then was, and it was daily heard from our political opponents, that the country could not be kicked into a war. Well, sir, we went to war, notwithstanding, and came out of it without backing. And he who thinks we shall not, and urges that as a reason for submission to national degradation, knows little of the resolution of his countrymen, when the hour of trial comes. There is one redeeming and encouraging feature of our public character in all these contests between standing still and going on, and that is, that the national feeling, in all grave conjunctures, has always gone ahead of the Congressional feeling. I know of no exception; the latter pants after the former, but not entirely in vain. And it is best it should be so. The public instinct and judgment are right, and are animated with an ever active love of country, which feels its way and follows it, turning neither to the right hand nor to the left.

Mr. President, I am not going over the old ground of our manifest destiny, and the mission we have to fulfill, and other similar phrases, expletives, if you please, adopted into our political vocabulary, and which have provoked more criticism than they merit, and been assigned more importance than they are entitled to. I take it, they are all merely indicative of a strong impression of the mighty career that is before us, and of the duties and responsibilities it brings with it, as well towards ourselves as the world. However these may be magnified or depressed, they cannot be avoided; and that past which alone foreshadows the future, is filled with the most startling proofs of national progress, which have ever arrested the attention of mankind.

The generation has not yet wholly passed away since we were a peaceful dependency of England, and he who, by the kindness of Providence and the favor of his fellow-citizens, is now permitted to address you, was born before the final acknowledgment of our independence by the parent country. A narrow strip of sea-coast, and a scattered population short of three millions, who were hardly permitted, as it has been said, in illustration rather than in assertion, to make a horseshoe nail for themselves, divided into separate colonies, and almost unknown, with some profitable rather than patriotic anticipations at home, as England was then called, that these possessions might be useful for the purpose of taxation. Such was our condition about the commencement of our revolutionary struggle, and at its close we found ourselves exhausted by the exertions we had made, and without internal trade, without external commerce, and, in fact, without a government for the protection of social order or the prevention of foreign aggression; and, indeed, the institutions of the country were maintained by the character of the people, and not by political organization. The seventy years which have since passed away have more than quadrupled the area of our territory, have increased our population eightfold, and have added to our productive industry, to our commerce and navigation, to our revenue and resources, and to all the other elements of power and prosperity in a still greater ratio, while they have given us a Government and institutions as free as is compatible with the preservation of order, and have placed us among the great Powers of the earth, with none to make us afraid. And at the same time our intellectual improvement has kept pace with our material advancement, and our whole progress is without example in the history of nations.

Now, sir, in this state of things, let no man despair of the future. Let no one fear that his country will not, sooner or later, come up to her proper work, without presumption, but without hesitation. Our progress is from day to day, but the steps which mark our career before the world are the decennial periods, when the "numbering of the people" discloses results surprising even to ourselves, and almost incredible to the other nations of Christendom. Eight of these I have lived to see, and the gigantic strides they mark indicate a future which is almost appalling to the imagination. If this magnificent destiny, even now so gratifying to national pride, but in prospect so boundless in its power for evil or for good, brings with it causes of gratulation for every true American, it brings also grave responsibilities, which cannot be evaded, and ought not to be neglected.

It is thus we have a mission to fulfill, in the example we may offer, and in all just efforts to promote the extension of freedom, the advancement of knowledge, and the establishment of all the great principles on which public and private prosperity depends.

In looking back upon our progress from infancy to maturity, it is obvious that we have submitted to much that was unjust and contumelious, because we had not strength to resist, as we should now do, pretensions not less remarkable for their injustice than for the presumption and pertinacity with which they were urged. We had true patriots in those days of weakness to guide and counsel us, and well did they fulfill their trust. But we had to bear much, because we could forbear when we could not avert or avenge.

But old things have passed away, and with the power has come the determination of the American people to protect their interests and their honor wherever and whenever and however these may be assailed. Why, sir, it is difficult even for this generation to believe, and to the next it would appear perfectly incredible, unless established by the irrefragable evidence of public records, that for twenty years we seriously argued with England, in labored diplomatic notes, whether her naval officers had a right to enter and search our vessels, wherever these might be met on the ocean, and to take thence, at their mere will, any person they might find, and consign him to that worst of slavery, the slavery of unlimited service on board a hostile ship to fight against his own country. Well, sir, we have exhausted that argument, and shall supply its place by other means. We have got far beyond discussion, and the first man impressed from an American vessel by a British officer, whose act is recognized by his Government, will be the signal of war. Nor shall we ever again discuss the legality of Berlin and Milan decrees, and all the other schemes of rapacity by which neutral property was stolen during the terrible contests arising out of the French Revolution —schemes which were defended, in elaborate State papers, upon a highwayman's plea, that he robs you because you have been, or will be robbed, by some one else. All this, too, is with the things that have been. And think you, sir, that the time will ever return when a third of the territorial extent of one of the States of this Union will be ceded upon such pretexts as those which dismembered the State of Maine? Never, in my opinion, was there a public claim urged upon grounds so utterly indefensible as that; but we yielded, and now let us make the best of it, and acquiring resolution as we acquire strength, let us do just what is right—and demand it from others. That is our true policy, and as it is right that we should exercise the same authority as the other Powers of the world, our coequals only in position, in the declaration of great principles of international law, the true sentiment of self-respect will teach us, ere long, to maintain its inviolability when threatened with dangerous innovations, hostile to the freedom and independence of nations, by the same solemn and authoritative procedure as that which announces its peril. If we choose that our Chief Magistrate should wear a hat, and not a crown, we desire it to be understood that we are just as jealous of our rights and honor, and have just as much of both, as the gaudiest monarch of them all.

We committed a great error, not a fatal one—that it would be difficult to do in our condition of elasticity—when, last session, we refused to pass a declaration denying to the Emperor of Russia, the authority he had assumed, to act the part of universal legislator, and to impress his own will upon the code of the public law of mankind, prostrating with his pen, preparatory to prostrating with his sword, all the barriers that protect the political rights of nations. Well, we shrunk also from this high duty. We got alarmed at the shadow of something—I do not know precisely what, whether Russian ukases, or "entangling alliances"—and left the Czar to pass his own law, and to enforce it too. And hereafter, when the occasion comes,—and it will come, for power, like the daughters of the horse-leech, always cries Give! Give!—he will be able to quote his own precedent, submitted to in both hemispheres, and seek to regulate the whole subject of international communication, and of national rights by a ukase, as he regulates the lives and fortunes of the sixty millions of people who call him lord and master. In brief time we shall abjure all this, as well our own subservience, as his presumption, and assume our place in the great legislative council of nations.

We have evidently reached one of those epochs in the career of nations to which the historian of their decline and fall looks back, in his searching investigation, into the causes of their fate. Our duties are plain, noble indeed, and our position invites us to fulfill them, firmly and fearlessly. The progress and improvement in all the great branches of human industry, and especially in those which relate to the intercommunication of nations, and to the benefit that each may derive from all by the interchange, as well of knowledge as of material products, have brought the human family more closely into contact than at any former period, and have opened interests which, if not new, have become much more powerful in their extent and operation, and which give some degree of unity to the public feeling of the world. We cannot withdraw from this great association. We cannot isolate ourselves from the common sentiment of the age, nor ought we to do so, if we could. Our place is assigned to us by events almost beyond our control, and as we fill it, worthily or unworthily, the judgment of the future will pronounce us the inheritors of the spirit, as we have been of the labors and sacrifices, of the men of the Revolution, or craven descendants, false to their principles, as to our own honor. I am well aware, Mr. President, that such views expose a man to a great deal of obloquy in this country. I have experienced all that, in common with many others. But neither the advent, nor the apprehension of it, has deterred me at much earlier periods of life, and certainly will not deter me now, when that life is fast drawing to a close, from the expression of an earnest hope that the American name and fame will be maintained by the American people with the brightness of true glory, undiminished by the neglect of a single deed, or the commission of a single deed, which national honor may require we should do, or leave undone.

There are men, American citizens even, who cannot appreciate sentiments like these—who disbelieve in their existence, and who deride and denounce all those who avow them as demagogues —that is the term—and which, when truly translated from our party vocabulary into old-fashioned English, means all who differ in great measures from these standards of faith, and advocate them, even though they are acceptable to the people—a fatal error, indeed, in a country like this. I saw the other day a specimen of this exclusive patriotism, which rails at all it does not accept, in a Buffalo paper, the Commercial Advertiser, which, from its near relation to the present Administration, I should have thought would have tried to elevate itself above this tone of affected moderation, but of real subserviency, and which deprecates all these efforts to resist European encroachment, talks of the ghost of the Monroe doctrine, and of palpable absurdities introduced into the Senate with owl-like wisdom, and in a spirit of demagogism, and of the equality of the rights of European monarchs with the United States upon this continent, and much more of the same sort, little suited to the banks of the Niagara, but which would find its proper home upon the banks of the Thames, as would he who cherishes and utters such anti-American sentiments. But time will bring its cure for this Anglo mania, and when the patient once recovers, he wonders how he ever caught the disorder.

I have seen a great deal of this political perversity, this unpatriotic predisposition which prompts many men always to take part against their country, whatever be the position in which she is placed. I do not recollect a single controversy in which we have been involved with a foreign Power, since I have been on the stage of action, when the whole sentiment of the country was united in the cause of the country. I doubt if there is another people on the face of the globe whose history presents so many instances of this want of true national pride, patriotism rather, as our own. Whether it results from any peculiar political idiosyncracy I know not; or whether our party feelings are so strong that we are blinded by them, and led, in their vehemence, to think that all is wrong our opponents do; or it may be, at any rate, so far as England is concerned, that some of the old colonial leaven remains, which leavens much of the lump. Be it one or the other, or whatever else, the deplorable consequence is certain, and the sentiment of Decatur, not less noble than just, "Our country right or wrong," which, being truly understood, felt rather, means, that when embarked in a controversy with a foreign nation, it becomes every true citizen, after the course of his country has been decided by the constitutional authority, to submit to that decision and to support her cause, and not the cause of her foes; this noble sentiment finds many who repudiate it; many who possess the character without possessing the feelings of American citizens.

Mr. President, I trust our imperial neighbor on the other side of the Pacific, the mighty brother of the sun and moon, will set up no Chinese claims to our new possessions upon that ocean; for if he should, they might create much embarrassment, as I fear there would not be found wanting those among us ready to vouch for the validity of the claim, and to impugn our title because it is ours.

But, returning from this digression, if it can be called one, more immediately to the subject, I would observe that conservatism and progress, as they are called, designate principles, positions rather, which are useful in their moderate, but injurious in their extreme application. Like all other antagonistic elements, which work together, and well and wisely, in the worlds of mind and matter, these also may usefully coöperate, without counteracting each other. It may be that we may run too fast; but we have not yet committed that error, nor do I believe we shall. When we do, then it will be time enough to announce the danger and to propose the remedy. In the mean time, we desire that we may be left free in our career, rightfully free, unimpeded by tortuous European policy or project of aggrandizement upon this continent. And every American who participates in this sentiment, will be ready to proclaim it, as these resolutions do, and abide by it, in safety and in dangers. We do not intend to be circumscribed in our expansion, nor do we intend to have this hemisphere ruled by maxims suited neither to its position nor to its interests, and divided into political communities, dependencies of European monarchies, or under their influence, and, therefore, liable to be involved in every war breaking out in the Old World, and thus extending its dangers and its difficulties to the New, and by which means we should be exposed, in all time to come, to have our lines of communication with our Pacific coast interrupted, our commerce cut in two, as Lord George Bentinck said, and war entailed upon us, agreeably to the moral code of Blackwood, that impersonation of English Tory feeling, as a "blessing to mankind," together with all the other vexatious annoyances which such a state of things could not fail to bring with it. If this is not to be our destiny, we must be progressive, till the great objects are accomplished, and then just as conservative as may be necessary to maintain our high position in the world, our free institutions, and all those elements of individual and national prosperity which God has given to us, and which, I trust, man will never be able to take away. This will be the truly American union of progress and conservatism.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I do not rise to go into any general discussion of this joint resolution; I rise rather to make some explanations in regard to a doctrine which has often been brought into review before the Senate; I mean the Monroe doctrine. Many very important doctrines have been discussed within the scope of this debate, and I assure the honorable Senator from Michigan that I fully sympathize with him in many of his patriotic sentiments; I might concur with him in many of his abstract opinions; and I do not know that I dissent from his doctrines in the main. But he has taken a very enlarged view of very grave subjects, because I have no doubt he has deliberated upon them, and in the maturity of his own intellect he has brought them forward as worthy of public attention. Before I undertake to make the explanation which I have been induced to make by the suggestion of friends this morning—for I assure you I had no idea when I came into the Senate to-day of taking any part in this debate, or of saying a word upon any of the subjects which might be brought into it—I must undertake to say, that many of the subjects referred to (and in fact I do not know what has not been brought forward; the whole encyclopedia of our foreign relations has been fully presented, and I have no doubt very ably presented) have nothing to do with the Monroe doctrine. That was not the way that Mr. Monroe regarded questions of this kind. He and his Cabinet were practical statesmen, more practical statesmen than dialectic politicians.

Sir, the Monroe doctrine, as I understand it, was asserted upon a real issue—an issue involving very deeply the interest, and the honor, and the future character of American institutions. Now, allow me to present that issue as I understand it, and as it was presented in remarks of Mr. Calhoun, to which I shall refer presently, upon this subject. As I understand, from conversations with Mr. Calhoun, and from his remarks, as well as those of others, the allies, after the overthrow of Bonaparte, entered into what is known as the Holy Alliance. Having combined for many objects, they felt their strength, and I have no doubt, in the arrogance of their policy, were perfectly willing to bring within the scope of it all that they could. Among other things, they were disposed to restore the Spanish dominion to the South American States. In other words, sir, offended at the spirit of revolution, and at the progress of republican institutions, they were disposed to crush these young Republics in their growth, and to substitute in their place the doctrines of legitimacy and absolutism. Castlereagh, who represented the British Cabinet on that occasion, finding that these doctrines were not altogether agreeable to the genius or spirit or taste of even British statesmen, wrote to Mr. Canning, who was then Premier, I suppose giving him, by a secret message, what had been proposed in this convention of the Holy Alliance. It was then that Mr. Canning wrote to the Cabinet of Mr. Monroe, and said, We are involved in this alliance, and we want a pretext, not to retreat, but to hold ourselves aloof from a committal which may bring us into collision with you, and which, in our opinion, is against the policy of the world. Therefore, if the United States, or the Cabinet of the United States, will take strong ground, make a strong assertion that they will not suffer Spanish dominion to be restored to these American States, we will at once say to the continental sovereigns, we have nothing to do with that subject, because, although we are willing to go to some extent with you to restore the harmony and peace of Europe, we are not willing to take a step which will embroil us in a collision and war with the United States of America.

That was the real occasion; that was the Monroe doctrine. The Monroe doctrine had reference to an actual state of things, and an issue upon which the institutions and policy of the country were deeply involved. And, sir, the Monroe doctrine was asserted at the time to vindicate a principle. As I understand our forefathers, they were a people of performance and not very long advertisements. And I have observed that these long advertisements are generally followed by very short performances. When there is a real issue presented, involving the United States in a war with Great Britain, anything affecting our continent or our policy, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,]—and I concur with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,]—there is no danger in the United States backing out. I shall never fear that the spirit of the American people will quail, when it becomes our policy to maintain either our honor or our interests. I have not the least idea of it. But, sir, one of the real issues, which might bring one of the most desolating wars to both nations, would be a trespass to try title to Cuba. I may be permitted to say, that in a John Doe and Richard Roe action of trespass to try title to Cuba—for I believe England uses that form, instead of an action of ejectment—if Great Britain should think proper to be one of the parties, I will answer for it that the United States will maintain whatever declaration their interests may require them to make. I do not choose to say that we are to have Cuba either in this way or that. I may have occasion to say something upon that subject hereafter. I do not choose to say it now. I will say, however, I am indebted to the honorable Senator from Michigan for one suggestion; and that is, if Brother Jonathan grows as fast within the next thirty years, as, according to his past history, it is to be presumed he will, I am not very much afraid of old John Bull being much in his way in his progress westward.

No, sir, after the valley of the Mississippi shall have been filled up, and our people shall have been indurated, if I may so express it, by a mature growth—if they maintain for the next fifty years a progress equal to that which they have made in the history of the past—do you suppose that they will give up a neighboring island, or any neighboring possession? Why, sir, all the islands in the Caribbean Sea, if under no other influence than the attrition of opinion, cannot maintain for a very long period—I cannot say how long, for I am no prophet—their European connection. They will become de-Europeanized. Bayonets, military guards, are very poor sentinels against the innovation of opinion. Why, sir, you might as well attempt to stop the progress of the Mississippi with a bundle of hay, as to stop the progress of American influence upon this continent. But I say, and I say it with perfect confidence, that a real issue must be presented before I determine whether I will assert the Monroe doctrine or not. I do not understand it in a general sense, as the honorable Senator from Michigan does; and Mr. Calhoun did not so understand it. I think Mr. Calhoun asserted the true Monroe doctrine, and I will take the liberty of having Mr. Calhoun's views presented, if the Clerk will read the document I send to the Secretary's desk.

Mr. CASS. Will the honorable Senator, before it is read, permit me to make one explanation? I have sent for Mr. Rush's account of his embassy, which I have not before me. That will explain the whole matter. The whole thing was discussed in Mr. Calhoun's day.

There are two principles, the honorable Senator will observe, which are laid down in Mr. Rush's work. Mr. Rush was invited by European statesmen, to form a Congress to regulate South American matters. He declined very properly. There was then an intimation that a declaration like that about the Spanish-American Colonies, would be acceptable to England. But Mr. Monroe, you will observe, went much further than that. He did not stop there. You will see, by the account of Mr. Rush's embassy, which I will have here in two or three minutes, that Mr. Monroe's doctrine, which had respect to the South American States which had assumed and maintained their independence, was fully approved in England; but they received with disapproval the doctrine that we could not allow them, or any other nation, to establish colonies upon this continent. The first was, in effect, to say, these nations are independent, and we will support them; but Mr. Monroe's doctrine went far beyond that.

It will be seen, on reference to Mr. Rush's account, that he says expressly that Mr. Canning and the English statesmen were very much dissatisfied with the latter part of the Monroe declaration. They concurred in the first; that is, in the refusal of the United States to permit the South American States to again fall under Spanish dominion; but they were utterly opposed to the anti-colonization doctrine, which gave notice to Europe that we could not view any interposition in the affairs of this continent, for the purpose of controlling or interfering with them, in any other light "than as manifestations of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States." I have not time to go through the whole matter. I have not before me the book at this moment; but the honorable Senator will ascertain, by looking at it, that there are two points in the doctrine: one in respect to the attempt upon the South American States, and the other in opposition to a colonization system on this continent by Europe. It is distinctly stated by Mr. Rush, in his account of this mission, that when the latter part of it was communicated to the British Ministry it excited great dissatisfaction. While they agreed to the one, they utterly disagreed to the other. The same with respect to Mr. Polk, in 1845. He reaffirmed the same doctrine, without any peculiar application then to the condition of South America. It was a general reaffirmation of the American doctrine. As soon as I get "Mr. Rush's Residence at the Court of London," I will hand it to the Senator, and he will see the distinction expressly laid down between the two points, and to only one of which the British Government agreed.

Mr. BUTLER. Let what I have sent to the desk be read.

The Secretary read from the speech of Mr. Calhoun, as follows:

"The Senator justified the course proposed by Mr. Monroe in 1823 and in 1824. The case was not analogous. I do not remember whether the injunction of secrecy was removed. A friend said last evening it had been. However, I presume, after so great a lapse of time, it will not be considered any violation of confidence to state briefly the question which led to the declaration. We all remember the Holly Alliance to overthrow Bonaparte. England refused to join it, although she acted with it. In the process of time the Holy Alliance contemplated an interference with the affairs of South America, in order to restore the dominion of Spain over her revolted provinces. Our Government received an intimation from Mr. Canning, who was then at the head of the British Ministry—a man of extraordinary sagacity and talent—stating at the same time that if the American Government would back the British Government, she would discountenance such interference. And this general declaration had reference to a specific case, and stopped there. Mr. Monroe was a wise man, and had no design of burdening the country with a task it could not perform. He knew there was a broader declaration made by the gentleman then Secretary of State; but, as far as my knowledge extends, it was never brought forward for Cabinet deliberation. It has been a long time since, and I will not be positive. I have no doubt that the gentleman to whom reference has been made is entitled to the paternity. I say so, because out of this grew the Panama convention, although it was not legitimately an offspring. But if this declaration was right, the Panama convention was no bad conception, and the propriety of our sending a Minister could hardly be resisted."

Mr. BUTLER. On the Yucatan question, too, Mr. Calhoun, in connection with the same subject, delivered his views, and so did the honorable Senator from Michigan. Mr. Calhoun's remarks are thus reported in the Congressional Globe:

"Mr. Calhoun rose, and referred to the ground on which the message of the President of the United States had placed the proposition now before the Senate, to prevent Yucatan from becoming a colony of a foreign Power, and to prevent also the devastation of the country, and the destruction of the white inhabitants. He had placed our proposed interference on the ground of Mr. Monroe's declaration. Against all these points, against the message, and the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, he had, after deep reflection, made up his mind to record his vote.

"He went on to show that the declaration of Mr. Monroe was published in opposition to the designs of the Allied Powers, called the Holy Alliance; and contended that the case of Yucatan could not be brought within the range of that declaration. He stated what was the conduct of the Holy Alliance, and what were their designs, and the alarm taken by England at the innovating principles laid down by them. He adverted to the information given by Mr. Rush, and the manner in which the Cabinet acted on it. The schemes and the existence of the Holy Alliance had entirely disappeared; and if a final blow had been necessary, it was given by the recent revolutions in Europe. A more especial declaration with regard to Spain was then agreed on, and Yucatan cannot be comprehended in it."

Now, I would refer the honorable Senator from Michigan to his own remarks on the same subject. I shall not read them, or comment on them, because I might not understand them; but if I did understand those remarks, I thought that he in that debate distinctly concurred with Mr. Calhoun. I will hand them to the honorable Senator. I will not read them.

Mr. CASS. There is not one word in them which is not in conformity with what I have said to-day.

Mr. BUTLER. I dare say.

Mr. CASS. I do not allude to the honorable Senator now, when I say that I defy the world to find one word of them different from what I have said to-day.

Mr. BUTLER. I made no imputation of the kind. I was only saying, in connection with my explanation of Mr. Calhoun's views, that the honorable gentleman seemed to concur, at least to the extent that Mr. Calhoun went in his idea of the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. CASS. You will observe, Mr. President, that I stated at the time that I thought the subject had almost passed from Mr. Calhoun's memory. He himself stated that his recollection was indistinct. I have, however, looked at the evidence; I have looked at Mr. Rush's statement; I have looked at his own account of his mission, and I will have it here in a few minutes. It will supersede the necessity of any controversy between the honorable gentleman and myself.

Mr. BUTLER. I rose merely to make this explanation, and to state what I understand Mr. Calhoun, who was a member of Mr. Monroe's Cabinet, to lay down as the position then taken; which was, that Mr. Monroe did not intend, in advance, to say what he would or would not do, or what American policy might not require the American Government to do, on this or that occasion. Mr. Calhoun, on the Yucatan question, said that if Great Britain should take possession of that country, we would not be authorized, on the Monroe doctrine, to interfere.

Now, I agree with the Senator from Michigan, that if Great Britain, or any other European Power, were to make such an obvious demonstration as to show that she designed to take possession of any of these islands, with a view to arrest the progress of American institutions, or to make war upon them, that might be a practical question upon which I would give a responsible judgment. I am no further responsible for my judgment, as a public man, than I can see the real juncture of affairs upon which it might be invoked.

As to the declaration which was made by Mr. Rush, he said that a much wider declaration had been proposed to the Cabinet; that Mr. Monroe, seeing that it was too wide a declaration, and might be delusive and too general for him to maintain, took what the honorable Senator and others might regard, perhaps, as a narrower view of the subject than he should have done—but a safer, and, in my view, a wiser one. He took the actual issue before the country, and met it in a way to make it practicable. He told the European Powers, that if they undertook to restore Spanish authority, and to take possession of any portion of the American continent in such a way as to involve our interests—and I put that as the true test—if our interests were thus involved, it would be the duty of our Government to enforce the Monroe doctrine. But what will be the real occasion, I am not permitted to say; for I think it is a very unwise course to advertise to the world what we will do in this or that contingency, when it may never happen. I have no doubt that the general doctrines will be maintained, to some extent, but how far we may, or may not, by making these declarations, bring upon ourselves the very evils which we profess to try to avoid, I will not undertake to say.

If the United States should be engaged in a war for Cuba, for Honduras, or any portion of the continent worthy of our possession, I am not afraid that Great Britain will take undue advantage of her position and assail us. I have no hesitation in saying that in such a case as that, the gentleman's doctrine is all right; but my great objection has been on this occasion to our proclaiming in advance, when there certainly is not any necessity for it, doctrines which we ought to maintain, perhaps, without admonishing the world as to them.

I have gone very far beyond what I intended, and I have not been able to do justice to myself, or to the honorable Senator from Michigan, who has studied this subject. I have supposed that on some future occasion, I would go rather more fully into these topics. I have undertaken to say what was Mr. Calhoun's opinion, and I have declared to the Senate that it was the opinion of English statesmen at the time, that the Monroe doctrine applied to a definite and certain state of things; and that it was not enlarged, notwithstanding the effort to make it more general. I think, therefore, I have acquitted myself so far as to make the explanation.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, as I introduced an amendment to this resolution, I intended at some fitting time, if it should be the pleasure of the Senate to hear me, to address myself somewhat at length to that amendment.

Mr. CASS. Will the honorable Senator allow me to read a passage from Mr. Rush's "Residence at the Court of London," to which I have alluded?

Mr. HALE. I have but little to say, and I shall soon be through.

Mr. CASS. I will wait till you have finished.

Mr. HALE. I would have waited until that fitting time had come, if direct allusion had not been made to so humble an individual as myself, both by the honorable Senator from Michigan, and the honorable Senator from South Carolina.

On the 5th of March, 1770, several citizens of Boston were shot down in State street by the British soldiery. Of course, it sent a thrill of horror and indignation throughout the entire community, and the fact was announced to a certain patriotic, warm-blooded, and impulsive old gentleman; indignation stirred his heart and mantled his countenance, and the emphatic expression which he uttered deserves to be remembered, and to be painted in letters of light upon the walls of the Senate Chamber, that we may remember it; because it seems to be a lesson that is so well practiced upon here. Said the old man: "These soldiers must be talked to." That was what he said. That was the whole of it. That was the height to which he was worked up when American citizens were slaughtered by British troops in the streets of Boston. He said these British soldiers must be talked to. Well, sir, they were talked to; but it did not amount to anything. I think this is one of our easily-besetting sins—talking, everlastingly talking. Sir, talking would do some good if, when the occasion indicated by the talking arrives, we would live up to our words. I have a word or two to say upon this.

Both the honorable Senator from Michigan and the honorable Senator from South Carolina, alluded to a remark which I made the other day, that we should back out. Sir, I trust I have as high an appreciation of American patriotism, of American bravery, and of American ability to defend her rights against Great Britain, or against the world, as any man. It was not in reference to any such contingency that I spoke; and whoever will read the debates which were entered into in the Senate upon the occasion when I made the remark, will see that it was not. It was in reference exactly to what the Senator from South Carolina denominated these "long advertisements." And I believe it is universally found to be the case, that the man who deals most in them, deals the least in action. But, sir, I have not a doubt, and never had, that on any question that affects the interest and honor of the country, where American pride, and American feeling, and American patriotism are touched, this country might bid proud defiance to the world, and that without the prefatory admonition to the world of any resolutions about what we would do.

I regret that so distinguished a parliamentarian as the honorable Senator from Michigan, should have made the long and able speech which he has made, and to which I listened with so much pleasure, without coming to the real question pending before the Senate. That question as announced by the Chair, I understood to be upon an amendment which I had the honor to propose. That amendment was not that we should tell Spain that she should not sell Cuba. Why, sir, Spain has told us that she will not sell it, and what good will it do for us to say that she shall not? Spain says she will not, and she has given the best evidence in the world that she is sincere in the determination that she will not sell it, because she has refused a pretty liberal price which we offered her for it; and I think in that she has made her act vindicate her words. She says she will not sell it. We offered her $100,000,000 for it. She says she will not take it. And now you propose to fortify your position, by announcing to the world that she shall not sell it to anybody else. The honorable Senator thinks that we ought to repeat these declarations, because the peculiar circumstances of Cuba are such, that it commands the Gulf of Mexico and the outlet of the Mississippi river; that it is in a commanding position to obstruct our commerce and navigation which goes into the Gulf of Mexico, and seeks the mouth of the Mississippi river. Well, sir, I suppose that this country is not so low, that its patriotism is not of that doubtful character, nor its bravery of that spurious kind, that will take a position before a weak nation which it will not assume before a strong one. I use the words "weak" and "strong" comparatively, because I look upon Great Britain as a much stronger nation than Spain. I ask if the local position of Canada, in any aspect in which you may view it, whether in relation to the interests of peace or war, is not a thousand fold of more consequence than Cuba?

During the exciting political canvass of 1848—I am speaking historically now—the candidate of the great Democratic party of the nation, which has now swept the country, did not go to bed a single night when he was not within the reach of British shells, which might have been fired into his dwelling from the British possessions across the river.

Mr. CASS. I slept very comfortably, though.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir. He slept very comfortably; and I suppose there were two consoling reflections which led him to do so. One was that he was safe in all contingencies——

Mr. CASS. Of the election, and from the other.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir, I have no doubt. Safe from an election, and from the British bomb. With these convictions, I do not wonder that he slept well.

Canada, or the British possessions in North America, extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean. They border on our inland lakes, and the commerce that finds its way to the Atlantic ocean over those lakes, and through the New York canals, taking the whole of it, I think would be found equal at least to half of our foreign commerce.

Mr. SEWARD and other SENATORS. More than all of it.

Mr. HALE. The commerce of these lakes, the internal commerce that is carried on them, and through the canals, side by side with Great Britain, and liable to interruption, liable to be destroyed at any moment, exceeds, I am told by several Senators around me, to whose superior wisdom I always bow with great deference, all our foreign commerce. Now, while we are looking with such anxious eyes at Cuba; while we are speculating upon the possible and remote contingencies of how that portion of our commerce which finds its way to the Gulf of Mexico and the mouth of the Mississippi river, is to be affected by the acquisition of the Island of Cuba, I ask gentlemen that live on the northern coast—I ask those gentlemen that are liable to be waked up any night by the sound of British cannon on British shores—if it is not worth while for us to turn our attention to our northern borders, and see how the naval and military resources of Canada, in case we have a collision with the British Government, may affect the position, the safety, and the prosperity of that vast community which borders these lakes and the waters that lie between us and Canada. Would it not be as well to intimate to Great Britain that she shall not sell Canada? It may be said she has no idea of doing so. I do not know that, though. She has never been offered $100,000,000 for Canada; and it will be time enough, I think, to sit down in safety and security under the impression that she will for no consideration part with Canada when she has refused $100,000,000 for it. At least, would it not be well, while serving a notice on all the world of what we mean and what we intend, to pick out somebody who, in such an event, will be very likely to be our antagonist?

I have not time to go into the details and statistics of these measures, showing what the intimate and exact state of our commercial relations with those people is; but it is very great and vast; and I think while we are declaring to Spain what we will, and what we will not submit to, in relation to Cuba, we ought at least to look north a little. I ask the citizens of New York, of Pennsylvania, of Ohio, of Indiana, of Illinois, of Wisconsin, and of all the States bordering on the lakes——

A SENATOR. And Michigan.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; and Michigan. I had liked to have forgotten Michigan. [Laughter.]

I ask, is it not time to appeal to the citizens of all those States, and ask them if it is not worth while to turn a little of that watchful vigilance, which has been so freely extended South, to the North? The honorable Senator from Michigan is in favor of extension and annexation. So am I, sir; but I am in favor of having a little extension northward. It is a very remarkable fact in our history, whenever we have made a treaty relating to our northern boundary, you always cut off, and when we negotiate a treaty relative to our southern borders, we have taken on. That may be accidental. Probably it is entirely so. [Laughter.] But, sir, there is one thing that may be said of it,—it is a remarkable coincidence. Now let me come to this Monroe doctrine. Is it a good one?

Mr. CASS. Will the honorable Senator allow me now to read the paragraph to which I referred from Mr. Rush's book? He says:

"But although no joint movement took place, my dispatches had distinctly put before our Government the intentions of England; with which, in the main, our policy harmonized; and President Monroe, in his opening message to Congress, which followed almost immediately afterwards, in December, 1823, put forth the two following declarations:

"1. That it was impossible for the allied Powers to extend their political system to any part of America without endangering our peace and happiness; and 'equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition with indifference.'

"2. Whilst alluding to discussions between the United States and Russia, then commenced with a view to arranging the respective claims of the two nations on the northwest coast of America, the President also declared that 'the occasion had been judged proper for asserting, as a 'principle, in which the right and interests of the United 'States were involved, that the American continent, by the 'free and independent condition which they had assumed 'and maintained, were henceforth not to be considered as 'subjects for future colonization by any European Power.'

"The first of these declarations was probably expected by England, and was well received. Everybody saw at once that it referred to the hostile plans of the allied Powers against the late Spanish Provinces.

"The second declaration was unexpected and not acquiesced in, as accounts I am yet to give of negotiations with the British Government will make known."

That, I think, settles the question.

Mr. HALE. I was saying that it was a remarkable fact, that in all our negotiations about territory, whenever we had negotiations about territory on the North, we gave up; whenever it was about territory on the South, we took all. And I will make another remark: in this continual looking at the military aspects of these questions, why did you sell out a part of the State of Maine? What did Great Britain want with it? Did she want to colonize it? She stated she only wanted a military road; she only wanted the means of annoying this country in time of war, whenever there was a conflict between the two nations. And we, I suppose, in the exercise of that Christian meekness which becomes a Christian people, sold out our territory on this side of the St. Lawrence, to which every department of this Government was pledged that it was ours; and it was so palpably ours that we could not negotiate it away, but we sold it to Great Britian, who, at the time she bought it of us, told us she wanted it for a road between her provinces on the Atlantic and Canada. If there ever was a time to maintain the Monroe doctrine, I think that was a good one.

But that is not the whole of the history of the negotiation in reference to the North. The North is a large country, although it does not make much noise on this floor. How was it on the Oregon question? Our title to that, I suppose, nobody will deny, unless he means to deny the Polk and Monroe doctrine. Our title to that was "clear and indisputable." What did we do in that case? We gave Great Britain three hundred thousand square miles of our indisputable territory, for the very purpose of colonizing it. Now, according to the doctrines which have been proclaimed this morning, if Mexico, or any other country on earth which had possession of this country, had undertaken to sell three hundred thousand square miles of territory on this continent, and Great Britain had bought it, it would have been a cause of war on the part of the United States against the country that had bought it. We did not sell it. We are clear of that offense. We only gave it to her.

Once more in regard to the islands that lie off the coast. What did we do in regard to them? Why, we gave the British Vancouver's Island, which commands the mouth of the Oregon river. That is all we did there.

That is the history of the negotiations of this country, so far as the North is concerned; and I say now to the people of the North—to the representatives of the North—that our commerce lies infinitely more at the mercy of Great Britain today, than it would if Great Britain owned every one of the West India Islands; and I wonder why those gentlemen who are so fond of looking at our interests in contingencies that have not yet occurred, do not look at the Bahamas. I understand from those gentlemen who are conversant with the matter, that the Bahama Islands are situated in such a position as more effectually to command the commerce of the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf of Mexico than even Cuba itself; and that the course of the navigation is such as to bring the commerce that goes into and through those seas more directly within the reach of the guns of the Bahamas than of Cuba. Why did we not notify Great Britain that she shall not sell the Bahamas?

Mr. SHIELDS. Or Jamaica.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; Jamaica. Sir, the imagination can hardly conceive of what this country would be—what an era of internal commerce, and of progress, and of prosperity, would open upon this continent, if the Canadas, bordering the lakes upon the north, were united to this Union. Why, sir, it would lessen, in time of war, the necessity of our preparation full one half, if those lakes and that country belonged to us, instead of belonging to Great Britain.

Why not make some timely effort? Why not utter some word of warning? Why not give some notice in regard to this country, where we have a real, vital interest—where the danger is not remote and contingent, but where it is close at hand, and where we have felt it once?

In a war with Great Britain we have felt something of the evils of the contiguity of Canada to the United States. It is in this view that I want to call the attention of the Senate, and the country, and the people, to our relations with Canada as well as Cuba. Why, sir, are we going off the continent? Why are we going abroad? Why are we going to the islands of the sea, when here at our doors, in our very midst, there is a country that possesses the means of annoying us infinitely more than Cuba ever can? I will not put myself in a position by which I may be subjected to the suspicion of intimating that it is because Great Britain has more means and ability to defend her possessions than Spain has. No, sir, it must be something else.

We are not so much bully and braggart that we will presume upon the weakness of a nation, to tell her that she shall not do a thing, when we dare not tell another nation that is stronger than her, that she may not do a like thing which would injure us infinitely more.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Michigan says we have reached an epoch in our country. Sir, I have heard of epochs before. Let me tell him an anecdote on that subject. I happened once to be present at a small party of gentlemen in the city of Boston, and there was a very sagacious old gentleman present. It was about the time of the removal of the deposits by General Jackson. A young man was in the company, who was full of indignation at it. He denounced it as an act at war with every principle of government, and one likely to overthrow it. The old gentleman rather threw cold water upon the thing. "But, sir," said the young man, bristling up, "I consider this the very crisis of our experiment." "Why," said the old man, "I have been living in crises all my life." [Laughter.] Well, sir, that is just the way with this country. We have been living in epochs. I think we may be denominated the people of epochs. They come upon us every day and every hour. The epoch of to-day will be succeeded by the epoch of to-morrow, and one will make about as much impression as the other.

The honorable Senator has found food for some of his remarks in some comments which he has seen in a Buffalo newspaper. I do not read newspapers, and that is the reason I do not make so many visionary speeches as some people. That is the reason why my remarks are always so practical.

Mr. CASS. Powers of nature could no further go.

Mr. HALE. But, sir, there was one remark which fell from the honorable Senator which pained me. All the rest I was gratified at. He says there is no people on the globe that evinces such a want of patriotism as the people of the United States.

Mr. CASS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I said there was no country where there were so many persons, unfortunately, wanting it.

Mr. HALE. Then it amounts to this—that no country in the world has so many who evince a want of patriotism as in this country. I confess I do not see the difference between that and what I stated as the position of the honorable Senator; but he does, and I therefore will give him the full credit of it; but I think that in cooler moments, when the impulses of warm blood shall have subsided, and the reflection of maturity comes to that Senator, [laughter,] he will regret that remark, because it is an imputation on the motives of our fellow-citizens, in which I think he ought not to indulge. This is a country where freedom of opinion is tolerated to a very alarming extent, as some gentlemen think. It is a country where the freedom of opinion finds a vent in freedom of words to a very remarkable extent, as we have had an illustration to-day; and I would not be astonished, if in this country of free thought, and free speech, there should, at times, be sentiments uttered not at all accordant to the opinions of the majority as to what patriotism may require; but, sir, I think that a decent degree of candor and charity will induce all to do credit to those who differ from us; and if they do not think as we do, we may, at least, with charity, if we cannot with candor, believe, that although they do not see as we do, they are yet none the less friends of our country, true, just, and patriotic.

Both the honorable Senator from South Carolina and the honorable Senator from Michigan, have referred to a remark which I made in relation to this country backing out. I wish to say something in reference to that. Whenever the emergency does come that calls upon the people of this country to throw aside the pursuits of peace, and go out rendering themselves, it may be the victims for their country's good—whenever the defense of our firesides and our homes shall call for the true-hearted and the brave, they will be ready to go out and to die in their country's behalf. My word for it, you will not always find the most self-denying patriot amongst those who have made the loudest professions; but in the quiet retirement of life—in the shades of privacy—you will find the true hearts that have never given utterance to noisy sentiments—men who have not speculated nor acted upon the course of political events which has had so important an interest upon the destiny of their country, and therefore have not been heard to utter sentiments of what was, or what was not becoming the country—you will find from them many and many a man come forward, who will, by eloquent action, put to silence the declamation of those whose hot-headed counsels have plunged the country into what may be an unnecessary war. I think that will be the history.

Sir, I have but very little to say for myself. I do not know but that when the emergency may come, as Falstaff said, on another occasion, I shall be found to be little better than a coward; I will not say that I shall not, but I will say this, that if I should, I would be an unfit representative of the people that sent me here. The little State that I have the honor in part to represent—for a little while—although it is not large, and although its people are not wealthy, nor numerous, I believe it is generally admitted, has acted well her part in the great drama of the country's history. I believe that amongst the patriotic men that have maintained our rights in the field, or vindicated them upon the floor of the Senate, while at least the Senator from Michigan has a place in the memory of the people, New Hampshire may not be ashamed of her history. And, sir, I will tell the honorable Senator, that in all convulsions and trials of war to which the country has been subjected, I believe of the "Old Thirteen" she is the only State whose soil was never impressed by the footsteps of an enemy, although she runs from the Atlantic ocean to Canada. It may be that the country was too poor to attack; I do not say that it was not, but I claim the fact of history. Let it go for what it is worth. I think, however, considering the character of the soil and the people, that those who would make the attempt would find it a bad bargain to undertake to invade it.

Now, I have a single word more to say—and when I say "word," I use the term in a Pickwickian sense, the sense in which it is generally used in the Senate—a meaning which I believe a distinguished friend of ours, no longer here, and whose absence I regret, gave to the term "word." I refer to the honorable Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. Foote.) I have a word to say about the destiny of the country, in reference to which so much has been said. The honorable Senator from Michigan qualified it, and said he would not speak about "manifest destiny;" but he went on to say that we do not want to be circumscribed; that we want room; that there is hardly room enough for us in this narrow space between the Atlantic on the one side and the Pacific on the other, with the Gulf of Mexico for a wash-basin. He thought these were rather circumscribed limits for such a progressive people as we are.

Sir, I dissent from those sentiments. I do not think that our progress should be in getting more territory until we have improved what we have got. And I do not think our desire should be to get more people until we have educated, and refined, and improved those whom we have already, and until we have given homes to those, all those, who are homeless, from the vast and immense territory which we now possess. We do not want any more territory; our business and our mission is at home, and it is to improve upon our advantages; it is to advance, to elevate, and ameliorate the condition of mankind. It is to show to the despots of the Old World, by the practical results which are to follow from the experiment which we are making, that the institutions under which we live are those which are most eminently calculated to advance the highest interests of man, and subserve the great purposes of social and civilized society. It is by the arts of peace, by the multiplication of the means of internal communication, by railroads and canals, by commerce, by education, by the general diffusion of information, and by all the means which are abundant, and which wealth and power give us, of doing what we can to demonstrate to the world, that so far as the great purposes of the Creator may be understood in the creation of man, and placing him on this globe to work out the great experiment of human probation, that here are embodied, and here are concentrated the most favorable circumstances for that experiment which the world has ever seen.

While I am up, let me entreat gentlemen, let me entreat Senators, to consider the position in which we are placed. I will take up the remark of the honorable Senator from Michigan, and say with him, we do live in an epoch, a most remarkable one, but it is an epoch that goes back far beyond the mere exciting interests of the day. It goes back to the time when that great principle was first enunciated, that governments were instituted among men by their consent, and for their good. That is the epoch in which we live; that is the experiment which we are trying.

Sir, the history of the world up to the time of this experiment shows, that the efforts that man had before made for the amelioration of his condition and the elevation of his character had signally failed. It is true, there were not wanting revolutions. There were not wanting times when the people, borne down by oppressions too intolerable to be endured, had risen up in the energy of despair, and thrown off the yoke of the master who oppressed them, but it was only that another tyrant might come in his place. That was the history of the world up to the time of our experiment; and it would seem, if it be not too irreverent to undertake to scan the councils of Omnipotence, that the Almighty had become tired of the successive attempts which men had made to govern themselves, to submit themselves to the mild sway of popular institutions deriving their force and their support from their own consent. But we may imagine the Genius of Liberty pleading before the throne of Omnipotence, and asking that one more experiment might be tried; and then, when the fullness of time had come, there was revealed to the eye of sense this new continent; and the pilgrims of patriotism and piety came over here, that they might lay anew the foundations of the great Temple of Liberty, and build upon its foundation a superstructure wide enough for the oppressed of all nations to enter in and be at rest.

Sir, this is the experiment which we are to try, and this is the experiment which we are to perfect. Our fathers were aware of the great trust that was committed to their hands; and when they cut loose from the country which had sent them here—sent them here, not by its fostering care, but by its oppression—they proclaimed certain great fundamental and eternal principles as the basis of their action in all time to come; and these are eloquently and forcibly embodied in the Declaration of Independence. But our fathers pledged everything they had. They pledged life, fortune, and honor to the maintenance of the principles which they then avowed and put forth.

Sir, that pledge is binding upon us. We are in the possession and enjoyment of the privileges which they obtained; and the part that we have to perform is, to see that those principles characterize our action and policy, and are carried out to a full development and perfection. That, I look upon as the mission of this country. That, I look upon as the destiny of this country, if it is true—true to its principles, and true to the purposes of a beneficent Providence, in planting us here. If we forget this; if we are led away and dazzled by the halo of military renown; if our judgments are warped by the graspings of covetousness which will never be satisfied as long as anybody else owns land contiguous to us, then—I have been accused of prophesying—it needs no prophet, it needs no other prophecy than that which the light of experience gives us, to foretell us that we shall fail, utterly fail, and we shall go the way of the republics that have preceded us. Some gentlemen think we have built our fortress so strong that it cannot be shaken; that we have established ourselves upon a foundation so strong that we cannot be moved. Sir, how old are we? Not a hundred years yet. How old was the Roman Republic when it was overthrown? I think more than six hundred years. When we have lived half that time; when the wisdom of our institutions and the character of our citizens have been tested by an experience one half as long as that to which the Roman Republic was subjected, it will be time enough for us to erect our trophies, and set up our monuments, and say that we have succeeded; that the great experiment has been tried, the great question solved, and the truth settled, that man is capable of self-government.

Mr. President, I am not one of those whose hearts are full of forebodings of evil; and the honorable Senator cannot, when I undertake to say what I believe will be the result of things, retort upon me the failure of the prophecies of disaster that occurred in regard to the war of 1812. I tell the Senator that I was but six years old at that time; and therefore whatever reproaches there may be against those that prophesied evil then, I was not one of them. However much he may think I have followed in their footsteps now, I did not begin so early as that. No, sir; my heart is not despairing. I believe that a glorious future is before this country. I believe that a high and glorious destiny awaits her. I believe that the only thing that can defeat her of the glorious destiny which lies waiting for her to grasp, is her own unfaithfulness to the principles upon which our institutions are founded. Those principles are not those of conquest; they are not those of rapine. We are not to be the knights-errant of the world, to go abroad over the continents of the earth and the islands of the sea, proclaiming the gospel of our liberty, and fulminating the penalty of our sword against those who will not be baptized into our faith. That is not our destiny; but our destiny is at home. Our destiny is on our own continent, on our own shores. It is to improve, to elevate, to advance—in what? In territory? No, sir; we have got enough of it. In military renown? No, sir; we have got enough of that. Is any man, woman, or child, within the hearing of my voice, disturbed with one single fear that we cannot maintain successfully everything which is our right, against any and all the Powers of the earth? I believe not.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to another fact before I leave this subject, and that is the one alluded to by the honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] the other day. Why do you want to repeat this declaration? If you really mean what you say; if you mean that no Power of Europe shall colonize any part of the American continent, or the islands adjacent thereto, there is a fact, "a fixed fact," of which we are notified by the proclamation of the British authorities, which will put you to the test. Great Britain has—you do not want any inquiry about it—established a colony of the "Bay of Islands." If the declaration of Mr. Monroe has the broad meaning which the honorable Senator from Michigan gives to it, there is no occasion for repeating it over again. The time has come for acting; the fact has transpired; the issue is before you. Great Britain is here on the continent; she has colonized the "Bay of Islands;" she has instituted a Government there; and, sir, she has done that, not only in violation of the Monroe doctrine, but, if I understood the honorable Senator from Michigan, in violation of her solemn treaty obligations. Then, here is a case. We need not make any profession of what is right for a free and independent nation to do; for the resolution says that "it will leave us free to adopt such measures as any independent nation may justly adopt in defense of its rights and honor." If the resolution has that meaning, the case is before you—the time has come. If you mean what you have said, this is the time, not for resolution but for action; and you should satisfy yourselves with no vague declarations that you will do what an independent nation is free to do, when, if that means, what it has been contended it does mean, it has been violated, the Monroe doctrine trampled under foot, the faith of a treaty violated, and Great Britain, in the face of all this, has established a colony upon this continent.

For these reasons I am opposed to passing this joint resolution, unless you include Canada in it. If you will put that in—and, sir, I will not object if anybody else should add to the resolution an amendment notifying all the other Governments of the earth which own any islands about our continent. I do not pretend to be so good a geographer as some gentlemen. I would be willing to have it amended as broadly as that, and let it be a general notice to all the kings and potentates of the earth, that we have money enough to buy them out of this continent, and that we will not allow them to sell to anybody else. I am willing, I say, if patriotism requires such a wide margin as that, to go that far; but I am not willing to pick out Spain from all the rest, and give her the notice alone. What has Spain done? Why is she to be talked to in this manner? Is it because she has got a rich island, and we think she will not defend it with such zeal and ability as Great Britain would defend her possessions? I say, I am not willing to be invidious in making a selection of Spain, when there are so many nations around us and all about us. Spain is an old ally of ours, as old as the Revolution. She furnished us aid in that great struggle in which our liberties were secured, and from the time of the treaty of peace of 1783, down to the present time, the amicable relations which existed between this country and Spain, have never been disturbed. Why, then, turn round to our old friend? Why turn round to her who was a friend when we wanted a friend? Why speak to that nation which has faithfully performed all her treaty obligations, that nation which was the first to welcome us into the great family of nations, and lend us her treasure to aid us in the conflict, and has maintained a firm and inviolable friendship ever since? Why, at this time, begin to speak to her in this threatening, this insolent manner, this tone of superiority, and tell her that she shall not do as she pleases with her own island, when Great Britain, with whom we have crossed arms twice, who has neglected to perform her treaty stipulations with us, is situated, in reference to us, in a position that enables her to annoy us to a vastly greater degree than Spain? Sir, I am opposed to the resolution; I am decidedly opposed to it, unless it is made general; and when it is made general, if the wisdom of the Senate thinks that it is fit and proper that the resolution should be then made, and that notice should be served on all mankind, I will go for it, with the proviso this time, that the resolution never shall be outlawed, and that we shall not be under the necessity of renewing it again; but that all nations, for all time to come, shall take notice that this is the only market in which they can dispose of their colonies. But I think the honorable Senator from Michigan—for whom I have none but the kindest feelings, and the most profound respect—will not go that far.

Mr. CASS. I will tell you when the time comes.

Mr. HALE. I think the time has come now. There is the mistake. I think we are in an epoch, [laughter,] and that if we ever mean to say it, now is the time. I will not detain the Senate any longer, except simply to ask, when the vote is taken upon my amendment, that I may have the yeas and nays.

Mr. MASON. I wish to ask the honorable Senator from Michigan, if I correctly understood him, in alluding to the conferences held by Mr. Rush with Mr. Canning, then the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to say that Mr. Rush was acting in pursuance of authority, or under the instructions of the President?

Mr. CASS. Unquestionably. He had his consultation with Mr. Canning, after he had received the declaration of Mr. Monroe, and knew the whole views of the Government. At first, as I understand Mr. Rush's book, propositions had been made, which he transmitted to the Government, or on his own responsibility he had refused to join the American Congress, proposed to be held at Panama. The views of the Government were fully conveyed to him before he had this consultation with Mr. Canning; and he states expressly that the first part of the declaration, with reference to the South American States, was well received by England, but the latter part, in reference to anti-colonization by any European power, was not well received.

Mr. MASON. Perhaps it would be as well for the Senate to allow me five minutes to put this matter right, as a matter of history, and a very interesting matter of history, connected with this declaration of Mr. Monroe. I have no design to go at length into the debate.

Mr. BADGER. To accommodate the Senator, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. GWIN. I hope this subject will go over to next week. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. SOULE] intends to address the Senate upon it.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 19, 1853.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the joint resolution—

Mr. MASON said: Mr. President, it may become my duty, before the debate shall close, or the vote be taken on the resolution offered by the Senator from Michigan, to give my views at large upon the whole scope and tenor of that resolution. Yesterday, when the honorable Senator concluded his introductory speech upon it, I was anxious to say a few words upon one branch of the subject only, in relation to a matter which, as I conceived, had been misinterpreted by the Senator from Michigan in his remarks. I desired to do so yesterday, in order that what I might say should go out contemporaneously with the speech of that Senator; but I had not the opportunity, because of the lateness of the hour; and I trust the Senate will indulge me this morning in doing what I then desired to do.

I wish to speak alone now of that portion of the message of President Monroe of 1823, which was directed to the affairs of Spanish America, for the purpose of showing that the principle asserted in that message had not been (as I understood it to be asserted by the honorable Senator from Michigan) laid by in rust, and neglected as obsolete and forgotten; but that the principle there asserted had effected what it was intended to effect, what alone it was intended to effect; and to show that it cannot again be resuscitated by the American Government, unless the same contingency were to arise which brought it into being.

I understood the Senator from Michigan, to whose remarks I listened, as I always do, not only with pleasure, but with instruction, to be impressed in some way that the doctrines thus asserted in the message of President Monroe, with reference to Spanish American affairs, were complicated with a like movement at that time on the part of England; and that he gathered that impression from the book published by Mr. Rush, to which he referred. The message of President Monroe was his annual communication to Congress, in December, 1823. It took a general review, of course, of all the foreign relations of this country; and in speaking of the condition of the Republics, then independent, upon the continent of South America, he reviewed the existing relations between them and their parent stock; and it was in that connection, and in reference to Spanish America alone, that the principle adverted to was asserted. In March, 1822, Mr. Monroe, by a special message, had solemnly invoked the Congress of the United States to recognize the independence of certain of the South American Republics. He took the initiative in this, in advance of all the Governments of the world, and called upon Congress in the most solemn manner, declaring to them that the time had come to recognize the independence of such of those Republics as had shown themselves equal to the new positions they had assumed. It was done. Congress, during the same session of 1822, responded to the call. The House of Representatives passed a resolution approving the recommendation, and Congress made an appropriation to meet the necessary expenses of diplomatic intercourse with them. That was the first step which was taken by any Power toward the recognition of the independence of any part of South America.

At that time, as we are all well aware, the Government of Old Spain—I mean the legitimate Government of Spain—was held in a sort of pupilage by the Cortes, which had prescribed a constitutional government for the King. When the act of the American Government, recognizing the independence of the South American States, which had previously been colonies of Spain, came to them, it first opened the eyes of Spain to the fact that its American colonies were in truth dismembered. There is a very interesting history of this subject given by Mr. Rush, who, at that time, was Minister of the United States in England. I wish to refer to it, first, to show that the American Government proceeded alone in everything that it did relative to the affairs of Spanish America; and secondly, that what the American Government then did was directed to Spanish America alone, to the exclusion of any other matter connected with our foreign relations. What is Mr. Rush's account? He says that, having occasion, in August, 1823, to ask an interview with the British Minister for Foreign Affairs, (then Mr. George Canning,) after the object of the interview had been disposed of, (one which was totally foreign to the affairs of South America,) he "transiently" asked Mr. Canning, as Mr. Rush expressed it, about the recent news from Spain. His inquiry of Mr. Canning was in these words, as stated in his book: "The proper object of it [the conference] over, I transiently asked him whether, 'notwithstanding the late news from Spain, we 'might not still hope that the Spaniards would get 'the better of their difficulties?'" The question was thus transiently put upon a subject totally foreign to that which had brought them together. Mr. Canning gave him the information, and it led to a further conversation, in the course of which Mr. Canning inquired of Mr. Rush if the proper time had not arrived, in his opinion, for the two Governments of England and the United States to make a concerted declaration upon the affairs of Spanish America? This inquiry of Mr. Canning, as given by Mr. Rush, was as follows: "Whether the 'United States would join England in a concerted 'declaration against the intervention of the Holy 'Alliance in the affairs of South America."

In tracing this subject further, I have found the English account of this interview, given in a very interesting work published by a gentleman who, I understand, was the Secretary of Mr. Canning—Mr. Stapleton—who wrote "The Political Life of Canning." He states that—

"Towards the latter end of August, 1823, Mr. Canning sounded Mr. Rush, the then Minister of the United States in this country, as to whether, in his opinion, the moment were not arrived when the two Governments of Great Britain and the United States might not come to some understanding with each other on the subject of the Spanish-American colonies; and whether, if they could arrive at such understanding, it would not be expedient for themselves, and beneficial for the world, that the principles of it should be clearly settled and plainly avowed."

That was the first movement which brought the Ministers of the two Powers together, and at the instance of Mr. Canning, who originated it. The latter met Mr. Canning with the declaration that he had no power, having no instructions from his Government on that subject, but that it was a matter of very great interest, and one that he knew his Government felt deeply concerned in; and waiving the proposition of Mr. Canning, he availed himself of the occasion to press upon Mr. Canning, what England so far had not done, that she should follow the example of the United States, by recognizing the independence of those Republics. The result was, that, after several days of informal discussion and the exchange of notes, Mr. Rush consented, though without authority from his Government, to make such a concerted declaration with England, provided England, as a preliminary, would recognize their independence.

In what position did England stand? In a very difficult and a very delicate one. It was then well known that Spain was using every means to induce her allies upon the continent to unite with her in resubjugating her revolted colonies in America, and it was equally well known that England was averse to it. It was well known that, beside grave political considerations, large commercial relations had grown up between England and those Republics, which forbade the assent of England to any such intervention.

England felt herself in this position: If her continental allies yielded to the invitation of Spain, and united with her to resubjugate the colonies, it would involve England inevitably in a war with those allies; and thus, though England was stimulated by her subjects to recognize the independence of the South American States, the Government was deterred, and hesitated, because it might drive her into a war with the whole continent of Europe; and this recognition Mr. Rush had made a condition precedent to any action on his part toward the concerted declaration. Eventually the subject was dropped between them, on the ground, as set forth by Mr. Canning, that Mr. Rush had no powers. So much is due to the history of that occasion, to show that the United States as a Government never invited the coöperation of England in the matter; that when the proposal was assented to in the modified form admitted by Mr. Rush, it was assumed by him as his act, and without authority from his Government, and that it was never subsequently confirmed by his Government. He, as a matter of course, communicated to his Government immediately and fully all that took place; and in one of his letters, from which I quote an extract, he told the Secretary of State this:

"Should the issue of things be different, and events, notwithstanding, arise threatening the peace of the United States, or otherwise seriously to affect their interest in any way, in consequence of such a declaration by me, it would still remain for the wisdom of my Government to disavow my conduct, as it would manifestly have been without its previous warrant."

Now, I think I have shown, in the first place, that the true line of American policy of avoiding foreign alliances was not departed from in that instance; and, secondly, that the Government of the United States not only preceded England, but preceded all other Powers in recognizing first, and alone, the independence of the South American colonies. These propositions I may assume to be established.

I come now to the question, to what issue was this declaration of Mr. Monroe directed? With a very limited knowledge of the practices of Governments in their relations towards each other, but with some knowledge of human affairs and human conduct in the relations of the world, I apprehend that no principle can be more important to be maintained than that declarations made, or positions assumed by the Powers of the world to regulate and define their intercourse with each other should not be extended by loose interpretation beyond their legitimate scope and meaning. What, then, was the state of things to which this declaration by Mr.

Monroe was directed? Why it was this, and this alone: It was the imminently-threatened intervention of the allied Powers of Europe to enforce on the continent of America, in the affairs of Spain and her colonies, their continental system—"legitimacy." It was directed to that, and confined to that, as I think I can show by a very few historical references.

Was that intervention threatened? The first piece of evidence I shall advert to on that point, is a declaration made by Mr. Brougham, in the House of Commons, in 1824, referring to the position of this Spanish question in the preceding year, as follows:

"Mr. Brougham then proceeded to state, as an indisputable fact, that 'Ferdinand had been promised by the Emperor Alexander, that if the King of Spain would throw off the constitutional fetters by which he was trammeled, he would assist him in recovering his transatlantic dominions.'"

At that time Louis XVIII. had been restored to the Throne of France by the allied Powers. Ferdinand of Spain, of the same family of Bourbons, was upon his Throne it was true; but he was fettered by the constitutional Cortes, who had attempted to engraft upon the Spanish monarchy the free institutions of a representative government. The King of France had marched one hundred thousand men into Spain to set him free. The King of Spain was calling upon his allies to come to his aid. Conferences were going on; notes were being constantly exchanged, as the diplomatic history of the times shows, between the Spanish Embassador at Paris and the Embassadors of the other European Powers at that Court; the great end and object of which was to bring about a Congress of the allied Powers, to take into consideration the condition of the Spanish Throne, and to restore its legitimate rule both at home and in Spanish America. Mr. Brougham says that this had been promised by the Emperor Alexander, upon condition that the King of Spain would free himself from the constitutional government at home. Mr. Canning told Mr. Rush, as the latter reports, in the course of the conversations which took place between them on the subject to which I have alluded, that "he had received 'notice of measures being in projection by the 'Powers of Europe relative to the affairs of Spanish America, as soon as the French succeeded 'in their military movement against Spain."

England knew perfectly well that the occasion was imminent. There was every reason to believe that the allied Powers of Europe would rally around Spain, for the purpose of resubjugating her colonies. England knew, not only that she could not unite with them, but that she must resist them; and whenever that resistance was made, she would be involved in a war with the whole continent of Europe.

This state of things led to the invitation which Mr. Canning gave to Mr. Rush. The latter assented to it, but upon terms which England was not at once prepared to adopt—a previous recognition of the independence of the Republics—and the whole matter was then, as a matter of course, communicated by Mr. Rush to his Government.

It must be remembered that the interview spoken of by Mr. Rush, took place in August, 1823. In December, 1823, President Monroe made his annual communication to Congress, which contained the famous protest which has been so often quoted. What was the protest? We shall find, on looking back to it, that it was made in the most circumspect and guarded manner, and confined to a single purpose. Every word seems to have been weighed, and its expressions sedulously guarded. Here is his language:

"We owe it, therefore, to candor, and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those Powers, to declare that we should consider any attempts on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere, as dangerous to our peace and safety."

"To extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere." What system? Why, the system by which those Powers of Continental Europe had been banded together—the system which recognized none but a legitimate throne, and which bound the sovereigns to each other to protect each in his throne, because it was legitimate. That is the system, as I shall have occasion presently more fully to develop, against which Mr. Monroe protested. Again, in a further paragraph, the message proceeds:

"With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European Power we have not interfered, and shall not interfere. But with the Governments who have declared their independence, and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European Power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States."

He then went on to speak of our policy in regard to Europe. It was one of disconnection and alienation. He referred to the system of the allied Powers on the continent of Europe, and concludes as follows:

"But in regard to these continents, circumstances are eminently and conspicuously different. It is impossible that the allied Powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent, without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can any one believe that our southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord.

"It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition in any form with indifference."

As I read this matter, the true history of the occasion was this: There was imminent reason to believe that the Powers of Continental Europe would come to the aid of Spain to resubjugate her colonies in South America, then independent, and admitted to be so by the United States. England, conscious that when the time came, a necessity would be imposed upon her to interpose, had not yet interposed. The United States had acknowledged the independence of the South American Governments, in 1822; England had not yet done so in August, 1823, when the conversation from which I have read took place between Mr. Rush and Mr. Canning; and when Mr. Rush pressed it upon England as a preliminary to the proposed union, that England should recognize their independence, the matter was waived on the part of the British Secretary, and the whole affair was communicated to the Government of the United States by our Minister.

What followed? The Government of the United States took that step singly, which it had been proposed on the part of the British Government that the two Governments should take jointly. It was a declaration made against the purpose, on the part of the allied Powers, to bring their "political system" to this continent. It was narrowed and confined to that, and that alone. Did it have its effect? I will tell you what followed.

In December, 1823, as I find in looking at the political history of the day, a formal request was made by the Government of Spain to certain of the allied Powers, to carry into execution that purpose against which the protest of Mr. Monroe was directed—a request to those Powers that they would aid Spain in reëstablishing her legitimate authority over the revolted colonies of Spanish America. Here it is. It is a letter from the Prime Minister of the King of Spain to his Majesty's Ministers at Paris, St. Petersburgh, and Vienna, dated December 26, 1823, in these words:

"His Majesty, confiding in the sentiments of his allies, hopes that they will assist him in accomplishing the worthy object of upholding the principles of ORDER and LEGITIMACY, the subversion of which, once commenced in America, would presently communicate to Europe; and that they will aid him, at the same time, in reëstablishing peace between this division of the globe and its colonies."

The invitation was based upon a mutual recognition by those sovereigns of a concerted duty to acknowledge no Governments but such as were based on hereditary and legitimate descent. So far, the obligations of this alliance had been confined to the continent of Europe. With its operation there Mr. Monroe disclaimed all purpose of interference, but protested against its extension to either continent of America, as "the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States," and "dangerous to our peace and safety."

That message effected its object. It averted the threatened interposition; and in proof of it we have, first, the broad fact that they never did interpose, that the invitation of Spain was declined. The allied Powers never came to her aid. We have, secondly, the high testimony borne to the fact by Mr. Brougham in the British House of Commons in the succeeding year, (1824,) when he used this language:

"The question with regard to South America," said Mr. Brougham, "was now, he believed, disposed of, or nearly so; for an event had recently happened, than which no event had ever dispersed greater joy, exultation, and gratitude over all the free men of Europe: that event, which was decisive on the subject, was the language held with respect to Spanish America in the speech, or message of the President of the United States to Congress."

I shall not detain the Senate longer. All that I desired to do was to show, first, that there was nothing to be found in the history of this occasion showing any departure from the established policy of this Government to refrain from all foreign alliances whatever; secondly, that the declaration of Mr. Monroe was guarded in its terms, and was designedly confined to the occasion then existing—the apprehension that the Powers of Europe would endeavor to establish their "continental system" upon the continent of America.

I had a further object: to call upon the Senate and the country to prevent injustice to the memory of the great departed statesman whose act it was—to disclaim extending his language beyond its true import and its true meaning. You may establish a principle, if you please, that European Powers shall not be permitted to do this, that, or the other, on this continent; but establish it as your own principle, and not as Mr. Monroe's. The act of Mr. Monroe was confined to a single object: the prevention of the intervention of the allied Powers of Europe to restore the colonial possessions of Spain on this continent, because their revolt was in violation of their established dogma of the legitimacy of Kings.

There can be no doubt that if the United States had not, by the message of Mr. Monroe, in December, 1823, made such a declaration, England would have been driven to do from necessity what the United States had done from choice. The people of England would never have permitted their Government to stand by indifferently and see the continental policy established between Spain and her colonies on the continent of America. But the fact remains, that the United States went into it alone and in advance.

The invitation of the 26th of December, 1823, given by the Spanish Minister to the various European Powers to come to the rescue of Spain, was of course made known to England, though the invitation was not addressed to her. It was understood that there was to be this meeting of the allied Powers upon the continent of Europe, to which England was not invited; but when it came to her knowledge, Mr. Canning immediately gave them to understand that such an act on the part of the allied Powers would be instantly followed by a recognition of the independence of South America on the part of England.

All that I have wished to attain on this subject is to show that the doctrines of Mr. Monroe, adverted to by the honorable Senator from Michigan, and embraced in his resolution, was confined to a single issue, and that issue was the intervention of the allied Powers of Europe between Spain and her colonies, in order to establish their continental system; and to insist, as I do insist, that, taking it as the doctrine of Mr. Monroe, we cannot extend it one hair's breadth beyond that. We may establish a new doctrine if we please, but that will not be the Monroe doctrine.

In the same message of 1823, Mr. Monroe declared, as an additional policy by this Government, that the American continents were not, thereafter, to be considered as fit subjects for European colonization. I do not mean to go into that now. It is true that enunciation was made in the same message of 1823, but it was connected with a different matter, and asserted in a different manner. I do not mean to go into that now, though I shall probably have occasion to do so some time before the debate closes.

Mr. CASS. I shall detain the Senate but a very short time. As Mr. Polk said, for a quarter of a century down to his day—and that is now some years since—the doctrine of Mr. Monroe had been distinctly understood by the American people, I thought it was a historical fact which had never been doubted, as far as I recollect, that Mr. Monroe protested against the recolonization of any portion of the American continents by any of the European Powers. They expressly excluded the idea of interfering with existing rights; but he protested forever afterwards against the recolonization of any portion of the North or South American continents. Every man, so far as I recollect, has understood it so. Mr. Polk distinctly understood it so. So did Mr. Canning and Mr. Rush, as the paragraph which I read yesterday from Mr. Rush's book shows.

I have not a word to say with respect to the history of the time given by the honorable Senator from Virginia. I agree to it all. I have no doubt whatever that the existing condition of South America directed the eyes of our country to it. His whole narrative of the matter is correct. I give Mr. Rush great credit for the whole course of his negotiations, and the administration of Mr. Monroe greater credit; because they, notwithstanding the boast Mr. Canning made before the world that it was he that called these States into existence or recognized them, recognized their independence before him.

But allow me to say that that portion of the message of Mr. Monroe which the honorable gentleman read, applies to all time hereafter. Its reasonings are capable of general and universal application. The doctrine laid down is, that the American continents have interests of their own distinct from Europe; and Mr. Monroe's object was, in that existing state of things, to sweep the allied Powers from this continent; to prevent them from taking possession of any of the American States. Everybody knows that if we were to allow recolonization, we would prefer that these colonies should be held by Spain, rather than by England. What, then, would Mr. Monroe have gained by his declaration, if it was to be restricted to what some gentlemen seem to think it was restricted? What would he have gained by simply saying: "We protest against these colonies being recolonized by Spain?"

It will be recollected that it ran through England, and it was announced on this floor, that the extent of Mr. Monroe's declaration was to sweep all the colonies on this continent out of existence. But it was not so. Mr. Monroe expressly reserved the rights of the existing colonies. In his message, he merely referred to South America, to the precise state of things existing, and to no other. There was no object in putting in a reservation.

I agree with the honorable Senator from Virginia in his estimate of Mr. Monroe. I consider him one of the best and wisest statesmen we ever had. He was exceedingly guarded and cautious in his language. I had the honor of knowing him personally; and the panegyric of the Senator from Virginia is one that he well deserves. His character ought to stand, as it does stand, high in the estimation of his countrymen. He was not only guarded and cautious, but, when the interests of his country required it, he took a firm and decided stand.

The declaration which the Senator has just read is this in substance: We owe it to those Powers to declare that they shall not extend their system to this continent, because we have peculiar interests of our own, distinct from European interests. We had then, we have now, and we shall have through all time; and every reason applying to that state of things applies with as much force to any future state of things, in which there may be attempts made to recolonize any portion of America. In the same message, as the honorable gentleman has said, the doctrine for which I contend was laid down still more distinctly. To be sure, the occasion for it was different; it was in reference to some controversy with the Russians, who wanted to extend their dominions on the western coast of America down as far as a portion of California, and even including that. Referring to that, President Monroe made a broad general declaration, which went out to the world in his annual message to the American Congress, stating distinctly what was the position of this Government. He said:

"In the discussions to which this interest has given rise, and in the arrangements by which they may terminate, the occasion has been judged proper for asserting, as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European Power."

It is utterly impossible for words to make the proposition plainer than it is here announced; and the whole world, from that day to this, has understood that language precisely as I have explained it. That was the distinct understanding both of Mr. Rush and of the English Government; and, in fact, the whole world understood it so. Let me, upon this point, read again the extract which I read yesterday, from Mr. Rush's book. Mr. Rush, in his account of his conversation with Mr. Canning, says:

"But although no joint movement took place, my dispatches had distinctly put before our Government the intentions of England; with which, in the main, our policy harmonized; and President Monroe, in his opening message to Congress, which followed almost immediately afterwards, in December, 1823, put forth the two following declarations:

"1. That it was impossible for the allied Powers to extend their political system to any part of America without endangering our peace and happiness; and 'equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition with indifference."

That is the first proposition. And here let me say, that the honorable Senator is perfectly right in his whole history of the controversy, the difficulties that led to it, and the ground taken by the American Government. But what else does Mr. Rush say? What is the second proposition to which he alluded? It is:

"2. Whilst alluding to discussions between the United States and Russia, then commenced with a view to arranging the respective claims of the two nations on the northwest coast of America, the President also declared that 'the occasion had been judged proper for asserting, as 'a principle in which the right and interests of the United 'States were involved, that the American continents, by 'the free and independent condition which they had 'assumed and maintained, were henceforth not to be consid-'ered as subjects for future colonization by any European 'Power.'"

What said Mr. Canning and the British Government to that? "The first of these declarations," (as to the intervention of the allied Powers of the American States,) "was," says Mr. Rush, "probably expected by England, and was well 'received. Everybody saw at once that it refer-'red to the hostile plans of the allied Powers 'against the late Spanish Provinces;" which it undoubtedly did, although its general reasoning applied to all time to come, and to all similar circumstances. But with respect to the second declaration, in which the general doctrine of anti-colonization was laid down, Mr. Rush says, it "was unexpected, and not acquiesced in, as ac-'counts I am yet to give of negotiations with the 'British Government will make known." This is precisely what I said yesterday. I had no idea of renewing the subject. My only intention was to put myself right; and having done that, I yield the floor.

Mr. SOULE. It was by the consent of the honorable Senator from California, that this debate went on yesterday, and was resumed to-day; and it was with the understanding that it should not interfere with the bill which he was pressing upon the consideration of the Senate for the construction of a railroad to the Pacific ocean. As he is very anxious that the Senate should restore to him its attention upon that bill, and as I am unwilling at present to divert it from that object, and as I am desirous, however, to secure the floor, I will move that the further consideration of this joint resolution be postponed until Tuesday next.

Mr. DIXON. Will the gentleman allow me to occupy the floor for a moment?

Mr. SOULE. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I have not risen to enter at large into this discussion, but to give notice to the Senate that I shall, at the proper time, move to refer the joint resolution offered by the distinguished Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] and also the amendment offered by the able Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with the following instructions:

First. That the said committee be instructed to examine the treaty concluded at Washington, on the 4th day of July, 1850, between Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, by her Minister Plenipotentiary, Sir Henry L. Bulwer, and the Government of the United States, by John M. Clayton, Secretary of State; and ascertain whether the Government of Great Britain, since the ratification of said treaty, has violated any of the provisions thereof, by the establishment of any colonial government, the construction of fortifications in Central America, or otherwise; and that they report the facts in connection therewith; and if, in their opinion, there has been any violation of said treaty, that they make further report, by resolution, of such measures as they may deem necessary to enforce a faithful observance of the stipulations of said treaty, and preserve the honor and interest of the country.

Second. That said committee inquire and report whether or not the establishment in the Bay of Honduras, by the Government of Great Britain, of the colony called "The Bay of Islands," is or is not a violation of the provisions of the said treaty, or of the doctrines of Mr. Monroe, as proclaimed in his message of the second of December, 1823, on the establishment of colonies on this continent by European Powers; and if it shall appear that the rights of the United States have been invaded, by either a disregard of the provisions of the said treaty, or of the doctrines proclaimed by Mr. Monroe in his message aforesaid, that they report the facts to the Senate, together with such measures as, in their judgment, may be deemed necessary to vindicate the honor of the country.

Third. That said committee inquire whether the seizure by the French Government of the peninsula of Samaná, in the Republic of Dominica, is or is not a violation of the same great principle proclaimed, as aforesaid, in the message of Mr. Monroe, and if so, what action is necessary on the part of this Government to protect itself against such encroachments on its rights.

If I were disposed, Mr. President, to take part in this discussion, such is the feeble condition of my health that I would not even dare to attempt it. I am anxious, however, that this debate shall have some point upon which it is to turn. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the very able discussion which has been going on here during the last ten days upon the various propositions which have been presented, not in the form of resolutions, but in the form of debate. Senators seem to think this Government has suffered under the construction given to the Bulwer and Clayton treaty, and which was the subject of discussion a short time since, and which treaty is alluded to in one of the instructions I have drawn up. But upon this question it is not my purpose to give any opinion; for, not having been a member of the Senate when that treaty was confirmed, of course I have no explanations to give of what the Senate's understanding was upon the question of whether British Honduras and its dependencies were intended to be excluded from its provisions or not.

But Senators seem to think, and indeed openly declare, that that treaty has been violated by the Government of Great Britain, by the establishment in the Bay of Honduras of the colony called "The Bay of Islands." If that be true, it is right that this Government should act upon it. If that treaty has been violated, it is proper that the Senate should know it. If this country has been outraged by the disregard of the principles contained in that treaty, it is useless for us to be talking and exhausting the time of the Senate in idle speculation of what may or may not be the future policy of European nations, in regard to the purchasing of Cuba, or the establishment of colonies on the continent, or what may be necessary for this Government to do, on the happening of such contingencies, should they ever happen. But rather the inquiry should be, whether the treaty had been violated, and if so, whether this country will fold its arms and tamely submit to such violation. Should the committee, Mr. President, find that the provisions of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty have been violated by the British Government, or that the principles as proclaimed by Mr. Monroe have been disregarded by the Government of Great Britain or of France, in the establishment by the one of the colony of "The Bay of Islands," in the Bay of Honduras, or the seizure by the other of the peninsula of Samaná, in the Republic of Dominica, the known experience and ability of the Senators who compose that committee will afford a sufficient guarantee to the whole country, that whatever measures they may propose will be dictated by prudence, and the exercise of a sound and patriotic judgment. For myself, although I should deprecate a war with England or with France as one of the greatest calamities that could befall this nation, yet I would rather see my country subjected to such a calamity, than dishonored by quietly submitting to a wanton violation by any country, however powerful she may be, either upon the land or upon the sea, of a stipulation solemnly entered into, involving not only her rights, but her honor also. For, without, Mr. President, being a filibuster or a propagandist, in any sense of the word, I am for maintaining the principles upon which this Government has hitherto acted; of asking from other nations nothing but what is right, and submitting to nothing that is wrong.

I understood from the very distinguished Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. DOWNS,] in his remarks the other day, that he was of the opinion that the treaty had been violated. If that is not his opinion, what is the meaning of these remarks which he made, and which I will now read to the Senate?

"While we are on this subject—for it is an interesting one, and I think everything in regard to it ought to be understood—I would like the honorable Senators from Maryland [Mr. PEARCE] and New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] who have looked so closely into it, and talked so much about British rights, to explain what they mean by those British rights. Do they mean that England retains after this treaty, or had before, the right not merely to cut wood in Honduras, but to colonize it, as they have now, in a proclamation, declared their intention to do? That is the real question. We assume that, by the treaty, it has renounced that right. The late President of the United States seems to have entertained that view when the treaty was submitted to the Senate; and I would like to know now if the gentlemen still think that, under the stipulations of that treaty, they have that right?"

I understand, also, that the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHIELDS] asserted it as a clear proposition that the treaty had been violated; for he said:

"Whether you give to this treaty the meaning put upon it by the negotiators, their own private understanding, or whether you give it the meaning that the language imports, the treaty has been violated by the seizure of these islands. So far as Balize, or what is termed British Honduras, is concerned, I am not disposed to enter into that question now, and for this reason: I think it might be impolitic for us at this time to construe the treaty in relation to it, as I apprehend, in doing so, it might embarrass our friends hereafter."

In the same speech, that honorable Senator said further:

"I merely rose, not to enter into this doubtful question, but to show that no matter how this point is argued, the seizure of the islands is a violation of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, and this has nothing to do with any pretension, or any right, or any pretense, which Great Britain claims to the possession called Balize, or British Honduras."

I understood the very distinguished Senator from Michigan, in the same debate, to concur fully in the opinions which had been expressed and given out to the Senate by the Senators to whom I have just alluded, that this treaty had been violated; for he said, speaking of the action of the British Government:

"I do know now, that, in the very face of this treaty, she, in July last, went on to establish a colony called the 'Bay of Islands.'"

Of course the honorable Senator meant to be understood, when he used the language, "in the very face of this treaty," that the treaty had been violated by the establishment by the British Government of the Bay of Islands; and if this was not his meaning, what was it?

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the honorable Senator permit me to make one suggestion? It is clearly my opinion that the authorities at the Balize who have erected these islands into a colony have done so in violation of the treaty. But we have no official or authentic information on that subject. There is another point in the case: The act of those authorities may be disavowed by the British Government; and my opinion is, it will be disavowed, if the point is made by our Government. Consequently, I think there may be, perhaps, some impetus necessary in regard to our action. My opinion is, if the British Government recognizes the act of its officers in the Balize, it is a violation of the treaty.

Mr. DIXON. I fully concur, Mr. President, in the view taken by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS.] The British Government may disavow the act, but it has not yet done so. The Senator from Illinois has expressed it as his opinion that the treaty has been violated; and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. DOWNS] has expressed his opinion that the treaty has been violated; and the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] has also expressed the same opinion. Now, then, as we have no information in regard to the violation of that treaty from the President of the United States, it is proper that a reference of this whole subject should be made to the Committee on Foreign Relations, that they may inquire into the whole matter, and report to the Senate whether or not, in their opinion, the treaty has been violated; and, if in their judgment, it has been, that they may also report the measures proper to be adopted by this Government with a view to vindicate its honor and sustain the principles of that treaty inviolate. That, sir, is proper and right, and I have risen, as I said before, not with a view to enter into any discussion of this subject, but merely to give notice to the Senate that I shall, at the proper time, move that the resolution of the Senator from Michigan, together with the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with the instructions which have been read to the Senate.

Mr. SOULE. I now renew the motion, Mr. President, if it be the pleasure of the Senate, that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until Tuesday next, at which time I wish to avail myself of the indulgence of the Senate, to make some remarks upon the question.

The motion was agreed to.

AFFAIRS OF NEW MEXICO.

SPEECH OF MR. WEIGHTMAN,

OF NEW MEXICO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 10, 1853,

In the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in regard to the censure conveyed by the Report of the Secretary of War upon the People of New Mexico.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN said:

No one, Mr. Chairman, can regret more than I do that New Mexico has not an abler advocate than myself upon this floor. I regret that her Delegate is not a man experienced in parliamentary debate, and gifted with eloquence. New Mexico needs, but has not, such a man for her champion. Of this, no one is more sensible than myself. A plain story, plainly told, is all that I can offer. I feel that a duty devolves upon me, and I shrink not from its performance.

In the President's message which was read on the first day of the session, occurs the following passage. After speaking of the invitation which France and England tendered to the United States to enter into a tripartite convention, in virtue of which the three Powers should severally and collectively, now and for the future, disclaim all intentions to obtain possession of the Island of Cuba, and his refusal to enter into such a convention because he thought the proposed measure of doubtful constitutionality, impolitic and unavailing, the President proceeds:

"I have, however, in common with several of my predecessors, directed the Ministers of France and England to be assured that the United States entertain no designs against Cuba; but that, on the contrary, I should regard its incorporation into the Union at the present time as fraught with serious peril.

"Were this island comparatively destitute of inhabitants, or occupied by a kindred race, I should regard it, if voluntarily ceded by Spain, as a most desirable acquisition. But, under existing circumstances, I should look upon its incorporation into our Union as a very hazardous measure. It would bring into the Confederacy a population of a different national stock, speaking a different language, and not likely to harmonize with the other members. It would probably affect in a prejudicial manner the industrial interests of the South; and it might revive those conflicts of opinion between the different sections of the country, which lately shook the Union to its center, and which have been so happily compromised."

On the same day on which was read the message, and soon after its reading, I obtained the floor and made the proposition that five thousand copies of the message should be printed in the Spanish language. In my remarks in support of that proposition, I took occasion to express my dissent from the view of the President, that differences of race, or differences of language, or any other sort of differences, were detrimental to us as a people. I urged that diverseness was the centrifugal force in our Government which maintained the rights and authority of the States, and homogeneousness, which the President deemed so desirable, was the centripetal force which tended towards consolidation, and I then repudiated for myself the idea that this Government is capable of making happy but one race of people.

I did not then, hearing the message for the first time read by the Clerk of the House, perceive the covert fling at "different races speaking different languages."

When, by reading the message, I did perceive that fling, whose meaning has since become so pointed, I intended no speech on that account. I reflected, that there sits in the Cabinet of the President an honorable gentleman, a citizen of Louisiana, whose people are of "a different race speaking a different language," and while he was silent, well might I be. This gentleman has been honored by the people of his district with a seat in this body. They confided to him the care of their interests, and the protection of their honor. The people of Louisiana, in their sovereign capacity as a State, honored him with a seat in the Senate. They confided to him the maintenance of the dignity of that State, and the protection of its honor. If he could retain his seat in the Cabinet of a President, who would not on his demand expunge a passage disrespectful, if not insulting to the "different race speaking a different language," who had honored him with their confidence, I might hold my peace.

A day or two afterwards, we read in the papers the official report of the honorable gentleman to whom I have alluded, the Secretary of War. From this report I read an extract:

"What policy, however, it may be deemed proper to adopt in reference to the Indian tribes of Texas, California, and Oregon, is a question only of humanity or of temporary policy, as a period cannot be very remote when they will be swept before the resistless tide of emigration, which continually flows towards those countries.

"The case is different with regard to New Mexico. That Territory is so remote and inaccessible, and holds out so little inducement to emigration, that the struggle between the two races is destined, in all probability, to continue there long after it shall have ceased in every portion of the continent.

"By the last census, the total population of New Mexico, exclusive of wild Indians, is (in round numbers) sixty-one thousand souls; and its whole real estate is estimated at (in round numbers) $2,700,000.

"To protect this small population, we are compelled to maintain a large military force, at an annual expense nearly equal to one half the value of the whole real estate of the Territory. Would it not be better to induce the inhabitants to abandon a country which seems hardly fit for the habitation of civilized man, by remunerating them for their property in money, or in lands situated in more favored regions? Even if the Government paid for the property quintuple its value, it would still, merely on the score of economy, be largely the gainer by the transaction, and the troops now stationed in New Mexico would be available for the protection of other portions of our own, and the Mexican territory."

When the portion of the documents accompanying the message I have just read came to my knowledge, I determined that it was my duty to make a speech. The substantial interests of my constituents, indeed their very identity, was involved in this executive recommendation.

Though there was food for indignation in this proposition, that feeling was swallowed up in the ridicule and contempt with which it has been received in all quarters and from all parties. Indignation merged in the ridiculous. I say, however, there was food for indignation in this recommendation. If it could be carried out, what a spectacle should we see!

Passing by the preparation for departure, with the tears of bitterness and sobs that rend the heart, let us be witnesses of the exodus of the people of New Mexico. Behold the multitude! The rich, in their carriages; others in wagons and carts. See the domestic animals—the flocks and herds, the sheep and goats. The shepherd dogs are there, leading and protecting their charge. But the poor—let me direct your attention to the poor. The patient ass bears his part in the mournful procession. On this patient beast are laden the aged poor—the gray-haired widow and the man bowed with years; the mother, with child in arms, the sick, the lame, the halt, and the blind. No one in all that multitude has forgotten to bring with him his crucifix and his rosary, or his images, remembrancers of the Saviour, the Virgin, and the saints. Few are without some memento of their homes—mayhap a fragment of the cross which stands in the Campo Santo, where lie buried their fathers for two hundred years.

While this vast multitude pause on an eminence, to take a last lingering look at the land they are to behold no more forever, what is it we see? The uniform of the American army! There are the dragoons, their sabers flashing in the rays of the setting sun; the serried infantry, with their bristling bayonets; the artillery troops, with their terrible batteries. All are gallant men, who have covered themselves and their country with glory in honorable war. Who commands the army of the exodus? There is no Haynau in our army.

But were there to be an exodus, it would not be in this direction, Mr. Chairman. The people of New Mexico would flee from our limits, carefully shaking the dust from their feet, as they crossed the boundary. But I am aware that it is not necessary to lay much stress upon this matter. Indignation has been merged in the ridicule with which this proposition has been received in all sections and by all parties.

As I have said, I intended, when I became possessed of the contents of the report of the Secretary of War, to make a speech. I intended, in that speech, to display the folly of a Louisiana statesman, in recommending the depopulation of the best line for a railroad to connect the Mississippi with the Pacific, which, in my judgment, we have within our limits. I mean from the head of steamboat navigation, on the Red river, whose mouth is in Louisiana, in the direction of El Paso del Norte, to California. I intended to display the folly of a Secretary of War, in thwarting the construction of a railroad, which, on the line he proposes to yield to savage enemies, more effectually than many armies, would prevent the inroads of our Indians upon our neighbor, Mexico.

Before I could obtain the floor to submit the remarks I proposed, the second part of the documents accompanying the message of the President was laid upon our desks.

Amongst those transmitted from the Department of War, and coming from the ninth military department, which includes New Mexico, I find a letter, which I ask the indulgence of having read at the Clerk's desk:

NEW MEXICO, SANTA FE, May 27, 1852.

SIR: It may be well to premise that I consider it certain that some radical change must and will be made, in the government of this Territory, sooner or later; that the people of the United States will not consent to bear this heavy burden, endlessly, without receiving the slightest return, and without even the possibility of bettering the condition of this people. It would, therefore, seem to be a question only as to time.

I would respectfully submit the following project:

Place the Territory in the same relation to the Government of the United States that it held towards the Mexican Government before the war.

Withdraw all the troops and civil officers, and let the people elect their own civil officers, and conduct their Government in their own way, under the general supervision of our Government. It would probably assume a similar form to the one we found here in 1846, viz: a civil government, but under the entire control of the Governor. This change would be highly gratifying to this people, and I believe they would cheerfully pledge themselves never to ask for any further aid from the United States than the same appropriations that were granted to the other Territories. There would be a pronunciamiento every month or two, but these would be of no consequence, as they are very harmless when confined to Mexicans alone.

With all the economy that can be used, and exertions in agriculture, &c., so long as we hold this country, as we do now, it must be a very heavy burden to us; and there never can be the slightest return for all this outlay—not even in meliorating the condition of the people; for this distribution of public money makes them more idle and worthless. There is no possibility of any change for the better. Twenty—fifty years hence—this Territory will be precisely the same it is now. There can never be an inducement for any class of our people to come here whose example would improve this people. Speculators, adventurers, and the like, are all that will come, and their example is rather pernicious than beneficial.

No civil Government, emanating from the Government of the United States, can be maintained here without the aid of a military force; in fact, without its being virtually a military Government. I do not believe there is an intelligent man in the Territory who is not, at the present time, fully sensible of this truth. All branches of this civil government have equally failed—the executive, for want of power; the judiciary, from the total incapacity and want of principle in the juries; and the legislative, from want of knowledge—a want of identity with our institutions, and an extreme reluctance to impose taxes; so much so, that they have never even provided the means to subsist prisoners, and, consequently, felons of all kinds were running at large.

The New Mexicans are thoroughly debased and totally incapable of self-government, and there is no latent quality about them that can ever make them respectable. They have more Indian blood than Spanish, and in some respects are below the Pueblo Indians, for they are not as honest or industrious. In this remark, I allude to the lower classes; there are some educated gentlemen, with respectable families—about enough for magistrates and other official persons. There is not much increase in the population, owing to their gross depravity. I doubt if there is a tribe of Indians on the continent who are more abandoned in their commerce between the sexes than the great majority of this people.

The reduction of Government expenses was, no doubt, the primary cause of the recent disaffection. As a conquered people, they feel a natural dislike towards us; but so long as we kept them supplied with money, and they had nothing to do but revel in their vices, they were content to stifle their patriotism. It requires but very little to subsist them, and, therefore, a small pittance enables them to pass their time in idleness and vice; but that little they must have, and there is no way they can get it. The truth is, the only resource of this country is the Government money. All classes depend upon it, from the professional man and trader down to the beggar. Before we took the country, a considerable part of the population earned a scanty livelihood at the mines; but this work was abandoned directly when the Government money was scattered broadcast among them. These mines are not productive, and never can be made so, in comparison to the inexhaustible mines of California; but a part of this people managed to earn at them a few shillings a day, and that supported them. They will be obliged to return to this work again, as the only means of living, while the rest must get from the soil the few articles that are necessary for their subsistence. There can never be any profitable agriculture in this country. There is but a very small part of it that is arable land; the valleys of the few streams comprise the whole of it; and much of this cannot be cultivated, owing to the efflorescence of salt; and the residue requiring such a laborious kind of irrigation and cultivation that corn cannot be raised here for less than a dollar a bushel. But, even if it could be raised as cheap as it is in Missouri, there would be no market for it beyond the wants of the Government; and no agricultural product would ever pay transportation from this remote country.

With regard to their protection from the Indians, they would have the same that was extended to them by the Mexican Government—that is to say, permission to defend themselves. Besides, they would be much better armed than they have ever been before, and the Indians would have more respect and fear for them. There is, too, a growing disposition on the part of the Indians to remain at peace, and support themselves by cultivation. The Navajoes and Utahs are perfectly quiet, and the Apaches, the only hostile band now in the Territory, have committed no depredations within the last month, and have sent in word that they wish to make peace. If the Mexicans should act justly by the Indians, I think there would be no difficulty; but if they did not, and war should ensue, the Mexicans would always steal from the Indians quite as much as the Indians would steal from them, and thus they would be no losers in the end. On this point, too, I would remark that if this Territory was erected into a State, it would be expected that the people would take care of themselves, and they would be no better able to do it then than they are now. Again, why are we bound to give any more protection to this Territory than we give to Oregon and Utah? Those people are obliged to defend themselves against the Indians. Why should not this people do the same? I should think it would be well to give the Mexicans a liberal allowance of arms and ammunition, especially as there is a large supply here that is not worth transporting back.

It would be impossible for our troops to remain here with Mexican civil officers, for we should have to interpose in their squabbles, which would make them serious matters. There would be no danger of any attempt to throw off our sovereignty; the authorities (and they would soon be absolute) would be too much interested in getting appropriations; besides this, they would know that we could annihilate them at any time.

There would be very few Americans remain in the Territory; the number has already diminished very much. They are nearly all adventurers, not intending to reside here permanently; and, when they can no longer make money, they will soon leave. At all events, the few that would remain could take care of themselves quite as well as those did who were here before the war.

It may be thought that the abandonment of the new posts so recently established would be a great sacrifice; but it would not be so. They were built entirely by the troops, and cost but little, and labor was beneficial to the command.

I am, sir, with high respect, your obedient servant,

E. V. SUMNER,

Brevet Col., Lieut. Col. 1st Dragoons,
9th Department, in charge of executive office.

Hon. C. M. CONRAD, Secretary of War.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN, (resuming.) Mr. Chairman, when I read the atrocious libel which you have just heard, I determined to make a speech of a different character to the one I previously intended. Yet, sir, for forty-eight hours after, I did not desire to obtain the floor. When a man is filled with honest, healthful, well-grown indignation, he is apt to scatter epithets, as an ancient and barbarous people did their barbed javelins, at their foes; and although, sir, I, as the representative of an insulted and slandered people, am under no obligation to be choice in my words, or to select my expressions in speaking of an Administration to which I owe no duty or respect, yet, sir, I was not unmindful of the respect due to this House, the respect I owe myself, and my duty to the cause of the people I represent.

For forty-eight hours I did not desire to obtain the floor. My just anger rendered me unfit then to address the House.

Sir, the people I represent are grossly calumniated by the letter of Colonel Sumner, which has been adopted as an Executive document. Some of the charges are of such a character that I can hardly discuss them. So sweeping is the denunciation of the people, that it includes every man, every matron, every maiden, every child, every child in its mother's womb, and the unborn children of that unborn child.

Sir, Burke, the great Irish orator, who stamped upon the annals of the British Parliament the imprint of his wonderful ability and genius, as ineffaceably as the tracks of men in the hard rock made in ages passed away—Burke said he knew not how to draw an indictment against a whole people. Not so with the commander of the ninth military department and the Secretary of War.

"Fools rush in where angels fear to tread."

I desire to say a few words regarding the capacity of my constituents for self-government. That thing to which they have the greatest repugnance, to which they have the greatest indisposition to submit, and which they think most destructive of the liberty of the people, is the assumption by the military of the civil functions of the Government. There are members of the House, who perhaps remember that when I came here in 1850, as the agent of New Mexico, then seeking admission as a State, that there was then going on there a furious quarrel between the people and the military—a contest for power and control of civil affairs. The people claimed that the military government existed not by law, but by acquiescence, and in this, the opinions expressed by President Polk sustained them. In their memorial to Congress, the Legislature said as follows:

"In putting in operation the form of government set forth in the constitution, they believe they have done no act inconsistent with a proper respect to the Government of the United States. The form of government adopted by the people of New Mexico is set up in opposition to no government recognized by Congress, or known to the Constitution and laws, but simply takes the place, under circumstances of urgent necessity, of an unacknowledged government, which has utterly failed to protect the inhabitants of New Mexico in their dearest rights, or to preserve the plighted faith of the Government of the United States."

This was in 1850. Colonel Munroe, the then military commander and governor, maintained, by force, the existence of this repugnant government, and sent to Washington for instructions. He received them by special messenger sent from Washington to Santa Fé, on the 22d day of October, 1850. He was directed, through the Secretary of War, by the President, the constitutional commander of the Army, "to abstain from all further interference in the civil and political affairs of that country. Did he do it? He did not. His unrebuked contempt for the orders of his lawful superior has had its consequence.

In a speech delivered at the last session, I gave a full account of the military government in New Mexico. I denounced it, and the documents I then read proved the truth of my denunciations, and laid bare the shocking details of a government in which the military was supreme; in which the commanding officer was supreme—a government which harassed the people, which interfered with their religion, which disturbed congregations in the control of their own temples, which fined and imprisoned the people without the intervention of juries, which taxed them without their consent, which embezzled the taxes when collected, and which scourged them without trial. I might add to this list of enormities which have taken place under the military government. And, sir, notwithstanding the act of Congress organizing the Territory of New Mexico, giving to it a civil government, we have just heard read a recently-written letter of another commander of the ninth military department, signing himself "in charge of the Executive office."

Mr. SWEETSER. If the honorable gentleman from New Mexico will allow me, I desire to put an inquiry to him, with a view of replying to some portions of his remarks. In order that he may understand the point I desire to make, and that the House may understand it, I hope he will yield me the floor for a moment.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I will yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. SWEETSER. I desire, then, to inquire of the gentleman whether Colonel Sumner took upon himself the civil government of the Territory of New Mexico during the time that there were any civil executive officers there? I am informed, and so charge, that Colonel Sumner never undertook to meddle with the civil affairs of the Territory until after Governor Calhoun and the Secretary of the Territory, upon whom the functions of the Executive would have fallen in the absence of the Governor, had both left; that he assumed to control at the urgent request and desire of the judges of the supreme court; that prior to his assumption of the civil government of that Territory, there had been discharged from prison a large number of criminals of the most desperate character, for want of means to keep the judiciary in motion; that those criminals, who had been committed for outrages upon the inhabitants of New Mexico, after their release, became so bold in their depredations that the judges of the supreme court appealed to Colonel Sumner—there being perfect anarchy in the country—to assume the entire jurisdiction and control of the Territory; that he did so in view of the urgency of the occasion, upon consultation with the judges of the supreme court, and that he yielded it the moment there was anybody to assume civil jurisdiction there. I am aware that there was afterwards a conflict between the judges of the supreme court and Colonel Sumner, who assumed entire jurisdiction of the country, or in other words, to enforce law and order there through the instrumentality of the bayonet. It originated in this way: A notorious criminal, who had invaded the rights of the New Mexicans to such an extent that there was danger of the people forming a mob for their defense, was imprisoned by order of Colonel Sumner. A judge of the supreme court issued a habeas corpus and discharged the criminal, who was at the time intoxicated; Colonel Sumner promptly arrested the criminal, and made an order that no criminal in future should be set at liberty whilst he was drunk, and enforced it. The judges complained that the Colonel had suspended the habeas corpus act. I shall be prepared by-and-by, if it becomes necessary, to justify Colonel Sumner in that act.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Upon that I take the floor. If the gentleman is prepared to justify an officer of the Army in doing that, I should like to hear the justification.

Mr. SWEETSER. The country was in a state of revolution. There was no civil authority there that was effective for any purpose, and, in my judgment, it was no time for the judges to quibble about a shadow. I am prepared to justify Colonel Sumner in that, and all other acts by him done, to save the inhabitants from robbery and murder.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Sir, I appeal from Colonel Sumner "in charge of the executive office;" I appeal from Colonel Sumner, the proconsul, to Colonel Sumner in the discharge of his legitimate military duties.

Mr. SWEETSER. I hope the gentleman will answer my question.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I will do so now, in the course of my remarks, if consistent with my time and arrangements. At all events, I will answer.

After Secretary Allen had left New Mexico, and before Governor Calhoun had done so, Colonel Sumner, in conjunction with the Governor, published in the Gazette at Santa Fé, and, I presume, otherwise made public, the following:

TO THE PUBLIC.

It is hereby announced that no interregnum will take place in the office of Governor of this Territory. If Governor Calhoun should be obliged to leave for the States before the arrival of the Hon. Secretary of the Territory, the military authority of this Department will so far take charge of the Executive office as to make the preservation of law and order absolutely certain.

Given at Santa Fé, this 21st day of April, 1852.

J. S. CALHOUN,
Governor of the Territory of New Mexico.
E. V. SUMNER,
Br't Col. U. S. A., Com'g 9th Mil. Dep.

SANTA FE, April 24, 1852.

The meaning of this, as understood at the time by the judges of the supreme court, by the Indian agents, and by Colonel Sumner himself, was, that he was to give, should it be needed, to the civil government aid and support, and not that he was to seize upon, as he did do, all the powers of the civil government, executive, legislative, and judicial.

The bill of rights declared by the Legislature of New Mexico, and approved on the 12th of July, 1851, by James S. Calhoun, Governor, contains the following provisions:

"SEC. 7. The people shall be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and possessions from all unreasonable seizures or searches; and no warrant to search any place, or seize any person or thing, shall issue, without describing them as near as may be, nor without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation."

"SEC. 10. The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, except when, in case of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it."

"SEC. 15. No citizen of this Territory shall be deprived of his life, liberty, property, or privileges, outlawed, exiled, or in any manner disfranchised, except by due course of the law of the land."

"SEC. 16. The military shall at all times be subordinate to the civil authority."

When Colonel Sumner established a proconsulate in New Mexico, he violated the bill of rights of the people, and the law of Congress establishing a civil government in that Territory.

The honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SWEETSER,] says the judges of the supreme court earnestly invited him to do this, and the honorable gentleman thinks this to be the case, else he had not charged it. For aught I know, Colonel Sumner may have written to him to that effect. If this is so, I must yet be permitted to doubt. Not that I mean by this to assail the veracity of the gallant Colonel, but I mean distinctly to say that upon his appreciation of distinctions, upon the lucubrations of his mind, upon his generalizations from individual facts, I have no reliance whatever.

Colonel Sumner is a gallant officer, who gained laurels honestly in the services of his country. Could I, I would not strip them from him. The obtuseness of his intellect, however, is well known. When he was assigned to an independent command, the Army, without gaining an administrative officer, lost the services of one of its best executive officers. I would risk obtaining a verdict to this effect before a jury of officers of the Army of his own selection. He has an obtuse intellect.

The honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SWEETSER,] says the judges of the supreme court earnestly and urgently invited the Colonel to assume entire control. He has also alluded to the notorious fact, that when Sumner issued an order suspending the habeas corpus, the judges remonstrated. But the honorable gentleman says this was a subsequent affair. I apprehend that the remonstrance of the judges took place as soon as the order came to their knowledge.

The honorable gentleman is under the impression that the judges earnestly requested Colonel Sumner to take control because there was entire anarchy in the country. Can this be so? There were but two judges in New Mexico at the time—Judges Watts and Mower. From the latter I happen to have received a letter of date May 25, 1852, written from Soccorro, from which I read an extract:

"The affairs of this Territory are in a most critical situation, owing to the absence of the Secretary, the death of the Governor, which is daily expected, and the assumption of the civil power by the military commander. Yet there is no danger of revolution, as talked of so much in Santa Fé. The people have no desire to rise, and the Pueblos are all quiet. The so much celebrated emeute (which never took place) in Santa Fé," &c.

Again, in the postscript to the same letter, Judge Mower says:

"Whatever you may hear about a revolution in this Territory, do not believe it. There is no truth in it. You know the power and wealth of the country is in the Rio Abajo, and I have talked with nearly every rich man in the valley, and they laugh at every such idea. They say, however much a few discontented spirits may desire it, they have not the means or spirit to prosecute it. General Armijo says that he will send his head to the President if there is an attempt overt to raise insurrection." * * * "They can do nothing, and they know it. Besides, the well informed people prefer American to Mexican rule."

This letter is dated May 25th; the letter of Sumner, which the Executive has adopted, May 27th, only two days apart.

Is it possible that the judges—recollect there were but two of them in the country—invited Colonel Sumner to take entire control, as the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEETSER] supposes? Is it possible that they did so, because anarchy prevailed throughout the country? I have no letters from Judge Watts of that date, but I apprehend that he did not urgently and earnestly solicit Colonel Sumner to take control.

In reference to the anarchy which it is charged prevailed in New Mexico, I will read extracts from a letter of a Mexican gentleman. The original is in Spanish. It is dated June 28th, 1852. I read a larger extract from this letter than is necessary to resolve the question of anarchy or no anarchy:

"A long experience has given the people of New Mexico an opportunity of knowing their fellow-citizens, notwithstanding (some) consider them distinguished by castes or races. The New Mexicans consider all rational men as equals; inhabitants of the country consider themselves entitled to the same rights, and are only distinguished by their good or bad actions. We look upon a Frenchman the same as upon a North American, an Irishman, a German, or a Mexican.

"If some unfortunate occurrences have taken place in this country, by unforeseen circumstances, they have been the result of accident, or causes forced upon us. The death of Skinner and others was sought out and hastened on by themselves. Their own imprudence has consigned them to their graves, leaving us the sad mementos humanity impresses on our minds.

"It is certain, very certain, that these misfortunes were not premeditated attempts to raise a fratricidal arm, but have taken place in disturbances created by themselves, in which they imposed upon our citizens, and took up arms to abuse them. It must be confessed, that self defense is a natural gift implanted in the heart of man, and that in desperate cases there is no reflection, especially among men of little education." * * * * * * *

"In April last several Santa Fé merchants, in company with the Secretary, Doniciano Vigil, (Secretary under the military government,) 'took it into their heads to dream of a revolution.' They actually spread the information in every direction, until it came to the knowledge of the military commander. The object was to procure customers in Santa Fé and other places, and to restore to their previous civil and military positions the brethren of that extraordinary administration, but" * * * * * * *

"Governor Calhoun and other friends will be able to give you further information on the subject. * * *

"Governor Calhoun left for the States about the 1st of May in very ill health. May God restore it to him again, and enable him to return to exercise his duties with his accustomed honesty." * * * * * * *

"Have the goodness to place me at the feet of your lady, and salute the children."

But, Mr. Chairman, I have not done with this point yet. I now call Colonel Sumner to the stand. I appeal from Sumner, the proconsul, to Sumner, the Colonel, in the discharge of his legitimate military duties. I do not read the letters entire; the extracts, however—for I have only extracts in my possession—can be perused by any member who desires it, and I doubt not access can be had to the entire correspondence in the War Department. I read from an official letter from the headquarters near Albuquerque, dated April 9th, 1852:

"In addition to this report (about Indians) there are constant rumors of disaffection in the Mexican population, until any one not conversant with affairs here would suppose that we were on the eve of a rebellion. The Governor and I, although differing on many points, have agreed upon this: that there is nothing whatever to apprehend from the Mexicans, if they are treated properly. As a proof that we are right, several of the principal and most influential Mexicans have sent large trains to the United States this spring for goods, while others are preparing to go to California, intending to leave their families and property here.

"I believe that most of these stories originated with some unprincipled Americans, or if they do not create them they distort and exaggerate them for the purpose of keeping up this excitement. It is my deliberate opinion, that there are some men in this Territory who will stick at nothing to increase the expenditures of Government. All this would be of no consequence, except that such reports have the tendency to verify themselves, by creating distrust and serving to alienate the different classes from one another. If from this cause, or any other, a difficulty should arise with the Mexicans during an interregnum in the office of Governor, I should be compelled to assume the functions of that office."

I submit that here is nothing of a derogatory character to the Mexicans, nor is there in the whole letter—nor is there generally to the Americans—some of them only are represented as disturbers of the public peace. Not a word is there here about Mexican pronunciamientos every month or two. In the letter which was read by the Clerk, all the Mexicans and all the Americans are denounced together. Do not forget that this was after his usurpation of dictatorial functions, in which he had been opposed by the judges, Indian agents, and people.

Again, in another official letter to the Adjutant General, dated at Santa Fé, April 22d, 1852, but thirty-five days before the proconsul letter, Colonel Sumner says:

"As the Governor was extremely ill, and evidently very apprehensive of serious difficulty, I thought proper to come up here at once. I saw no appearance of disaffection as I passed through the country, and I think if there is anything in these rumors, it is confined to the lower classes, instigated, perhaps, by a few desperate, unprincipled gamblers and speculators, who have everything to gain and nothing to lose by fomenting commotions." * * * *

"On my arrival in this town," (Santa Fé,) "I found it in a state of anarchy. All prisoners had been released for want of means to subsist them, and all law seemed to be set at naught. At the same time there was a constant dread of revolution, which kept up a feverish excitement that was likely every moment to lead to some collision with the Mexicans. I saw that it was necessary to take measures immediately to repress all this disorder, and I said to the Governor that I the thought proper to ask for military aid, that I would give it at once." * * * * *

"I have established a military police, to act in support of the civil authorities. These measures will, I think, secure the quiet of this town. The extreme illness of the Governor, and the absence of the Secretary of the Territory, have had some influence in producing this state of things, and it was evidently necessary to announce to the public that there would be no interregnum.

"In a conversation with the Governor on this subject, we determined to publish the enclosed paper, No. 3," [I have read it to the House,] "which will, I think, effectually crush the hopes of all intriguers. I am fully aware that I am placing myself in a most critical position, but the path of duty seems to me plain, and I shall take the risk."

In this letter there is no general denunciation of the people. The suspected disturbers of the public peace were "confined to the lower classes," (of Mexicans), "instigated, perhaps, by a few desperate, unprincipled gamblers and speculators, who have everything to gain and nothing to lose by fomenting commotions." Thirty-five days after, all together are denounced. In the extract I have read is the testimony of Colonel Sumner, that out of Santa Fé no anarchy prevailed—that all was quiet out of Santa Fé, and that in that town only such confusion and excitement existed as was quieted by aid and support of the civil officers.

I may as well mention now what I have failed to mention heretofore. Besides astounding the judges by suspending the habeas corpus, Colonel Sumner also waked up the Indian agents by assuming control of their functions. He added to his titles the words "ex officio Superintendent of Indian Affairs." At this stage of affairs his signature was most elaborate—I will give it to you, Mr. Chairman: "E. V. Sumner, Brevet Colonel, and Lieutenant Colonel First Dragoons, commanding ninth military department, in charge of Executive office, and ex officio Superintendent of Indian affairs."

The correspondence between the Indian agents, J. Greiner and S. M. Baird, and the Colonel, are on file in the Indian Department.

Now I ask, inasmuch as all was quiet out of Santa Fé and military aid and support of the civil authorities was all that was necessary to insure quiet in that town, what excuse was there for Colonel Sumner in seizing upon the reins of government, in spite of people, Indian agents, and judiciary? Why, during an interregnum, could he not content himself with doing his duty by giving aid and support to the civil officers? In his proconsul letter, Colonel Sumner speaks of a recent disaffection among the Mexicans. He does not say among the Mexicans, but the context indicates that he so intends. What was that "recent disaffection?"

I will here say that the opinions and conduct of the people of New Mexico in this very matter, of which Colonel Sumner speaks as "disaffection," plainly shows that they understand better the true spirit of our Government than the officer who has ventured to pass judgment on their knowledge and capacity. In what did the "disaffection" consist? When Governor Calhoun had left the country, when Secretary Allen had left the country, the Mexicans thought that they, the people, might properly meet together and designate some one of their choice to administer the Executive office until one or other of the only two officers designated by the law of Congress to exercise those functions should return to the country. The suspected object of these meetings was for this purpose. This was suspected. I do not suspect. I admit this to have been the object of those meetings. The people thought that under a republican Government, the right of designating a temporary Executive belonged to them. Colonel Sumner calls this disaffection.

But, sir, a rule to which no one would raise an objection elsewhere is not to be tolerated in New Mexico. Is this because they are "a foreign race, speaking a foreign language?"

Now, I ask any Delegate on this floor, if their Governor and their Secretary left their posts, and it became necessary to have a temporary Executive, who would designate that temporary Executive, the people or the officer of the Army highest in rank in the country? Would any officer of the Army in your Territories set up such a claim? Would he dare to do it?

Imagine such a claim set up in Oregon, and the officer in command of the troops preparing to back his claim by action, and what would we see? Why, the people in arms, running together and electing as their leader their worthy Delegate. And I venture the assertion that he would abate the insolent claim, or drive the arrogant disturbers of the public peace into the sea.

But in New Mexico, we are a "foreign race, speaking a foreign language," under the ban of an Executive which, for purposes of its own, permitted without rebuke the establishment of a proconsulate within the limits of this Republic, and has permitted the flag of the United States to be associated in the minds of the people I represent with injustice, wrong, and tyranny. We may not assert our political rights by arms, as others may, against an usurping officer of the Army, without our loyalty to the Government being suspected by the people of the United States, and our motives being misunderstood. Our hope has been in the constitutional Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. We have been disappointed. No orders, obedience to which has been enforced, have protected us from assumption by the military or civil functions.

I wish to place this matter on broad grounds, and I lay down this proposition, and call to it the attention of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Sweetser,] to whom I take this opportunity of expressing my regret for the unbecoming warmth of manner I exhibited when he interrupted me the second time. I am so unused to public speaking, and interruptions so break in upon the thread of my remarks, that I can hardly again resume it. I beg the gentleman's indulgence.

The proposition I make is this: that in case of death, or from any other cause, the Executive office becomes vacant, and the law designates no successor, that the right to fill the temporary vacancy rests alone with the people. The vacating officer cannot nominate his successor by last will and testament, or otherwise, nor can the judiciary select the successor, nor the vacating officer and judiciary conjoined. Under our form of government, this right resides with the people, and with them alone.

I will support this proposition by a single supposed case.

Suppose that the recent railroad disaster, which resulted in the regretted death of the only son of General Pierce, had also caused the death of the President elect; and further, suppose that the universally-beloved Vice President elect should be shipwrecked while on his health-seeking voyage to Cuba. These two deaths occurring before the 4th day of March next, and the Constitution fails to designate the President, it casts this high office upon no one. Who, in such a case, would be in charge of the Executive office? The Commander-in-Chief of the Army, in virtue of his office, or the people of the United States? Who, in all the nation, would tolerate that the Commander-in-Chief should seize the reins of Government, and treat as disaffection the desire of the people and States, or their representatives, from choosing a temporary President? Is not the Commander-in-Chief of the Army the last officer in the Government who, by virtue of his office, would be permitted to make such an assumption? Would it be permitted if the judges of the Supreme Court, extra-judicially or judicially, should earnestly and urgently ask the Commander-in-Chief to do so? I answer, No. Such matters pertain to the people alone.

How salutary a thing would it have been in New Mexico, if Colonel Sumner, instead of seizing upon the government himself, had given military aid and support to a temporary executive officer designated by the people. How convincing would this have been to the people there that the Government of the United States is what it professes to be, a Government not of force, but of law.

The quarrel between the people and their legitimate civil officers on the one side, and the military on the other, has been one of long standing. It began in 1849. Many will recollect the correspondence between Manuel Alvarez, the choice of the people, and Colonel Munroe, regarding the contest for civil power, in 1850. From that time to this, with occasional lulls, the contest has been kept up; not only during the administration of Governor Calhoun, not only during the interregnum, but also since the arrival in New Mexico of the successor of Governor Calhoun. The contest has been kept up in interregnums and not in interregnums, despite the law of Congress establishing a civil government in New Mexico.

Colonel Sumner, in his proconsul letter, has said that civil government in New Mexico is a failure; that the proper government for that country is one under military supervision, and as far as in him lies, it seems he intends making this out. Governor Lane, soon after his arrival in Santa Fé, fell into the same difficulties against which Governor Calhoun had to contend. The substance of the complaint of Governor Lane is, that the military are endeavoring, or I should rather say Colonel Sumner is endeavoring, to thwart the successful operation of the civil government. The correspondence which took place between them if not now, soon will be in this city. It was transmitted to the President by the mail which left Santa Fé on the 1st of December.

The old quarrel between the civil and military is now—now—going on in New Mexico, with all the heat of 1850, and this Administration, in my judgment, is responsible for the insubordination of the military to the laws of the country in New Mexico.

I have shown you, Mr. Chairman, how it is that Colonel Sumner became soured towards the people I represent—how, within a month, he changed his opinion of them. I will now show you how he fell out with the soil or land in New Mexico. He says in his proconsul letter that the land is fit for nothing. Colonel Sumner's first acquaintance with New Mexico began in 1846, when General Kearny took possession of the country. He was there about three months. While there he saw the growing crops, and when assigned to the command of the ninth department last year, he cheerfully undertook to establish farms, to be cultivated by the soldiers. He was enthusiastic. The Mexicans were to be learnt a thing or two about agriculture. He laid in his seeds, the usual assortment of improved plows and hoes, together with all the modern improved implements and machines for the most advanced state of agriculture in New or Old England—amongst the rest hydraulic rams, and a practical farmer from Massachusetts. All these having been transported to New Mexico, were clapped down rigidly upon a country, where irrigation is one of the indispensable incidents of cultivation. What was the result? You know, Mr. Chairman—a failure. It became evident to Sumner that something was the matter. Sumner laid it on the land. I reckon if the land could speak, it would lay it on Sumner.

Besides farming, the Secretary of War thought cattle-raising would be a good military idea for New Mexico. Sumner said he could do it. He accordingly selected Durhams as the proper breed. All who know anything of this breed, know that they require the richest herbage. The best pastures of the most fertile States alone can support them. In Virginia and Maryland they cannot, with advantage, be grazed.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, how this experiment turned out. I suppose the Durhams are all dead. If they are not, New Mexico is a fine grazing country.

But in reference to the capabilities of the country, I refer to the honorable gentleman from Oregon, who traveled through it. He can give to the House information on which it can rely, and I hope he will take an early opportunity of doing so.

I would not like, Mr. Chairman, to subject myself to the odium of likening the intellect of any member of the Legislature of New Mexico to that of Colonel Sumner. In the proconsul letter he says:

"On this point, too, I would remark, that if this Territory was erected into a State, it would be expected that the people would take care of themselves, and they would be no better able to do it then than they are now. Again, why are we bound to give any more protection to this Territory than we give to Oregon and Utah? Those people are obliged to defend themselves against the Indians. Why should not this people do the same?"

The Colonel evidently thinks that the people of the States ought to do their own fighting, and that the people of the Territories ought to do their own fighting.

As the States and Territories comprise the whole United States, I ask in the name of all that is stupid, if this is the case, what do we want with an Army? Why do we spend millions of the public money in maintaining an Army, if the people of the States and the people of the Territories are to defend themselves?

Again, the Colonel says:

"It would be impossible for our troops to remain here with Mexican civil officers, for we should have to interpose in their squabbles, which would make them serious matters."

Whether the "which would make them serious matters" is intended as the reason for or the consequence of the interposition, does not appear. But when did it become one of the duties of the military to interpose in civil squabbles? I will not dwell on this point.

One of the remarks in the proconsul letter induces me to imagine, and I am sorry so to do, that the gallant Colonel has not been as discreet as his friends would desire, in the selection of his female acquaintances in New Mexico. His acquaintances have been injudiciously selected and he has generalized too much. I remember reading of a Chinese savant, who, while traveling in England, before the days of steam, was rowed across the Thames in a wherry, by a man who had lost a leg. In handing out the baggage of the Chinese, the boatman put his wooden leg in the water and kept his natural foot on the dry land. The Chinese, struck with the convenience of the thing, communicated to the brother of the Sun and Moon, that in England he had observed a practice which might be introduced with advantage into the empire—he referred to the employment of the wooden-legged men in rowing the boats. He concluded by saying, that he would not presume to suggest whether it would be best to order the wooden legged men into the boat business, or to cut off a leg of those already engaged in it. The Chinese generalized; so has Sumner—the Chinese communicated his generalization to his Government; so has Sumner.

This man, Mr. Chairman, is just what I have represented him to be—gallant, stupid, and generalizing.

But, Mr. Chairman, for the continuance of the quarrel between the military and the civil power in New Mexico, I hold this Administration responsible. That the military, or some of them, have lost sight of their due subordination to the civil power, is justly chargeable on the Administration. The unrebuked neglect of Colonel Munroe to obey his orders "to cease all further interference in the civil and political affairs of New Mexico," has encouraged and promoted other military aggressions on the civil and political rights of the people. Why is it, that having encouraged, by its want of decision, a state of exasperation between the military and the people, the testimony of the former to the character of the latter is eagerly seized upon by the Administration, and transmitted to Congress? Is the War Department the quarter from which we might naturally look for information concerning the civil affairs of the Territories? It is worthy of note that but an insignificant portion of the letters selected for transmission to Congress from the commander of the ninth department relates to military affairs. The operations of the army in New Mexico against the political rights of the people, seem to have more interest in the eyes of the Administration than those against their enemies, the Indians. Why is it that information regarding the civil affairs of New Mexico is not sought from civil sources? Why is there nothing concerning the character of the people coming from the late Governor, James S. Calhoun? I know he entertained the most kindly feelings towards the people, and favorable opinions of their capacity and aptitude in appreciating the spirit and true principles of our Government. He always sustained and defended the popular rights against military aggression. The people of New Mexico appreciated the character of Governor Calhoun, and long will his memory be held in affectionate remembrance among them. Why, I ask, are not the views of Governor Calhoun concerning the people of New Mexico communicated to Congress? Why have we nothing from his successor, Governor Lane? My letters from that gentleman indicate no opinions derogatory to the people, but, on the contrary, express hopes of extended usefulness among them. He has been among them long enough to see into the settled hostility of the military to the successful working of a civil government not under "military supervision." The testimony of those who think well and kindly of the people, is rejected. It conflicts with an obvious purpose, which is apparent in the message and documents: to blot, blur, and disfigure those pages in the history of the country on which are recorded the brilliant administration of President Polk.

During the last session, Mr. Chairman, in defense of Governor Calhoun, and incidentally of the people of New Mexico, I made a speech, much of which, as reported on that occasion, was not delivered in the House. I was interrupted by the Speaker's hammer. The portion I now read was not said in the heat of debate, but calmly written in the closet:

"I cannot close my remarks without saying a few words of denial of the charges which have been directed against the people I represent. Should I close my remarks without speaking in their behalf, I would be unmindful of the courtesies, and kindness, and hospitality, I have invariably received in every part of New Mexico, and be unworthy to represent a people who, with frankness and confidence, have trusted to me to represent their true condition, and promote their interest and happiness. The people of New Mexico have been represented as entertaining feelings of deadly hostility towards native-born citizens of the United States, which makes their lives unsafe in New Mexico—that the New Mexicans are on the very eve of revolt against the Government of the United States. So help me Heaven, Mr. Speaker, this is all untrue. I assert it to be untrue on my responsibility as a representative, and honor as a gentleman. Were it true, the Governor of New Mexico had long since exposed it, and I would not be here as the representative of such a people. But these are my assertions—I would convince your reason." * * * *

"The picture which has been presented of my constituents by the old adherents of the military government, is false in coloring, and untrue in details. I have never met in any part of the United States, people more hospitable, more law-abiding, more kind, more generous, more desirous of improvement."

Mr. Chairman, were I to arrive in Las Vegas, the frontier village of New Mexico, hungry and athirst, on foot and in rags, without money in my purse, I would knock with confidence at the doors, and my wants would be supplied. Few in all the Territory would turn me from their doors. When I continued my journey, sir, it would no longer be on foot, it would no longer be in rags; my needs would all be supplied, and without money and without price, I could travel throughout the country. Many times my entertainment might be simple—rude indeed, but it would be offered ungrudgingly.

Can I be recreant to the interests and honor of such a people, Mr. Chairman? By their wrongs will I stand by them.

Colonel Sumner has been the recipient of the hospitalities of honorable and refined New Mexican gentlemen, whose houses are the abiding places of chaste matrons and innocent maidens; and the letter you have heard read is the return he has made for those hospitalities. Would you do that, Mr. Chairman? Would I? No, sir. I would rather be a Secretary of War, and retain my seat in the Cabinet of a President who insults the generous constituency who had honored me with their confidence.

Colonel Sumner, who has given a picture of Mexican manners, is in no position to see but rarely anything of domestic life as it really exists in New Mexico. Sidney Smith, in accounting for the bearish deportment of John Bull while traveling on the continent, says, "John is so satisfied with himself because he has Magna Charta and trial by jury, that he thinks it is not necessary for him to attend to small behavior." Jonathan, the kinsman of John, it must be confessed, is not unmindful that he has trial by jury and institutions which throw Magna Charta in the shade. Proud as John and Jonathan are, they are no prouder than the Spaniards, and not near so sensitive. They are no prouder than the Indian, and not near so reserved.

While thousands of my constituents are of pure Spanish descent, others, I believe the large majority, have in their veins the blood of the Spaniard and the Indian, mingled generations ago. What of shame attaches to this? My constituents need not be ashamed of their blood. They are descended from the Spaniards, who, by their courage and enterprise, peopled a continent—who maintained a contest with the Moors for an hundred and fifty years, and finally drove them from their midst. When Napoleon appeared to have subdued all Europe, and all seemed lost, Pitt, the English statesman, expressed his reliance on Spanish game for a renewal of the contest, and was not disappointed. The conquest of Mexico by Cortez, and his gallant few, savors more of romance than reality, and in the infuriate resistance of the Aztecs was displayed valor which, though unavailing, has never been surpassed.

From these are my constituents descended, and of their stock they need never be ashamed; and should the army be withdrawn from New Mexico, as Colonel Sumner proposes, and the people supplied with arms, and but half the amount now necessary to maintain the troops there, be for a few years appropriated for the support of volunteers from New Mexico, my constituents will demonstrate that they are not unworthy sons of noble sires.

I commend this proposition to general attention. It is economical, which should commend it to Congress, and it will meet with great favor in New Mexico, as, if carried out, it would at once relieve the people from the molestations of the army, and they would soon relieve themselves from those of the Indians.

I have said my constituents are a proud, reserved, and sensitive people. You can readily imagine, Mr. Chairman, that their reserve and sensitiveness have not been diminished by the war which resulted in the transfer of their country and allegiance. Think you, sir, that a man whose every attitude is an assumption of superiority, and every gesture an indication of contempt, will ever be admitted into the hearts of such a people?—that he can ever see their good qualities? No, sir! he will meet cold politeness and dignified reserve, but catch no glimpse of the hearts or domestic life of such a people.

There is another view of the outrage of which the people of New Mexico have been the subjects, to which I will draw your attention. The letter of Colonel Sumner, which has been adopted by this Administration, and which has been read by the Clerk, is the report of an officer of the Army, not about military matters, but is chiefly devoted to giving an account of the character and habits of the people among whom he happened to be stationed.

Sir, in the year 1848, during the administration of President Polk, the Constitution of the United States gathered New Mexico under its protecting wings; yes, sir, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings; and my constituents have as broad political rights as if each one of them were a Secretary of War, and are entitled to as much consideration and immunity from Executive insult as the people of any portion of the country. Imagine, if you can, Mr. Chairman, an officer of the Army, stationed in Virginia, instead of occupying himself with his military duties, to sit down and, without instruction or encouragement—ay, sir, there's the rub—without instructions or encouragement—to communicate to the Department of War his views concerning the people of Virginia; their modes of life, their customs, and their habits of thought—about the slavery question, for instance. I imagine he would promptly be reminded that the character of his duties was military, and that his conduct was improper and unbecoming.

But, suppose further, sir, that the Secretary of War, forgetful of the object of the Department over which he presides, should, through the President, transmit to Congress the letter of the officer. What would the people of Virginia do in such a case? They would demand of the Executive that the officer who committed this outrage should be ordered out of their State, and that he should never again do duty within the limits of the Old Dominion; and if their demand was not complied with, they would thrust him from their borders. Committed within South Carolina, how would boil the blood of the Huguenots, which has given its characteristics to that whole State? How would such an indignity be received in the Territories of Oregon or Minnesota? How in the States of Texas or Florida? But towards States which are represented, or Territories whose people are bound by the ties of consanguinity to the people of the States, such an outrage might not with impunity be attempted. The unrestrained valor of this Administration is reserved for an unrepresented people, with no ties of consanguinity with the mass of the people of the United States—"a foreign race speaking a foreign language." But, Mr. Chairman, this outrage is no less committed in New Mexico than in Virginia, South Carolina, Florida, Texas, Oregon, or Minnesota. The people of New Mexico are citizens of the United States, and stand on soil consecrated by the Constitution. In that instrument are made no invidious distinctions of race or language. The rights, privileges, and immunities of the people of New Mexico are as broad and perfect as of the people of any other portion of the Union, and I, their Delegate, claim them for them.

When I look back, I remember many things which, at the time of their occurrence, pained, distressed, and wounded me.

Mr. Chairman, I have never been able to wring from this Administration one solitary appointment in New Mexico which the people of that country might look upon as given to conciliate or in respect for them. In 1850, when the civil government was organized, I urged the appointment of Mr. Manuel Alvarez, a high-minded, honorable gentleman, as Secretary of the Territory. I urged his appointment, on the ground that he was well-qualified for the office—that he spoke both the Spanish and the English languages—that the people had recently expressed through the ballot-box their confidence in him—and that his appointment would be esteemed by them as an evidence of kindness and of respect for their wishes.

Mr. Alvarez was not nominated, but, instead, Mr. Hugh N. Smith. As soon as this was known to me, I earnestly appealed to the Administration to withdraw the nomination of Mr. Smith, and to substitute Mr. Alvarez in his stead. I urged that in the same election in which the people had honored Mr. Alvarez they had condemned Mr. Smith. He had just been defeated before the people, and they must feel that the setting aside of Mr. Alvarez, whom they had honored, to make room for Mr. Smith, whom they had repudiated, as indicative of disregard to their wishes, and was but little calculated to attach them to the United States. Aside from all this, I urged that Mr. Smith was a political agitator, and had addressed to the people of New Mexico a pamphlet calculated to indoctrinate them with fanatical sentiments in regard to the slavery question. All in vain, Mr. Chairman; these appeals were disregarded.

When Mr. Smith was rejected by the Senate, I again urged the claims of Mr. Alvarez in vain, sir; in vain. I have never been able to wring from this Administration a solitary appointment of a Mexican, not even for a postmaster. Search the Blue Book, Mr. Chairman.

Had I desired to impress the people of New Mexico with the idea that the Government and people of the United States looked upon them with repugnance and contempt, I would have done as this Administration has done. Did I desire to keep the people of New Mexico in a state of uneasiness and alarm, I would not rebuke the officer who neglected to obey my order to "cease all further interference with the civil and political affairs" of the people. This would encourage other military aggressions, Mr. Chairman. Did I desire to drive them to despair, I would recommend that they should be torn from the homes of their fathers. Did I desire to blacken the character of the people of New Mexico, and thereby convince the people of the United States that the territorial accessions made during the Administration of a political adversary were useless or baneful, I could get no stronger testimony than from them, who, for three years, have been the unrestrained adversaries of the people.

Easily to be discerned from the acts of this Administration is the object of disfiguring those pages of the history of the country on which are recorded the administration of President Polk. Shining monuments of the glory of the country are the successful prosecution of the war with Mexico, and the grand accessions of territory consummated in that Administration.

The treaty of peace and limits between the United States and Mexico provided, among other things, for the appointment of Commissioners to mark the boundary between the two Republics. Well, sir, our Commissioner, with a liberality truly astounding, assents to fixing the initial point on the Rio Grande, above El Paso, at a point so far north as to yield of our Territory a piece of country larger than the State of Massachusetts. Well, sir, Mr. Gray, the surveyor, protests against this proceeding, and refuses to sanction it by his signature. What is then done, sir? Why, the Administration dismiss—who, sir? Mr. Bartlett? No, sir; Mr. Gray. This is not all, sir. Colonel James D. Graham refuses to put his instruments on this line, declaring that it is not the treaty line, and he is recalled, sir.

Both Colonel Graham and Mr. Gray have declared that the line as proposed to be run by the Commissioner, sustained by the Administration, was not the true treaty line. Congress by its legislation has declared that it is not the treaty line, and besides, sir, the Mexicans by their acts have declared that, as they understand it, it is not the treaty line. On the right bank of the Rio Grande below Doña Ana, there is a town called Mesilla, containing about one thousand souls, which has been settled since the treaty of peace by Mexicans, who, until Mr. Bartlett informed them to the contrary, supposed themselves in the United States. It is needless for me to inform this House that Mr. Bartlett has been sustained by this Administration.

Another of the acquisitions intended by the administration of President Polk, was the Island of Cuba, by peaceable and honorable means—by treaty with Spain. President Polk, acting in entire unison with the national feeling, indicated to Spain, in the usual and only mode known to our laws and Constitution, that the United States, to acquire possession of an island so important to her in a military and commercial point of view, was willing to pay to Spain for her relinquishment of that island in favor of the United States, the sum of $100,000,000. What was done by the Administration in this matter? As if for the purpose of forever thwarting the peaceable acquisition of Cuba, and of throwing obloquy upon the administration of Mr. Polk, the President, losing patriotism in partisanship, without a shadow of excuse, published to the world secret and confidential correspondence, which should forever have reposed in the State Department, under the safeguard of the national honor. The presidential office is perpetual—the incumbents only are changed. The secrets pertaining to the office have been divulged. Letters, confidential in their character, and others marked confidential, have been divulged.

Besides divulging the confidential instructions of our Government to its own foreign Ministers, there have been betrayed the secret communications which at foreign Courts have been confided to our Ministers. I will draw attention, Mr. Chairman, to but one of these letters, and of that I will read only the first paragraph. It needs no comment:

"SIR: The inclosed copy of a confidential dispatch addressed to the Minister of State, by the Conde de la Alcudia, Spanish Minister at London, was handed me to-day by a private friend, and may be depended on as authentic. As the communication was made to me in the strictest confidence, and as the document is in itself unsuitable for the press, I take the liberty of transmitting it to you—for the President's information—in the form of a private letter, and request that it may not be placed on the public files of the Department of State."

This letter and its inclosure were made public, to blot, to blur, to disfigure, those pages of the history of the country on which are recorded the events of the administration of President Polk. Unrebuked by the people of the country, such betrayals stain the national honor.

Mr. Chairman, in his message the President says, speaking of Cuba: "I should regard its incorporation into the Union, at the present time, as fraught with serious peril."

Here, sir, we are left to infer that at some future time the President will be in favor of its incorporation into the Union. Let us see when he will be. The President proceeds:

"Were this island comparatively destitute of inhabitants, or occupied by a kindred race, I should regard it, if voluntarily ceded by Spain, as a most desirable acquisition. But under existing circumstances, I should look upon its incorporation into the Union as a very hazardous measure. It would bring into the Confederacy a population of a different national stock, speaking a different language, and not likely to harmonize with the other members."

If this means anything, it means that the President will be in favor of the annexation of Cuba when its inhabitants, the Spaniards, shall die. Then, sir, will the President be in favor of Cuban annexation, and not till then. In other words, Mr. Chairman, he never will be in favor of it.

It is worthy of remark, sir, that the argument about "kindred races," while it cuts off Cuban and all Mexican annexation, favors Canadian annexation.

But, sir, the aim of this Administration to disfigure those pages of the country's history on which are recorded the events of the administration of President Polk, by depopulating and abandoning New Mexico; by giving away to Mexico a portion of our territory, or by defeating the peaceful annexation of Cuba, is all in vain, sir—all in vain. This, nor any other Administration, can prevent the natural, healthy growth of this young nation.

Mr. William Darby, one of the most eminent statisticians in the country, has eliminated that the steady, uniform rate of increase in population in the United States, is thirty-three and a third per cent. every ten years. Adopting for the future, what has been constant in the past, we arrive at the result that in fifty years our population will exceed one hundred millions of souls!

Some time since, desirous of availing myself of this gentleman's great experience and knowledge, I addressed him a letter in regard to the rate of our territorial increase. To my letter, Mr. Darby was kind enough to respond, and this letter I now lay before the House for its information and consideration:

WASHINGTON, December 13, 1852.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 4th instant was duly received, but I have not had it in my power to give it what I very much desired, a more prompt attention. The delay I regret, but now proceed to respond, as far as the documents at my disposal, and the importance of the subject, with my ability to do it justice, will admit.

First. You inquire to know, in round numbers, "the extent, in square miles, of the territory of the United States in the year 1783, the date of our treaty with England?"

Secondly. "The extent, as before, in the year 1803, the date of our treaty with France, acquiring Louisiana?"

Thirdly. "The extent, as before, in 1822, the date of the ratification of our treaty with Spain, acquiring Florida?"

Fourthly. "The extent, as before, by the acquisition of Texas, New Mexico, and California, in 1845 and 1848, which last would be, with the other acquisitions, the present area of the United States?"

You also again require "the rate of increase, or per centum, of national increase of territory."

You again, also, finally require "the period or periods which should be adopted, upon which to base the per centum of increase."

Query first. In regard to the boundaries and extent in square miles of the original territory of the United States, as estimated in conformity to the treaty of 1783, Morse, and all other authorities whose works I have read, and which works were published soon after the close of the Revolution, or ratification of the treaty of 1783, gave as the amount of the ceded limits, one million of square miles, or six hundred and forty millions of acres. Measured by the rhombs, which I have done myself repeatedly, the area comes out so near one million square miles as to justify the adoption of that number in the case under review. At the termination of that period of eight years, 1775-1783, to which the people of the United States have given, and rightfully given, the title of "American Revolution," as already stated, the former colonial inhabitants, with a national independence, became proprietors of one million of square miles of compact domain. But of the whole extent ceded, not one tenth part was then (1783) inhabited and cultivated by man. It is safe to say, also, that not one person, who, of those who participated in, and survived the struggle, had, at the date of its successful termination, conceived the most remote idea of the change it had commenced, not alone on the condition of the United Colonists, but to a greater or less extent on that of all mankind.

Of the domain ceded in 1783, not one third part of its surface presented marks of civilization. The colonies whose inhabitants had revolted, and sustained their revolt in triumph, were residents, in the far greater part, eastward of the Appalachian mountains. Of the surface included within the bounds expressed in the treaty of 1783, so little of it was really distinctly known, that much the greater space was land of mystery, and had, at the expense of the worst form of war, to be wrested from savages.

The great event of the Revolution was, however, to give to the world a new sovereignty, in, we might say, a new creation, and with other attributes of grandeur and importance, which time has ever since gradually and steadily developed, but which are yet comparatively in early youth. The subsequent stages of progress since the consummation of the Revolution, have afforded an index for the past and promise for the future. Summing up such calculations from data so difficult to reduce to definitive certainty, something must be allowed to the yet defect of data; though the great extent of the field of operation lessens the comparative value of minute fractions. But we proceed.

Your second query: Extent of square miles added to the territory of the United States, 1803, by the treaty with France ceding Louisiana. The reply to this query opens to our view an event second only to that of the Revolution of 1783.

Under the rather indefinite general name of Louisiana, with New Orleans for its capital, the province of Louisiana ranged in a northwestwardly direction from the extreme southwardly cape of the now State of Louisiana, north latitude 29° on the Gulf of Mexico, to latitude 49° on the Pacific; extending through 20° of latitude, and inclosing between the extremes at least 15° of longitude. Measuring as carefully as its extremely vague and irregular outline would admit and demand, Louisiana then embraced a million of square miles, of which surface perhaps one half spread northwestwardly from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific ocean.

From its position and natural connection, Florida comes after Louisiana. This now State of the United States is composed of a curve surface of about three hundred miles in length. Surface thirteen thousand square miles. Ceded to the United States in 1822.

Your fourth query in order relates to the extent, as before, of the immense region contained in Texas, New Mexico, and California. It would be temerity to offer more than a loose estimate of one million four hundred thousand square miles for those undefined regions under the names above stated.

TABULAR VIEW OF THE WITHIN.

	Square miles.
United States original	1,000,000
Louisiana	1,000,000
Florida	13,000
Texas, New Mexico, and California	1,400,000
Amount of territory of United States	3,413,000

In concluding these remarks, we find that the Revolution itself endowed the United States with one million of square miles, equal to six hundred and forty million acres. The cession of Louisiana, doubled the already immense estate in square miles and acres. New Mexico, California, and Florida add the joint amount of one million four hundred and thirteen thousand square miles, or nine hundred and four million three hundred and twenty thousand acres, presenting an almost overwhelming result to the mind.

If you allow fifty thousand square miles as the mean of States, the United States territory will admit sixty-eight!

The most remarkable fact, perhaps, is the following, which is afforded by the history of the United States. The territory has risen to three million four hundred and thirteen thousand square miles; gaining, in seventy-seven years, forty-four thousand three hundred and twenty five square miles annually. In other words, the pro rata of annual increase of territory exceeds the mean extent of the original single States.

You will have the kindness to excuse the rough writing with a lame hand; and for delay, a sick family.

Respectfully, WILLIAM DARBY.

Hon. R. H. WEIGHTMAN.

The healthy, natural territorial increase of the United States is 44,325 square miles per annum. A State a year, sir. This is the rate of territorial increase in the past; and without "filibustering,"—sir, the phantom which afflicts the presidential mind,—if the past is the index of the promise for the future, the area of the United States, in fifty years, will exceed that of all North America, and with one hundred millions of population, there will be but one first-rate nation on the globe, and the United States that nation. Do you think, Mr. Chairman, that this Administration can prevent the increase of this healthy child-nation, either in population or territory? I know you do not, sir.

The weakness of Rome, as she increased in extent, was caused by her proconsular system. The Sicilians, in the meridian of the Roman power, rose in arms, invaded Italy, and threatened Rome itself.

If by alteration of our Constitution, or by any legal sanction, the proconsular system should be ingrafted on our institutions, or if public law and, what is still more powerful with us, public opinion, cannot restrain its illegal establishment, then are our limits sufficiently extended already; and if the American people and American Congress will tolerate, without legal sanction, the existence of a single proconsulate within our present limits, then is our territory too large already.

The contempt of Rome for "foreign races speaking foreign languages," caused the establishment of her proconsulates, and, as she grew in territory, her

"Extended empire, like expanded gold,
Exchanged solid strength for feeble splendor."

But, sir, no invidious distinctions of race or language disfigure our Constitution, and the people of the United States will permit the establishment of no proconsulates. Our national strength, based as it is on the love and affection of the people for the institutions which secure their liberty and happiness, is increased as our limits are extended. Without the proconsular system, with its consequent weakness, ours is the progressive policy of Rome. Among the Romans there was introduced, by Numa, the worship of the god Terminus—the god of the frontiers and boundaries—and one of his attributes was that he never retreated. He was represented, if I mistake not, as legless—he could not retreat.

We find, also, Mr. Chairman, that Terminus was associated with Juventas, the god of youthful vigor—of progress, sir. As Juventas pushed outward the boundaries, old Terminus took possession of and ever defended them.

Allow me to say, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that I have more admiration for Terminus and Juventas than for the American Mars.

THE GARDINER CLAIM, &c.

SPEECH OF HON. C. CHAPMAN,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 11, 1853,

On the subject of prosecution of Claims against the Government by Members of Congress, &c.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, being entitled to the floor, after a few remarks, yielded it to

Mr. CHAPMAN, who said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Having been a member of the Special Committee which reported this bill, I avail myself of the courtesy of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] to submit some few suggestions upon topics which have been drawn into this discussion.

I have hitherto, Mr. Speaker, contented myself with giving a silent vote upon all questions in relation to which I have been called to act at all, and had I not been one of the majority of this committee who reported the bill under consideration, I should not now depart from the practice I have hitherto observed. But, sir, agreeing as I do in recommending this bill to the favor of the House, I wish, in a brief manner, to assign the reasons for my own action.

I am satisfied, as I trust every member of this House is, that a practice has prevailed to a considerable extent among members of both branches of Congress of acting as agents for persons having claims against the Government, in some cases for compensation certain, and in others for compensation contingent upon success. If such a practice exists, and is an evil, as I believe it to be—an evil which is increasing with the growth of the country and the increase of its business—then I think it is the duty of Congress to apply a remedy which shall reach the necessities of the case. While doing this, it will be well, in my judgment, to strike at mischiefs of a kindred character which I am led to believe exist among other classes of men who hold office under the General Government. I believed that the ends in view could be best attained by the introduction of a bill like the one now under consideration, and in the mode adopted by the committee. The task of introducing and piloting a bill through this House upon the part of a single member, according to my observation, is not an easy one. If a bill were reported by a committee, I thought it would receive earlier, perhaps more favorable action, than if it were introduced into this body by a single member.

A bill embracing the principal provisions of the one now under consideration was introduced into the Senate at the last session, by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER;] and when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] said the other day that it was drawn by a master hand, he said truly. The committee of which I was a member amended that bill in some important particulars, and thus amended, have recommended it to the favorable consideration of the House. In presenting this bill, the committee have, in my judgment, undoubtedly departed from the letter of their instructions; but they have done so without any apprehension of censure, inasmuch as the evil, which the bill is intended to remedy, is a pervading one, demanding the application of an efficacious remedy. Let me say here, Mr. Speaker, that nothing is inferable from the bill reported by the Select Committee as to what are the opinions of its individual members, which is inconsistent with the finding of that committee, so far as it relates to the Secretary of the Treasury. There should be no misconception on this subject, and no misconstruction of the opinions or motives of the committee.

Now, what is the mischief of which complaint is made? It is, that gentlemen holding official stations—members of the Senate, members of the House of Representatives, heads of Departments, heads of Bureaus, and a myriad of subordinates—have been engaged in the work of furthering the prosecution of claims against the United States. This practice has been confined to no party or class. It has been a prevailing practice in both branches of Congress, as I am informed and believe, and has had the sanction of distinguished men belonging to the different parties of the country. Among the individuals acting as agents for claims against the Government, some have rendered the service for their constituents without compensation. This is unobjectionable; and the bill is not aimed at them. Others have performed this labor for a certain compensation, which is objectionable. There are others still who have labored for a contingent compensation, which is, in my judgment, more objectionable still. It is not too much to say that their success is sometimes attributable in part, and sometimes in whole, to the official influence which they may bring to bear upon the subject.

It is matter of complaint that claims against the United States are most unreasonably embarrassed and deferred, upon one pretext and another; that honest, bona fide creditors are compelled to waste their substance in prosecuting just claims, and that the delay is ultimately equivalent to, if it does not occasion, a defeat. It is insisted that claims represented by office-holders, although of a less equitable character, often receive earlier attention than those which do not have the advantage of such aid. Doubtless they are, in other respects, more favorably regarded. I do not think there is any considerable diversity of opinion in this House in regard to the character of this evil, or the expediency of applying an appropriate remedy. Whether the bill reported by the committee meets the necessities of the case, or whether it may be profitably amended, I leave to the determination of the House. I do not intend, at this time, to examine its details, nor the amendments which have been offered to it by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN.] I will say, however, in regard to those amendments, that I have read them cursorily, and they meet my individual approbation.

But I prefer to address myself to the report of the committee, and the strictures of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] upon it. The resolution creating this committee, as originally introduced by the gentleman from Ohio, and as amended by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] has been differently construed by different members of that committee. It is, as it stands, a piece of patchwork, rather inartistically put together. The following are the words of the preamble:

"Whereas a strong suspicion rests upon the public mind that fraudulent claims have been allowed by the late Mexican Claim Commission, with one of which it is suspected that Thomas Corwin, Secretary of the Treasury, has been improperly connected."

Yet of this Gardiner claim nothing is said in the preamble to the resolution. The resolution, however, directs an investigation into the facts touching the connection of the said Thomas Corwin with the said "Gardiner claim." It was thought expedient by a majority of the committee to investigate somewhat the character of the claim itself. No such instructions were given, and I am by no means certain that the report in this regard is not subject to just criticism.

But it was said that this would be an aimless inquiry, if we were to inquire into the connection of Thomas Corwin, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the Gardiner claim, if that claim were an honest, bona fide claim upon the Government, and this certainly was said with a good degree of force. Why, it might be asked, while members of both branches of Congress have been, for a long series of years, concerned in pressing claims upon the Government, why should this occasion be sought to stab the Secretary of the Treasury for doing that which had been done by his fellow-members of the Senate and by members upon all sides of this House? It was then said, and perhaps truly, that the committee ought, in this investigation, to inquire into the honesty, integrity, and validity of that claim.

It is due, sir, to Dr. Gardiner, who is to me a stranger, and whose face, so far as I know, I have never seen, to say that this inquiry before the committee, touching the validity of his claim, was for the most part, ex parte. Proceedings had been commenced against that individual in the civil and in the criminal courts of this country, and he seemed unwilling to litigate the question relating to the validity of his claim before us. I think he was right in so doing. Whatever the character of that claim was, I think it was wise in his counsel to advise him, if they did, to have nothing to do with the examination of the character of his claim before us. If I had been his counsel, I would have given him the same advice. He denied in his protest, which accompanies the report, that the House had delegated, or intended to delegate, any power to the Select Committee to examine into the merits of his claim. It is true that upon one or two occasions his counsel appeared before us, for the purpose of cross-examining two Mexican witnesses on two points. He introduced a single witness in the course of the inquiry, and that witness, a clerk in the State Department, merely for the purpose of authenticating some consular seals, and proving the signature of the Mexican Minister. In every other particular this inquiry was purely ex parte, so far as Dr. Gardiner was concerned.

An inquiry thus conducted may have disclosed the whole truth in regard to the merit of this claim, or the committee may have arrived at a very erroneous conclusion. Audi alteram partem, is a pretty good caution to a judge who is about to render a judgment when he has heard but one side. It is well that he forms no opinion until after he has heard both sides of the case. Much of the testimony that was given before us was heard before the committee of the Senate—every particle of it touching the validity of the claim was heard by that committee. The Senate committee, however, seem not to have been satisfied, for they have sent a commission to Mexico to make a personal examination. If no room had been left for doubt, they would not have instituted such an inquiry in such a way.

Now, what that examination may disclose remains to be seen. If we can rely upon the evidence given before the House committee—if the Mexican witnesses who testified here are to be believed, rather than those who testified before the Mexican Commission, then this claim was (in the language of the report) a "naked fraud upon the Treasury, and was supported before the Commission by false testimony and forged papers." The question is in a fair way of being adjudicated before a judicial tribunal, where both sides will be heard, and the truth satisfactorily ascertained.

I would not be understood, from any remarks which I have made, as expressing a belief that this claim is well grounded. I think there are many suspicious circumstances about it. Witnesses have testified before the House that many of the papers were forged, and swear in good set terms that there is no foundation for this claim of their own knowledge.

I will not, upon an ex parte examination of this sort, (especially where the number of witnesses introduced upon another occasion, and before another tribunal, is about equal, and for aught I know equally reliable in regard to the character of this claim,) undertake to say that the Gardiner claim is either well or ill-founded; but I do concur with the committee in the fullest manner, in saying, that so far as the testimony before the House is concerned, it was a naked fraud upon the Treasury, supported by perjury, and sustained by forged papers.

But the legitimate business of this committee was to inquire into the connection of the Hon. Thomas Corwin with this claim, and the character of that connection. I had not anticipated such an inquiry, and such a discussion upon the bill itself. I know little of the rules of this House; less of the chances of reaching anything. I did suppose, perhaps, that in the process of time, perhaps while I was a member of this body, this report of the committee would be reached for the action of this House. But I did not suppose that such an illegitimate discussion as this would spring up upon this bill. To that subject, I will address a few considerations.

The resolution was an assault upon the Secretary of the Treasury. It was introduced and accompanied by a speech from the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Olds,] which, according to my recollection of it—I have not seen it since—"breathed threatenings and slaughter" to the Secretary of the Treasury. How far what was stated in that speech is supported by what has since been found by the committee, the House will judge. The best commentary upon that attack will be found in a single paragraph of the report itself. It is in these words:

"No testimony has been adduced before the committee proving, or tending to prove, that the Hon. Thomas Corwin had any knowledge that the claim of the said Gardiner was fraudulent, or that false testimony or forged papers had been, or were to be, procured to sustain the same."

I have but a very slight acquaintance with the Secretary of the Treasury. He is not my friend, and I have no purposes connected with private friendship to serve by any action of mine in this matter,—none on earth but the purposes of truth and justice. Neither am I his foe, and therefore have no personal grudges or private griefs to gratify. Can the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Olds] say as much? If I had, I should think it was not the best evidence of high courage to assail the Secretary of the Treasury when and where he had no opportunity to reply. I am, however, constrained to say that I think it would be very high evidence of that "better part of valor," which is discretion, to omit doing so where he could reply, for it has been more than hinted of that distinguished gentleman, that if he would, he could "bite like a serpent, and sting like an adder."

I think we degrade our Government and bring reproach upon our institutions, by our wholesale and indiscriminate abuse of our public men. No sooner is a man a candidate for a public station, than those who are opposed to him, politically, and are connected with rival party associations, begin to assail him. This could be tolerated; but when a man is holding a high official station we are quite too apt to follow up this line of attack, and impute to him corrupt motives, because, forsooth, he differs from us upon party questions. It seems to me that it would be well if party feelings would not lead us to overstep the bounds of fair discussion or violate the common courtesies of life. I do not suppose, because an individual in public station differs with me—because he is arrayed upon another side, politically, from me—that therefore I am permitted to impute to him improper motives. My duty rather is, in the absence of evidence, to believe that his motives are as pure as my own.

Now, a few words more in regard to the connection of the Hon. Thomas Corwin with the Gardiner claim, and I shall have done. The claim of Doctor Gardiner was presented to the Board of Commissioners on the 30th of November, 1849. The claim was for loss of property in certain silver mines, in consequence of his expulsion from the State of San Luis Potosi, in 1846. On the 12th of March, 1850, the claim was adjudged to be a valid one against Mexico, under the 26th article of the treaty of 1831; but the amount of the claim was not then ascertained, and the mere question of law was determined by the Commissioners according to their custom. It was a proper subject of inquiry, and the amount to be allowed was to be ascertained upon a further examination. If this claim was a valid one, it became the duty of the Government, under the 15th article of the treaty of February, 1848, to pay it. On the 15th of April, 1851, the Board settled the amount to be allowed. They allowed to Doctor Gardiner $321,560, and they allowed to W. W. Corcoran, an assignee of one fourth part of this claim, the sum of $107,187, making in all, for the Gardiner claim, $428,747, and that amount was paid to these parties out of the Treasury. A portion of the money deposited by Doctor Gardiner in other hands is now held by an injunction, prayed out upon application by the United States. The amount thus held is on deposit with Corcoran and Riggs, ($93,000,) which is subject to a letter of credit of £2,000, and another lien of $10,000. There is also enjoined in the hands of a life and trust company in the city of New York, $130,000. These moneys were deposited by Dr. Gardiner in the hands of individuals, and are reached by the process which the Government has prayed out.

Now, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Corwin, then a member of the Senate, was employed by General Waddy Thompson, the attorney of Dr. Gardiner, upon an agreement on the part of Thompson to pay him five per cent. on his own fees, which fees were to be fifteen per cent. upon the sum allowed. Waddy Thompson was the original counsel for Dr. Gardiner; he became acquainted with him in Mexico, while he (Thompson) was accredited as our Minister to that Government. He undertook the prosecution of this claim for a compensation of fifteen per cent. upon the sum to be allowed by the Commissioners; and he employed the Secretary of the Treasury, then a member of the Senate, upon an agreement to pay him five per cent. out of his own fees, which is one-third of Mr. Thompson's fees for prosecuting the claim. Now, whether he was induced from one consideration or another to employ Mr. Corwin to assist him in prosecuting that claim, seems to be a matter of little consequence. Whether it was because of the superior intellectual power of Mr. Corwin, or the personal influence which he had been enabled to acquire—whether it was in consequence of the station to which he had attained by his own merit—or whether for any other cause, probably could not be very well settled by a committee of this House, or by the House itself; nor is it, in my judgment, of any importance to inquire. The engagement was made in May, 1849. In June, 1850, the Mexican Commission, as it is called, adjourned to meet again in the month of November, of the same year.

At the time when the Board adjourned, Mr. Corwin had acquired an interest in this claim, in connection with Mr. Robert G. Corwin, by purchase. He was induced to make that purchase by Robert, his relative, and Gardiner found it necessary to make a sale of a portion of his claim, to meet the expenses of its prosecution. The Board had then come to no definite conclusion as to the amount to be awarded, and did not do so until the month of November in the succeeding year. During the recess of this Commission, Mr. Corwin was tendered a seat in Mr. Fillmore's Cabinet. He was unwilling to take it while he was interested in claims before this Mexican Board. Governor Young, of New York, now deceased, desirous that he should take a seat in the Cabinet, interposed to negotiate a sale, and the sale was negotiated, of all Mr. Corwin's interest in these claims, which were first the Gardiner claim, and then thirty-six other claims, pending before this Mexican Commission. He made sale, through Governor Young, of all these claims, thirty-seven in number, before he received the appointment of Secretary of the Treasury, in the month of July, 1850. He sold them in good faith, and he sold them unconditionally.

Now, what does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Olds] mean, when he says that the sale was a farce? Sir, the sale was an unqualified and unconditional one, made anterior to Mr. Corwin's acceptance of a position in the Cabinet. This is sworn to by George Law, sworn to unqualifiedly as a bona fide, unconditional sale made by Mr. Corwin to him, he being the purchaser, previous to Mr. Corwin taking his seat in the Cabinet. Mr. Speaker, does any gentleman upon this floor mean to impeach the veracity of George Law? Is there any man here who will volunteer to do that? He does not, I believe, belong to the same party with the Secretary of the Treasury, but accords in his political opinions with the gentleman from Ohio. He swears unequivocally to this purchase. Is he to be believed? Why, sir, one would think that with the reputution which he enjoys in this country, he was entitled to credit, unless there was some contradictory proof, some evidence from somebody that contravened his statement. But, sir, Mr. Law is fully corroborated by the testimony of James S. Thayer, a gentleman of the legal profession in the city of New York, known to many of us as a man of integrity and a lawyer of distinction. He, too, swears unequivocally to this purchase. He says he was one of the individuals who estimated these claims, under an agreement testified to by the other witnesses; that he assisted Governor Young to fix the price which should be paid by Mr. Law, and which Mr. Corwin should receive. Governor Young died before this investigation was had, and Mr. Corwin could not, therefore, avail himself of his testimony.

There is also another witness who was familiar with this transaction—Robert G. Corwin—who swears to the same negotiations, and that he participated himself in the appraisal of these claims. There are several other witnesses who speak of this sale incidentally, having knowledge of it in the progress of the negotiation. Now, sir, in order to sustain the charges against Mr. Corwin, it becomes necessary to trample upon the testimony of all these gentlemen, to convict them all of perjury, although they are men of high reputation and of unimpeachable integrity. Is this proposed to be accomplished by proof? There is none—not a particle of evidence, from the beginning to the end of the inquiry, that conflicts with the testimony to which I have adverted. Is the testimony to be overcome in any other way than by contravening evidence? Why, sir, to denounce an individual is easy, exceedingly easy, as gentlemen here have all very often had occasion to know. But, sir, something besides the mere breath of an accuser, who has no personal knowledge himself, and pretends to none in regard to the facts, will be required to overthrow the uncontradicted proof which has been brought before the committee in regard to this sale.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the written transfer of this interest was not made until the month of November, 1850; but it was made before the Mexican Board reconvened; and not only that, but the money, according to the testimony, was in fact paid in dollars before that Board reconvened in November. Hence, sir, it is incontrovertibly proved that the Secretary of the Treasury, before he took office under this Administration, divested himself in good faith of all the interest which he had in any of these claims, whether as purchaser or as counsel. In regard to the legal right of Mr. Corwin, while a member of the Senate, to act as counsel for claims, or to be interested in claims before a board of commissioners, there can be no diversity of opinion among the members of this House. Such has been the uniform practice for a long series of years. Such is the prevailing practice now. I might, then, sir, well inquire, Why this hue and cry at the heels of Mr. Corwin? If, while a member of the Senate, he has acted as counsel for claimants against the Government, so have all his fellows. If he has appeared before the Supreme Court to prosecute claims against the Government in a legal inquiry before that tribunal, so have his fellows. If he has appeared before a board of commissioners to prosecute claims, such has been the practice of those who have acted in the Senate with him. Then why this hue and cry about him? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] complains of "hired letter-writers" and "paid telegraphers" who have undertaken to give a direction to public sentiment upon this subject in favor of the Secretary of the Treasury. If it is matter of complaint that, after the attacks of the gentleman from Ohio upon the Secretary, telegraphers and letter-writers have informed the world how the investigation terminated, what should be said of the pack that has been unkenneled upon the Secretary, and given tongue upon his trail for a series of years. Their business has been to assail him "in season and out of season," and now that the facts are ascertained, the country can judge of their motives and their success.

I understood the gentleman from Ohio to say at one time that there had been no sale by Mr. Corwin—that the whole thing was a farce; and at another time, I understood him to say that Governor Young was the real purchaser, and that George Law was a man of straw; or, to use his own language, was made to act the dummy on that occasion. Well, Mr. Law swears that he purchased the claim, and he swears that he paid for it with is own money. Does the gentleman mean that ah man who makes his own purchase, and pays his own money, according to his agreement, is a "dummy?" If he is, he certainly sets a good example. But, suppose Governor Young was really to have the benefit of this purchase, of which there is no pretense of proof, what then, and who would have a right to complain? The time has gone by when it will answer any good purpose to abuse Governor Young. While he was living, he might have been affected, like other men, by such attacks; but I believe he is now beyond the reach of any man's venom. He lived honored and died lamented. Whether he was the purchaser or not, I do not know, nor is it important to inquire. The sole inquiry for us is, Was Mr. Corwin interested, while he was Secretary of the Treasury, in these claims? If he was not, why, then, there is an end of the inquiry, and there ought to be an end of the abuse. Mr. Law swears distinctly and unequivocally that he was the purchaser of the claim, and that he paid the money.

Mr. Speaker, I feel bound to say, in regard to this claim, as it was presented before the Mexican Board, that I think it was sustained in all its parts in the best possible way by proof, so far as the Board could see, and so far as anybody else could see, who had any connection with it as counsel. The testimony was taken according to law; it was detailed, it was minute, it was circumstantial, and there was much of it. Indeed, sir, one of the witnesses, who was clerk to the Board, testified that it excited suspicion in his mind, because it was so well and circumstantially supported. It was of a character, which overcame the previous prejudices and preconceived opinions of Mr. Johnson, as he swears, who was, for a time, clerk of that Board. Much of it was procured after Mr. Corwin's connection with the matter ceased. Now, sir, there is no reasonable pretense, that if the testimony was false, or the papers forged, Mr. Corwin had any knowledge of that fact. The committee found—(and a majority of them were not the political friends of Mr. Corwin, be it remembered)—that no testimony had been adduced before them proving, or tending to prove, any knowledge on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the claim was not entirely just. And now, Mr. Speaker, what does the gentleman from Ohio mean when he speaks of "a spurious acquittal?" Does he mean to say, that the committee did not arrive at a correct result, in view of the evidence?—that by reason of a want of intelligence or of a want of integrity, they did not come to a right conclusion? A spurious acquittal! We unanimously found, and without a dissentient voice upon the committee, that there was no evidence before us, proving or tending to prove any knowledge on the part of Mr. Corwin of any want of merit in this claim, or of any foul practice in regard to it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is due to the committee, as well as to the Secretary of the Treasury, to say, that all the witnesses who speak at all upon the subject, testify that Mr. Corwin, ever after he made that sale in July up to the time when this case was decided by this Mexican Commission, uniformly, on all occasions, refused to consult with the parties or the counsel in regard to these claims in any way or manner. He refused to give the least advice as to the mode of proceeding, or to have any more to do with them than an utter stranger.

Again: It is due to Mr. Corwin to advert to a fact as testified to by the attorney of this District, that in endeavoring to detect and expose the supposed fraud connected with this claim, after there came to be a clamor about it, no man was more diligent, no man was more active, no man was more energetic than the Secretary of the Treasury, doing his whole duty, and doing it with all his strength, and with all his heart, in good faith, as an honest man and a conscientious officer of the Government. He sought by all the means in his power to restrain these moneys, and to hold on to them wherever they could be found until this whole subject could be investigated.

Sir, I think that something is due to the Secretary of the Treasury—some action upon the part of this House evidential of its confidence in his purity, and in his fidelity in endeavoring to detect this fraud and bring the offender to punishment. But what have we in the House of Representatives, or what has a committee of this House, to do with the conduct of a Senator, or what has the Senate to do with a member of this body? If the propriety of the conduct of a member of either body were to be discussed by the other from day to day, there would not be business enough for both branches; but the warfare would be a fruitless and unprofitable one, in which no laurels would be won.

It has been customary to take some liberties with the Executive in these discussions, and that has been often done, without any great regard to delicacy; but I presume the friends of the Secretary of the Treasury would interpose no objection to a full examination into his conduct while he has occupied his present elevated official position. So far, then, as Mr. Corwin is concerned as Secretary of the Treasury, if there is any faith to be put in the testimony of highly-respectable witnesses, whose testimony is wholly uncontradicted, he went into that Department wholly divested of every and all interest in what are called the Mexican claims. He was so exceedingly sensitive in this matter, and so scrupulously careful, that, as one of the witnesses testifies, he remarked to him, that unless the money was paid into his hands before that Board reconvened, he would throw his Mexican claims into the Potomac or resign his seat in the Cabinet. He would not be in such a condition that an enemy could impute any wrong to him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said all that, as a member of the committee, I feel it my duty to say at this time. It matters not to me to what party the Secretary of the Treasury belongs; I would interpose nothing to shield him if he was wrong, while I would protect him, as I would a man of any other political party, if he was right. I think the testimony which has been taken by this committee, and reported by them to this House, shows in the clearest and most satisfactory manner, that whatever he did while a member of the Senate, was done in pursuance of a very generally prevailing custom, which has not heretofore been found fault with by the members of any party; that so far as his action since he has been Secretary of the Treasury is concerned, he has done nothing that is blameworthy; that as to these claims which were presented to this Mexican Commission, he had divested himself of every kind of interest before he accepted a seat in the Cabinet, and that since that time he has had no connection with them nor consultation about them. It is time that the calumnious clamor against him should cease.

THE GARDINER CLAIM, &c.

SPEECH OF HON. N. BARRERE,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 11, 1853,

On the subject of prosecution of Claims against the Government by Members of Congress, &c.

Mr. BARRERE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I had not expected to address the House this morning. I would have preferred submitting my remarks after hearing from the other side, or at any rate after hearing from another member of the committee, who I understand intends to present his views on this subject, and differing perhaps from those just presented by the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. CHAPMAN.] But this being as convenient a time as will probably occur to me, I shall proceed now.

Mr. Speaker, I feel it to be my duty—representing as I do a portion of the people represented for a long time in Congress by Mr. Corwin, with great acceptability to them, and distinguished credit to him—to participate in this discussion. I do not propose to enter upon the merits of the bill now before the House. I have not found it necessary for my present purpose, to look into it with any degree of care. I shall examine it before I am called on to vote upon it, and if upon examination I think it necessary or useful, towards preserving the purity of the Government, or the purity of the action of the two Houses of Congress, I shall support it by my vote.

I have for a long time looked upon Mr. Corwin as one of our most prominent men; distinguished alike for his high intellectual endowments and the purity of his moral character. He has ever been a favorite in Ohio, and when I use that word, I mean a favorite with the people of the State generally—with Whigs and Democrats. In that part of the State in which I am best acquainted, I may safely say, that the high estimate of his character is not confined to any party, but that he holds an exalted place in the affections of the people of all parties. In early life Mr. Corwin was comparatively poor, and had to struggle with the disadvantages incident to our then wilderness country; but by his talents and energy he has risen to his present position. He has, unaided, and with but few advantages, risen from the humbler walks of life to what we consider one of the highest positions, morally and intellectually, as well as politically, that any gentleman occupies in the country. I do not pretend to an extensive acquaintance with distinguished men, and have not that high appreciation of what are called great men, that some persons have. I believe, among cultivated men of clear heads and honest hearts, there is not that vast difference that is sometimes supposed. Much depends upon circumstances. Men of fixed purpose, sound common sense, and incorruptible integrity, possess the elements of greatness, and will, when placed in the proper positions, generally prove themselves to be men of ability. This, however, is but mere speculation; for there are a few, and but a few, who stand out in bold relief as greatly distinguished, and who command the admiration and respect due to really great minds. The characters of such men are invaluable to the country; and while it is the duty of this House to expose unsparingly corruption in high places, it is equally the duty, and ought to be the pleasure, of the House to shield and protect the reputations of deserving men from wanton and unjust aspersions.

Since I have been a member of this House, I have made it my business to observe, with as much scrutiny as I could, the persons of distinction whom I have had the pleasure of seeing in this city; and I have endeavored to satisfy myself as to the relative claims of each and all of them to the consideration accorded to them by their respective friends. Not long since, I heard with great pleasure the eloquent eulogies delivered in this House upon the character of Mr. Webster. All seemed to agree that he was the great intellectual giant of the age. I fully concurred in that opinion. With the exception of Mr. Webster, I have come in contact with no man in the District of Columbia, who, in my opinion, is the intellectual superior of Thomas Corwin. He is prized at home, however, much more for his high character for purity, honesty, and integrity, than for his mental capacity. His neighbors are proud of his attainments and his abilities; but on account of his noble, generous nature, and his incorruptible integrity, as they believe, they love him. No suspicion of dishonesty ever rested upon him in the country where he has lived most of his life. He is looked upon by the people there as their safest adviser in matters of the highest individual interest, and in all the situations of life in which men desire counsel or advice, I know of no man in the section of the State where he resides, that is consulted so much in matters pertaining to private interests and the social condition of his neighborhood. No man anywhere ever enjoyed the entire confidence of his neighbors more fully than Mr. Corwin. They look with deep interest upon this proceeding, as they do upon everything that involves his character and standing.

I was highly pleased the other day with the remark of the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMART,] when speaking upon another subject. He said that it was the duty of the Government to protect its humblest citizens; and he thought that the Government of the United States appeared in its highest and best character, when affording protection to the rights of the humblest of her citizens. I thought with him. But I do not think the right of property or liberty, more worthy of protection, even in the humblest citizen, than the character and good name that he may possess. Why, Mr. Speaker, we do throw around the private citizen the broad ægis of the law, as a shield to protect, not only his person and property, but his reputation and character. The high and the low, the rich and the poor, are equal in the eye of the law. They have equal legal rights, and ought to have equal protection. But reasons of State policy, founded in justice and the very spirit of our institutions, have made it imperiously necessary to withhold from men in official positions that protection to character which is afforded to private citizens. The private citizen may resort to the law when he is assailed in his character. But the politician, the office-holder, must depend upon the justice of public opinion. Inquiry into the conduct of public men must be free and untrammeled, as a security against corruption, and to protect liberty itself. But as public opinion is the only protection afforded to a public man, we ought to be as sedulous and earnest in our efforts to shield the honest and faithful public servant from unjust assaults, as we are to expose the dishonest and corrupt. Public opinion ought, at least, to afford as energetic and powerful a means of defense for the good name and character of our public men, as the law affords for the protection of the reputation and property of private citizens. If we have any security in this country for good government, for liberty, and for all that we prize highly, it is found in the honesty, integrity, and uprightness of the people, and in the due appreciation of the worth and value of pure and honorable public men.

Mr. Speaker, the Special Committee who reported the bill under consideration, sat during the recess, and acted under the authority of the following resolution:

"Whereas a strong suspicion rests upon the public mind, that fradulent claims have been allowed by the late Mexican Claims Commission, with one of which it is suspected that Thomas Cowin, of the Treasury, has been improperly connected; therefore

"Resolved, That a committee, consisting of five members of this House, be appointed to investigate all the facts touching the connection of the said Thomas Corwin, the present Secretary of the Treasury, with the Gardiner claim; what fee, if any, he was to receive for his services as agent or counsel for said Gardiner; what interest, if any, other than his fee interest, he purchased and held, either directly or indirectly, in said claim, and the amount paid or stipulated to be paid therefor as condition of said purchase; what time he ceased to act as counsel or agent of said Gardiner; to whom and for what consideration he disposed of his interest; to whom and for what consideration he disposed of his one fourth interest in said claim."

The committee made their report in the recess. They directed their inquiries to two points. First. Was the claim of George A. Gardiner, as allowed by the Board of Commissioners under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, meritorious or fraudulent? Second. What was the connection of the Hon. Thomas Corwin, the present Secretary of the Treasury, with said claim?

On the first branch of the investigation, the committee in their report say:

"From the evidence before the committee, (the above being only a summary of the more important facts testified to by the witnesses,) the committee are constrained to believe, upon the first branch of the investigation committed to them, that the claim of George A. Gardiner, upon which an award was made by the Board of Commissioners for the sum of $428,750, was sustained before the Commissioners by false testimony and forged papers, and is a naked fraud upon the Treasury of the United States. Of the amount awarded, $93,000, on deposit, in stock and money, with Corcoran & Riggs, to the credit of Gardiner, subject to two charges—one a letter of credit to George A. Gardiner on George Peabody, of London, for £2,000, and one his letter of credit to his brother, John Charles Gardiner, for $10,000—have been enjoined; and also $130,500 deposited to the credit of George A. Gardiner, with the Life Insurance and Trust Company, in the city of New York, have been enjoined at the suit of the United States, and are now retained under injunction. The sum of $94,582 was paid to counsel, and $107,187 50 was paid to the assignees of the one fourth of the claim originally sold to Thomas Corwin and Robert G. Corwin."

In relation to the other branch of the investigation, the committee say:

"In May, 1849, the Hon. Thomas Corwin, then a member of the United States Senate, was employed as counsel in the Gardiner claim by General Waddy Thompson, the original counsel of Gardiner, upon an agreement that Mr. Corwin should have for his fee five per cent. on whatever sum should be awarded to Gardiner by the Commissioners. In February, 1850, Thomas Corwin, in company with Robert G. Corwin, Esq., purchased one fourth part of the claim of Gardiner, and this fourth part of said claim was assigned, on the 13th of that month, to W. W. Corcoran, Esq., who loaned money to the Messrs. Corwin to purchase it, and held the claim for Messrs. Thomas and Robert G. Corwin, in equal shares, as collateral security for the payment of the loan. The Messrs. Corwin paid $22,000, and relinquished their fees on the one fourth of the claim purchased by them, and paid a part of Edward Curtis's fees—what amount does not appear—as the consideration for the purchase.

"The Hon. Thomas Corwin resigned his seat in the Senate, and accepted the appointment of Secretary of the Treasury, in the month of July, 1850. In the same month, and previous to his going into the Cabinet of President Fillmore as Secretary of the Treasury, a sale of his fee interest in, and also of his half of the one fourth part of the Gardiner claim, was negotiated, through the intervention of Governor John Young, of New York, to George Law, Esq., of New York. From this time the said Thomas Corwin refused to act as counsel, or consult with the other counsel who had been associated with him, in relation to the same, and took no further part in the prosecution of the said Gardiner claim. The assignment of his fee interest, and his interest in the one fourth part of the Gardiner claim, and all his interest in all other claims before the Board of Commissioners, (thirty-seven in number,) was executed by Thomas Corwin to Jacob Little, of New York, in November, 1850, and the money for the purchase was then paid by George Law, to whom the assignment to Jacob Little was at that time transferred. The money for the sale, $80,357, was received by Thomas Corwin, and on the 23d of November was deposited by him to his credit with Messrs. Corcoran & Riggs.

"No testimony has been adduced before the committee proving, or tending to prove, that the Hon. Thomas Corwin had any knowledge that the claim of the said Gardiner was fraudulent, or that false testimony or forged papers had been or were to be procured to sustain the same."

Now, sir, it is said that this report does not acquit Mr. Corwin of the charges preferred against him. It is difficult to determine what charges were preferred against him. But in the opinion of the committee, they involved an inquiry into the merits of the Gardiner claim. No express authority was given to the committee to inquire into the character of the Gardiner claim. But the several matters set forth in the resolution could not be investigated, they thought, so as to ascertain whether Mr. Corwin's connection with that claim was improper, without first ascertaining the character of the claim itself. If the committee could have made the investigation required at their hands, without inquiring into the merits of the Gardiner claim, they ought by all means to have done so. His case is before the proper judicial tribunals of the country, undergoing a rigid investigation. Two civil suits are pending against him, and two criminal prosecutions are now in preparation for trial. The whole policy of our laws and the whole spirit of our criminal jurisprudence are against any investigation into the merits of his claim by this House, while those suits are pending against him in court. He is entitled to a fair and an impartial trial, and any investigation of the merits of his claim here, is calculated to defeat that constitutional right, or at least to prejudice it.

But as a high public functionary of the Government was charged with improper connection with the Gardiner claim, public policy imperiously required that any prejudice that might result to Gardiner from an investigation into its merits should be disregarded, in order that the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury should be inquired into, and either exposed or vindicated.

The committee, therefore, thought it to be their duty to inquire into the character of the Gardiner claim. They determined that the propriety or impropriety of Mr. Corwin's connection with it depended, in the first place, upon the honesty or dishonesty of the claim itself. In this I think they were right; for it is evident that, unless the claim be fraudulent, the whole charge falls to the ground. This view is further sustained by the fact, that although Mr. Corwin was connected as counsel with thirty-six other claims before the Board of Commissioners which are not questioned, no one has pretended that his connection with them was improper.

Having decided the Gardiner claim to be fraudulent, and sustained by perjury and forgery, the committee next inquired into Mr. Corwin's connection with it, and after stating the facts, showing the nature, character, and extent of that connection, they concluded that there was no evidence before them proving, or tending to prove, that Mr. Corwin knew the fraudulent character of the claim. If, then, Mr. Corwin has not been exonerated and acquitted by the committee, of the charge preferred against him, he has been improperly connected with the crimes of perjury and forgery, and instead of being Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, he ought to be within the walls of the penitentiary of this District. This position cannot be avoided. The committee have either acquitted him, or they have shown facts that make him particeps criminis in the crimes of perjury and forgery. From the facts exhibited, it is clearly shown that his connection with the claim, if improper, is so because the claim is fraudulent and sustained by perjury and forgery, and for no other reason.

This is a grave charge to be brought against any man. The committee report that there is no evidence going to show any such guilt; that there is not a particle of proof tending to show that he had any knowledge whatever of the fraudulent character of the claim, or of the proofs adduced to sustain it. Yet my colleague [Mr. OLDS] says that is no acquittal.

I have had some experience in practicing law. We have an action in my State, and I suppose it is an action in use throughout the country, and not only so, but in every country where the common law obtains—(It was truly said by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE,] the other day, that liberty exists nowhere except where the common law prevails)—I repeat, wherever the common law has obtained, the action for malicious prosecution is known. Where a person is charged criminally by another, and on trial, the prosecutor fails entirely to sustain his charges by proof, the person charged has a right to an action for malicious prosecution. If, in one of our courts, a citizen were charged with a heinous offense, and the prosecutor should fail to produce a shadow of proof to sustain the accusation, and afterwards upon a trial for malicious prosecution between the same parties, the defendant should fail to provide evidence, either proving or tending to prove the truth of the charge he had previously preferred against the plaintiff, what would be the conduct of the jury in such a case? I hazard nothing in saying, that damages would be awarded by a jury, in any court in the country. Yes, sir, actions for malicious prosecution are known to all of us, and they are always sustained, where a party has brought a charge against another which he has produced no proof whatever to sustain. Where a party produces evidence showing that he had reasonable cause to institute the prosecution, in such a case there would be evidence tending to prove the truth of the charge; and though it might not show guilt, still the defendant might be relieved from damages on account of malice. But in a case where the party fails to produce any evidence tending to prove the truth of the charge, our judges will charge the jury that a case was fairly made out, entitling the plaintiff to vindictive damages.

Mr. Speaker, I have examined this testimony with care. I am not disposed to question anything that the committee have done. They have embodied in their report a summary of the facts that occurred to them as the most important; and, so far as they go, they are correct. But there are some other proofs furnished to them, and taken by them, which are not embodied in the report, and which were not necessary to be put in the report, that I think may be profitably adverted to. The committee say, and the gentleman who has just taken his seat, who was a member of the committee, repeats, that there was no evidence of any sort or description tending to show in the slightest degree that Mr. Corwin had any knowledge that a fraud was about to be perpetrated upon the Government. I think a close examination of the testimony will satisfy every unprejudiced person, not only that Mr. Corwin had no knowledge of the contemplated fraud of Gardiner, if his claim is really a sheer fraud, but that all the testimony in the case before the Board while he was connected with the claim, and when it was finally allowed, showed an honest, fair case. I will say further, that the evidence before the Board of Commissioners in favor of the claim was far stronger than is the testimony before the committee that it is fraudulent. The testimony was entirely satisfactory, in the absence—which was the case—of any suspicion of its not being genuine.

In the first place, Mr. Corwin never knew Dr. Gardiner until after the treaty was made and the Board of Commissioners had been established and organized. He was then employed in the case, not by Gardiner, but by General Waddy Thompson, a man of high character in the country—a man who had served with him in Congress for a number of years, whose integrity and honor had never been questioned, and who had been our Minister in Mexico. Thompson had known Gardiner in Mexico from 1842 to the latter part of 1843, or early in 1844. He had made his acquaintance when he first went to Mexico, Gardiner having been the chairman of the committee of the American citizens residing in the city of Mexico to invite General Thompson on his arrival there to a public dinner. Gardiner was in the city of Mexico practicing his profession at that time, and engaged to some extent in mining operations. In the fall of 1843, or early in 1844, he left for the interior, and said he was going to look for mines. Thompson saw no more of Gardiner until late in 1848 or early in 1849, in this city, when his first inquiry was to know of Dr. Gardiner whether he had made a fortune in mining, when Gardiner told him of his operations and his losses. Mr. Gardiner had letters from Hon. Jefferson Davis, Solomon W. Downs, Colonel Gates, Dr. Hitchcock, and other distinguished American officers, who had been in the army in Mexico, representing him to be a man of honesty and integrity.

It was natural that Dr. Gardiner should apply to General Thompson, from their acquaintance and his high professional character. After proper consultation, and hearing from Gardiner the nature, character, and extent of his claim, as he alleged it, General Thompson engaged to prosecute the claim before the Board for fifteen per cent. upon the amount that should be finally awarded. Mr. Thompson employed Mr. Corwin, and agreed to give him five per cent. upon the amount that should be finally awarded out of his fifteen per cent. This was the precise manner of Mr. Corwin's first connection with the claim, as General Thompson swears. Thompson, when he was retained, as he states, reserved to himself the right of employing such additional counsel as he desired, to be paid out of his own fee. Mr. Corwin was not employed by Gardiner or to be paid by him. There was surely nothing at that time to excite suspicion in the mind of Mr. Corwin. There is scarcely a man in the United States who could procure better testimonials, if he desired to use them in the furtherance of his rights, than Dr. Gardiner had obtained when Mr. Corwin first became acquainted with him.

In May, 1849, Mr. Corwin was employed. During the summer and fall of 1849, Dr. Gardiner went to Mexico to procure the necessary legal proofs to sustain his claim. On the 30th of November, 1849, the memorial of Gardiner was filed, and the proofs that had been then procured. In February, 1850, Robert G. Corwin, Esq., bought one fourth of the claim from Gardiner, and in the arrangement the Secretary of the Treasury became the owner of one half of that fourth.

On the 12th of May, 1850, the claim was passed upon by the Board as a valid claim. In July, 1850, Mr. Corwin sold out his interest in the Gardiner claim and all other claims (thirty-six in number) in which he was interested, then pending before the Board of Commissioners, to George Law, and at that time resigned his seat in the Senate, and afterwards became a member of the Cabinet. This whole transaction took place while Mr. Corwin was a Senator, and no part of it since he has been Secretary of the Treasury. I make no question of the right of this House to inquire into the conduct of a Senator of the United States, although I think it has not that right. If Mr. Corwin is culpable in this matter, I do not desire that he should be shielded from exposure because of any plea to the jurisdiction. I desire the fullest investigation.

I will now endeavor to show the character of the proofs that were before the Mexican Claims Commission. For this purpose I will quote the whole of General Thompson's testimony:

Waddy Thompson appeared as a witness, and was sworn. Witness resides in Greenville, South Carolina. He was counsel in the case of George A. Gardiner.

Please state what you know in relation to the claim of George A. Gardiner, and any interest or connection which Thomas Corwin had in the same.

Answer. I do not know that I have any information in reference to that claim, other than that which is furnished by the papers submitted. I first became acquainted with Dr. Gardiner in the city of Mexico, on the 25th of April, 1842, a few days after my arrival there as Minister from the United States, when he called upon me as chairman, or the first named, of a committee appointed, at a meeting of the American citizens in Mexico, to invite me to a public dinner. The letter of invitation was presented to the committee of the Senate engaged in an investigation of the Gardiner claim. I thought I had the original with me, but in the haste in which I left home—a few hours after the arrival of the messenger—I neglected to bring the original with me. I met Dr. Gardiner occasionally, as I did other American citizens, while in Mexico; had no special intimacy with him, nor any knowledge of his pecuniary circumstances, further than a general impression, derived from him and other Americans in Mexico, that he was engaged in a profitable business—that of a dentist and physician. Shortly before Dr. Gardiner left the city of Mexico, which was in the fall of 1843, as I understood and believed, (for I never saw him there afterwards, until I left, which was about the middle of March, 1844, he called upon me to request that I would give him a letter to some naval officer, who he had understood was at Acapulco, asking for him a passage in his ship to Mazatlan, or some place on the Pacific coast, as there were very few commercial vessels in that quarter, and it was difficult to obtain a passage. I complied with his request. I asked him why he was leaving Mexico, as I had understood he was making money. He said that he was; but that he thought he could do better, and that he was going to look for some mines of which he had received information. I never saw or heard of Dr. Gardiner again until I met him on the avenue, in this city, late in December, 1848, or in January, 1849. I did not at first recognize him; when I did I said to him, I hope you have made a fortune by those mines you were in pursuit of. He then told me that he had a claim before the Mexican Board about to be established, for losses by his expulsion from his mines. He called a few days afterwards, and submitted his papers to me. Some of those papers were submitted in the form in which they then were to the Board; others, not conforming to the rules prescribed by the Board, were not presented. They were the same in substance, and generally the depositions of the same witnesses, afterwards presented, Dr. Gardiner having gone to Mexico to have them put in the required form. Among the papers first presented was the book of account of daily expenditures and receipts. My connection with the case was strictly and exclusively professional, and confined to written instructions given to Dr. Gardiner, as to the form and character of the testimony which he should get. The original of these instructions is in possession of the committee of the Senate, a copy of which—herewith filed, and marked Exhibit No. 10—I desire shall be taken as part of my testimony, and to written arguments presented to the Board. I never conversed nor had any communication with either of the commissioners on the subject of the claim, except to say to one of the commissioners, in January or February, 1851, that I desired, if there was no reason to the contrary, that the amount of the award might be fixed, as I was about to make a contract which would depend upon it. Some time in the fall of 1849, or early in 1850, Dr. Gardiner called at my room and told me that he had been advised to employ Major Lally in this case. I protested strongly against it, and said it would be an act of great injustice to me to do so—to employ him or anybody else without my consent. I knew nothing of Major Lally or his character which would justify any imputation on that account, but I knew that such imputations would be made, as he was nearly connected with one of the commissioners, and, as I had been informed, was not a lawyer; and that he (Gardiner) had certainly counsel enough. He replied that that was his own judgment, and that he would not employ him, and with some strong asseveration that if the commissioners thought proper to reject his claim they might do it; that he had once worked for his living, and he would do it again. I left this city about the 7th or 8th of March, 1850, for South Carolina, and returned about the 20th of April. While I was absent Major Lally was employed by Mr. Edward Curtis, as Mr. Curtis informed me himself; he agreeing to divide with Major Lally his fees, which were five per cent. I submit a copy of the original contract between Dr. Gardiner and myself, which bears date the 28th June, 1849. The original was before the committee of the Senate. The copy submitted is a true copy, and is hereto annexed, marked Exhibit No. 11. It will be seen by that contract that I was to receive fifteen per cent. on whatever amount might be awarded. I said to Dr. Gardiner that if it became necessary to employ other counsel, I would do so without further charge to him. I employed the Hon. Thomas Corwin as assistant counsel, and agreed to pay him five per cent. out of my own commissions. I had no consultation about the case with Mr. Curtis or Major Lally: with the latter I never had even a conversation. With Mr. Curtis I had occasional conversations about the case, but never a consultation, in the meaning of that term as used by lawyers. With Mr. Corwin I had frequent consultations before he accepted his present office; never any afterwards. On one occasion, after Mr. Corwin accepted that office, I called upon him to consult about this and some other cases in which we were engaged. He said that before he accepted a place in the Cabinet he had closed his connection with those cases, and washed his hands of them, and that he could not in good faith even consult with me in relation to them.

Question by the committee. When were the first depositions filed?—were they filed with the memorial, or afterwards?

Answer. I think they were filed with the memorial; I am certain they were filed about that time. I am the more confident of this, because the only reason why the memorial was not filed immediately on the meeting of the Board in the spring of 1849, was that the copies and translation of the book of account of the mines, and some other papers presented, were not finished at that time, and it was desired to present them all together.

The first six depositions, viz: Juan Soto, Antonio Marin, William Penn Johnson, James B. Smith, Sebastian Pacheco, and William Jackson, were presented with the memorial, or about that time, to the best of my recollection, and these were all the depositions in the case when it was declared valid.

Question by the committee. Do you remember when the depositions which Dr. Gardiner presented after he returned from Mexico were filed?

Answer. I cannot give the precise date. I left Washington the 10th or 15th of October, 1850, and returned on the 19th of November, 1850. During my short absence, Dr. Gardiner returned from Mexico, and the papers had been presented before my return. My impression is that the title-deed was among the papers last presented, but the date of the official certificate to that title-deed will show whether it was presented then or before.

In answer to a question by the committee, witness says that Mr. Corwin was employed by me in May, 1849. Mr. Corwin went into the Cabinet of Mr. Fillmore on its first formation, in July, 1850; after that, so far as I know, he had no connection with or agency in the cases, but refused even to consult with me about them. It is known to everybody that prior to Mr. Corwin's going into the Cabinet he was a member of the United States Senate. The depositions above referred to, brought from Mexico by Dr. Gardiner on his last visit, were filed after Mr. Corwin went into the Cabinet.

Question by the committee. Were the first depositions taken under your instructions, or previously?

Answer. I think they were taken subsequent to my instructions, and were brought here by a person sent from Mexico by the agent of Dr. Gardiner, who arrived here just before the meeting of Congress, in 1849, which confirms my opinion that they were presented with the memorial.

Question by the committee. Were the title-papers to the mine before the Board when they decided that the claim was valid?

Answer. My impression is that they were not in the complete form in which they were afterwards presented; but that there was a short official certificate of the existence of such title.

Question by the committee. Was Mr. Thomas Corwin consulted by you in reference to these instructions as to the testimony required?

Answer. I had full consultations with Mr. Corwin about the whole case. Mr. Corwin and myself, however, wrote separate instructions. I obtained the originals of both instructions from Dr. Gardiner a month or six weeks since, and handed Mr. Corwin those drawn up by him.

Question by the committee. What depositions, or testimony, were presented with the account-book and memorial of Gardiner to the Board?

Answer. As well as I remember, the first six depositions above referred to, and, I think, some papers certified by Mexican officers relative to Gardiner's expulsion, and the printed order expelling all Americans from the department, and the protest of Dr. Gardiner.

Question by the committee. What papers did Dr. Gardiner submit to you when he first consulted you?

Answer. The book of accounts, the order for his expulsion, and the official certificates referred to; his protest, and a mass of depositions, generally, if not entirely, from the witnesses whose depositions were afterwards presented, and stating substantially the same facts as were afterwards put in the form prescribed by the Commissioners. These depositions not being in the required form, others were taken from most of the same witnesses. Some of the witnesses to the depositions brought by Dr. Gardiner from Mexico, and first shown me, could not afterwards be procured by him, but most, if not all, afterwards presented in proper form, were brought with him when I first met him here, but not in the form in which they could be used.

Question by the committee. What was the difference in the form?

Answer. They were in the ordinary form of depositions, without any statement of the age, residence, place of birth, and occupation of the witness; or that they had no interest in the case, and that the officer before whom they were taken had none; and other matters required by the rule adopted by the Commissioners.

Question by the committee. Do you know anything of Mr. Corwin's purchase of an interest in this claim?

Answer. I do, as I have heard it from both parties. The negotiation and contract were by Mr. Robert G. Corwin, in January or February, 1850. I did not know until some months afterwards, that Mr. Thomas Corwin had any interest in the purchase. Dr. Gardiner consulted me as to making the contract. I advised him to do it. My reasons for that advice were, that he was obliged to return to Mexico, and he had no funds; that I thought, from what he had told me, that with the money obtained from that sale he would be able to compound with creditors in Mexico, who he told me had extorted upon his necessities, and thus indemnify himself for his loss on that sale. The other reason was, that the claims presented to the Board were three or four times as much as the amount appropriated, and it was uncertain what the pro rata payment on the awards would be. The general impression at that time was, that it would not be more than fifty per cent. The Messrs. Corwin gave for the one fourth of the claim $22,000, and relinquished, of course, their commission on that fourth, and gave, as I understood from them, a premium of five or six thousand dollars for the money they paid Gardiner. Of the money received by Gardiner from this sale he paid me $3,000 on my fees, and the Corwins, as I understood, $2,000.

Question by the committee. You say the Corwins paid five or six thousand dollars premium for the money they paid Gardiner. To whom, and for what purpose, did they pay that amount?

Answer. To Corcoran & Riggs, of whom they borrowed the money, or a large part of it, as they informed me.

Question by the committee. How much money did the Corwins pay to Gardiner for the fourth they purchased?

Answer. The whole amount, I suppose, deducting $2,000 paid on their fees, leaving $20,000.

Question by the committee. Did the Corwins receive fees and commissions upon the other three quarters?

Answer. They did.

Question. How much in all?

Answer. Mr. Thomas Corwin's commissions were five per cent. I do not know exactly what were Mr. Robert G. Corwin's, but think they were much less. He can state.

Question. Do you know the shares in which the two Corwins held the quarter?

Answer. Equally, as I understand.

Question. Do you know the gross amount of fees and commissions paid by Gardiner to all his counsel?

Answer. My own commissions, of ten per cent., were $42,370, of which Dr. Gardiner paid me $3,000 of the money received from the Corwins; the balance, $39,370, he paid, after he received the award, to my agent, Mr. W. W. Corcoran. Mr. Thomas Corwin's fees, under his contract, were a little over $15,000. I think Mr. Robert Corwin's a little more than $5,000; and Mr. Edward Curtis, as I have been informed by Dr. Gardiner, received about $24,000. I know of no other fees being paid.

Question. For what purpose was the second series of depositions, or mass of testimony, obtained from Mexico?

Answer. To strengthen the case, and increase the amount of the award.

Witness left Washington before the awards were paid, and gave Mr. Corcoran power of attorney to receive his fees, which he did. Mr. Curtis has stated, in his examination, that he was employed by me. This is a mistake. Shortly before I left Washington, on the 4th of July, 1849, Dr. Gardiner had told me that he intended to employ Mr. Curtis. Shortly afterwards I met Mr. Curtis, and told him that Gardiner intended to employ him. This was all I ever said to him on the subject, either from that time until December, 1849, when he says he was employed, or since. I did not even know the terms on which he had been employed until June, 1850, when Mr. Curtis informed me, in a letter which he addressed to me, what commissions he was to receive, which he certainly would not have done if I had employed him and made the contract.

Mrs. Chase says that I am mistaken as to the strong language of commendation in which she spoke of Dr. Gardiner. This is not very material, as it was only one of the many testimonials to the high standing of Dr. Gardiner; but my recollection is very distinct of the conversation. It is possible that I may not have given the precise words. It is equally probable that this highly-respectable lady may herself have forgotten them; but there is no doubt of the fact that she had a favorable opinion of Dr. Gardiner, as she now admits, and as is proved by the fact of her recommending him for the highly-honorable office of assistant surgeon in the Army, and her letter to the same effect, which was presented to the Board.

At the time of my employment in this case, I had no personal acquaintance with but one of the Commissioners, Mr. Evans, and with him my relations were never intimate or cordial.

Question. Do you know who Gardiner employed to obtain his testimony in Mexico?

Answer. I do not. I know that Dr. Gardiner went to Mexico some time in the month of March or April, 1850.

Question. Do you know any other fact material to this investigation?

Answer. I do not.

Question by the committee. Did Dr. Gardiner go to Mexico more than once to obtain testimony in this case?

Answer. My impression is that he did—first, in the summer of 1849; afterwards, in March or April, 1850; I am not positive. WADDY THOMPSON.

There were two several sets of depositions and proofs procured from Mexico, and used as evidence before the Board of Commissioners. Those taken first, together with the depositions taken in the United States, were all the evidence that was in the case during Mr. Corwin's connection with it. This appears from General Thompson's deposition, and also from the deposition of Robert T. Paine, one of the Commissioners. The depositions and papers filed with the memorial, or about that time, were the following, as also appears from General Thompson and Mr. Paine's depositions:

The book of account of daily expenditures and receipts. This book of account is, I understand, a large book, and has not been copied into the testimony. It is certified as follows:

RIO VERDE, June 12, 1848.

Manuel Verastegui, prefect of the department of Rio Verde: I certify this book contains fifty-four useful leaves, and that it is a complete and literal copy (having put my scrawl on each leaf) of the original, which I have seen and compared, and which remains in deposit at the request of the creditors. MANUEL VERASTEGUI.

WASHINGTON, April 20, 1848.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Republic of Mexico: I certify that the above signature of Don Manuel Verastegui, prefect of the department of Rio Verde, in the State of San Luis Potosi, is legitimate, and the same that he uses in his official acts. LUIS DE LA ROSA.

There was also filed with the first papers the following proclamation, protest, and certificates:

The citizen Manuel José Othon, Governor of the State of San Luis Potosi, to its inhabitants makes known:

That whereas the war in which the Republic is engaged with the United States of the North increases daily, and with it the wrong that we have to avenge; that, in such a state of hostility, the laws of nations sanction all prudent and precautionary measures by the Power invaded; that the State of San Luis is very near that of New Leon whose capital is occupied by the enemy's forces; that it is very natural to suspect that the subjects of the American Government that reside in the State are, or will be, in communication with their countrymen, which would be an easy matter on account of their proximity to them; in consideration, therefore, of all here set forth, I have thought proper to issue the following decree:

ART. 1. Within three natural days, counting from the publication of this decree, all the citizens of the Republic of the North will leave the State, without any exception of persons.

2. The individuals comprised in the anterior article will present themselves immediately to the political authorities of the towns of their residence, that they may be furnished with the proper passport, and give information where they intend to remove to.

3. Any subject of the United States found in the State after the expiration of the time stipulated in article first, will be arrested and carried from post to post, until he is put beyond the limits of the State.

4. The political authorities of the towns, and the judicial where there are no others, will attend scrupulously to the strict fulfillment of the present decree, informing this government of the persons to whom they have given passports, and the place to which they have removed.

And that it may be known to all, and meet with punctual compliance, I have ordered it to be printed, published, and circulated to all whom it may concern.

Given in the Palace of the State, San Luis Potosi, October 21, 1846. MANUEL JOSE OTHON.

ALEJO O. DE PARADA, Secretary.

MANUEL VERASTEGUI, PREFECT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF RIO VERDE.

I certify that in the archives of this office, relative to the month of October, 1846, is deposited the original document of which the following is an exact copy:

HACIENDA DE SAN CRISTOBAL, October 24, 1846.

MR. PREFECT OF THIS DEPARTMENT: Having received this morning, through the justice of the peace of this district, the decree of Supreme Government of the State, dated the 21st instant, which forcibly expels from the State, in the peremptory term of three days from its date, all American citizens: and whereas I am notified that I am not only comprehended in the expulsion, but especially informed by the local authorities that their orders are such as not to allow me, under any plea, extension of time, at the expiration of the term set forth in the law, thereby augmenting this general act of injustice; for if said law grants three days to those expelled to arrange their business, it merely grants me a few hours, being notified that to day, the 24th, in which I have received the notification, the term stipulated expires, and that I will positively have to leave before to-morrow's dawn, or subject myself to be maltreated and turned out by a body of troops that are hourly expected, with the sole object of carrying me, by main force, out of the State, in case I object in the slightest manner to the fulfillment of the law.

It would be impossible for me to represent in its true light the surprise and astonishment that this arbitrary act has inspired me with. To see the person who has encouraged the industry of the country; who has raised this mining district from a state of oblivion to be one of the first in the Republic; who supports upwards of five hundred families, and is the cause of the prosperity of the whole district; who has invested a capital of upwards of three hundred thousand dollars, and has never interfered in matters of politics, nor given any cause of complaint; who has always helped the Government, whenever it has called on him, with copious sums—to behold, I again say, he who has all these recommendations, made the target of revenge of a Government, cannot but inspire horror. Your honor is a witness, as are also all the authorities of the department, that I have worked two years, investing a capital of three hundred thousand dollars, in raising and causing this mineral district to prosper, which was in a state of decay, and which is at present in a most flourishing state of prosperity. It is also well known that my presence is absolutely requisite for its prosperity, and I cannot look with indifference on the arbitrary law that obliges me to abandon to the plunder and cupidity of evil-doers my extensive property, my brilliant and flattering future. I therefore solemnly protest, as I best can by law, against the law of expulsion of the 21st of October of the present year, issued by the Government of the State of San Luis, as illegal, arbitrary, and unjust. I furthermore protest against such an unjust act as being contrary to the laws of nations, contrary to the customs of other countries, and in diametrical opposition to the treaty between the Mexican Republic and the United States, that grants six months to the citizens of both countries established on the coast to settle their business, and a year to those in the interior, after a declaration of war. I further protest against said law, because it obliges me to abandon precipitately, in the peremptory term of twenty-four hours, my extensive mining property, (hacienda de beneficio) refinery, stock of ores, grain, and effects; ores in a state of amalgamation, and everything appertaining to this kind of business. For the reasons here set forth, and as far as I have a right by law, I protest and hold the government of the State, and that of the whole nation, responsible for the damages, injuries, disturbances, and losses that my interest and business suffers, and charge it with whatever I am debarred from realizing by a stoppage of my business, the losses I may encounter or expenses incur. All of which I have the honor of making known to your honor, that you may forward the same to the Supreme Government of the State for the desired end.

I reiterate to your honor the considerations of my respect,
GEORGE A. GARDINER.

And at the request of the party interested, I give this in Rio Verde, on the 20th of June, 1848.
MANUEL VERASTEGUI.

J. PIO GUTIERREZ, Secretary.

PREFECT'S OFFICE OF THE DEPARTMENT OF RIO VERDE.

I inclose to you the original answer, which I have received from the Supreme Government of this State, respecting the authorization of your books and documents by this Prefecture, by which you will see that this just step has been approved.

I protest to you the assurance of my particular esteem.
God and liberty. Rio Verde, July 3, 1848.
MANUEL VERASTEGUI.

MR. GEORGE A. GARDINER.

WASHINGTON, November 28, 1849.

GOVERNMENT OF THE STATE OF SAN LUIS POTOSI.

His excellency the Governor having informed himself of your honor's note of the 26th of June, in which you inform him that you have certified the books and documents of the American citizen, Mr. George A. Gardiner, with relation to the damages and injuries that his mining business of Sierra Gordo suffered in consequence of the supreme decree of the 21st of October, 1846, by which he was expelled, his excellency approves of this step in the cause of justice, as there do not appear, in the expulsion of this individual, suspicions of any kind, having been a victim of a general law, without having individually given any motive whatever, and returns said documents, according to their respective ideas.

I reiterate to your honor my esteem and consideration. God and liberty. San Luis Potosi, July the 1st, 1848.

LUIS GUZMAN.

TO the PREFECT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF RIO VERDE.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Mexican Republic: I certify that the above signature of Don Luis Guzman, Secretary of the Government of the State of San Luis Potosi, is legitimate, and the same that he uses in all his official acts.

LUIS DE LA ROSA.

WASHINGTON, November 29, 1849.

Also the depositions of Juan Soto, Antonio Marin, W. P. Johnson, and William Jackson, taken in September, 1849, before Simon de los Santos, third constitutional alcalde and judge of the first plea of Cadereyta Jimines; also the depositions of J. B. Smith and Sebastian Pacheco, taken in September, 1849, before José Antonio Leal, first constitutional alcalde, and President of the City Council of Linares. These depositions are certified by the officers who took them, and the official certificates of the officers before whom they were taken, or purport to have been taken, are certified, and the official character of said officers is certified by Thomas W. Slemons, Consul of the United States at Matamoros, Mexico. There was also an official certificate, or an affidavit in relation to the nature of Gardiner's title to the silver mine in the Sierra of Huasteca, county of Laguinillas, in the prefecture of Rio Verde, in the State of San Luis Potosi. That paper is not copied into the testimony, and was not before the committee.

The foregoing embraces all the testimony and papers filed at or about the time of filing the memorial of Gardiner. Subsequently, in January and February, 1850, the depositions of John Charles Gardiner, Colonel William Gates, and C. J. Learned, Esq., were taken and filed. And these several papers, to wit: the book of account of daily expenditures and receipts; the order of the Governor of the State of San Luis Potosi; Gardiner's protest; the six depositions taken in Mexico, in September, 1849, and the three depositions taken in the United States, as far as the committee have ascertained, are all the proofs that were before the Board of Commissioners during Mr. Corwin's connection with the claim.

All of these papers, whether they state the truth or not, are genuine. It is proved by witnesses from the State Department that the certificates of Slemons, the American Consul at Matamoros, and the certificate of Mr. Rosa, the Mexican Minister, are genuine. José Antonio Barragan, comptroller general of rents of the State of San Luis Potosi, one of the principal witnesses, by whom the claim is proved to be fraudulent, swears that the certificates of Manuel Verastegui, and J. Pio Gutierrez, to the book of accounts, and the protest of Gardiner against his expulsion from the country, are genuine. The certificate of Luis Guzman is the only certificate that is disputed. Mr. Barragan says it is not genuine, while Mr. Rosa, the Mexican Minister, certifies to its correctness. There is among the papers brought from Mexico in relation to the Gardiner claim, a statement of Luis Guzman, dated December, 1851, in which, after describing the statement of Verastegui in relation to the protest, he says "there exists no such paper in his office, nor a copy of his reply thereto, as there ought to do, if it is genuine." And because the paper bears date July 1, 1848, instead of July 3, 1848, when the first mail from San Luis Potosi in that month left for the direction of Rio Verde, he thinks it is a forgery. He does not, however, deny that he gave such a certificate, but merely states that there are no such papers in his office, as there ought to be if it is genuine. All the proof, depositions, and documents, that were before the Board when the claim was allowed, and passed as a valid claim, in March, 1850, are therefore shown to be genuine, except the certificate of Luis Guzman, and that is not successfully impeached. There is not in the testimony first presented, and upon which the claim was allowed as valid, anything to enable a person skilled in the mining laws of Mexico, and having a knowledge of the official seals and certificates of her public officers, to detect a fraud, or to raise a suspicion of fraud.

If the claim of Gardiner is a sheer fabrication, and a naked fraud, the testimony upon which it was allowed by the Board in the first instance is false, and the officers of the Mexican Government whose seals of office and official certificates were used and procured, were joint perpetrators with Gardiner of the fraud, and the six witnesses who testified in September, 1849, were perjured. If, in truth, Gardiner had no mines, all his proofs going to establish the fact that he had, must be false. Yet they were all genuine, and had all the appearance of legal validity that evidence could have, and could only be disproved by persons acquainted with the locality, and knowing that they were untrue. They were not forgeries, and of course could not be detected by any supposed knowledge of the official signatures and seals of the officers of that department of Mexico. The testimony before the Commissioners, and on which the claim was allowed on the 12th of March, 1850, proved clearly, that in July, 1844, Dr. Gardiner commenced mining operations on a large scale, in the State of San Luis Potosi, in the department of Rio Verde, at La Huasteca; that at the place of his operations, silver mines had long previously been worked, and abandoned; that he opened and re-established them, and made large improvements and outlays in commencing the business; that he had put up machinery and fixtures necessary for the business; that he had prosperously and successfully pursued the business until October 24th, 1846, when he was expelled by force; that his establishment, and everything belonging to it, including a large amount of silver in the form of amalgam, was taken from him by Mexican soldiers, and the buildings destroyed by fire; that he had expended a large amount of money, and was, at the time of his expulsion, making $50,000 per month; that his losses were very heavy, estimated at from $450,000 to $500,000; that, being expelled under an order of the Governor of the State of San Luis Potosi, of October 21, 1846, on the 24th of October, 1846, he protested to the prefect of the department of Rio Verde against his expulsion, as a violation of the treaty between the United States and Mexico, of 1831; that, in 1847, in the month of July, he went to Tampico, and there made application for the place of surgeon in the American army then occupying that city; that he made known to Colonel Gates, military Governor of the city, and to C. J. Learned, Esq., judge of the place, under military authority, the circumstances of his expulsion from his mines, and his losses; and consulted with Mr. Learned how he should proceed to establish his claim against Mexico for his loss; and that he remained at Tampico during the stay of the American army in that city, acting as surgeon to the troops. This proof would seem to be entirely conclusive, in the absence of anything to throw suspicion upon it.

Mr. Corwin, in February, 1850, with the case before him as it was then presented, purchased one eighth of Gardiner's interest. As is shown by Thompson's deposition, the number of claims before the Commissioners was so great that it was not expected more than one half the amounts finally awarded could be paid with the sum provided by the treaty under which the Board had been created. General Thompson swears that that was his impression, and that such was Gardiner's at the time of the sale. For the interest that Mr. Corwin purchased, he paid $11,000 in money, and what he supposed was about as much more in his expected fees on the balance of the claim; and for which, if but one half should be paid—if all that was claimed by Gardiner should be finally awarded—he could realize but about $32,500.

It is true that afterwards he sold his interest for about $50,000, perhaps not so much, (having sold his interest in the Gardiner claim, with his fee interests in thirty-six other cases pending before the Board, together, for $80,270.) The precise amount that he received of Mr. Law for his interest in the Gardiner claim is not shown. I think the evidence shows that it was less than $50,000. After the final award, Mr. Roberts, or Mr. Law, as assignee of his interest, received $53,593 75.

It is urged as an objection against Mr. Corwin that he became a purchaser at all. Whether that be a good objection or not, the fact and manner of his purchase proves conclusively, that whatever the Board or others might think of Gardiner's claim, he thought it a good claim for the full amount, or nearly so, that was claimed; or, if he did not, that he was aware that it was fraudulent, and was willing to give a large amount of money, and his services, to carry out a fraud that ought—and would, if exposed—to consign him to infamy, for a contingent interest in the result from which he could not probably realize more than twice or thrice the amount that he paid. That would be a monstrous supposition. The fact of his purchase in the manner shown by the testimony, proves conclusively that he did not know that the claim was fraudulent, and sustained, or to be sustained, by false testimony; that he had no suspicion at all of unfairness in the claim, but on the contrary, had every reason to believe and did believe that it was a good claim for the amount demanded.

The testimony taken in Mexico, in July, 1850, and filed before the Board in November, 1850, which is proved by several witnesses that have been examined, and testimony taken by the authorities of the United States in Mexico, in December, 1851, to be forged, consists of a paper purporting to be a record from the book of mines of the prefecture of Rio Verde, certified to by Don Francisco Fernandez, Prefect of Rio Verde, J. Pio Gutierrez, Secretary; Julian de los Reyes, Governor of San Luis Potosi; and Luis Guzman, Secretary of State, together with six depositions. All of these signatures, seals, &c., are shown by this testimony to be forgeries. This testimony, filed in November, 1850, was taken and filed long after Mr. Corwin had ceased to have any connection with the claim. It was procured, not to satisfy the Board of the validity of the claim, but to increase the award.

I mention this distinction between the testimony which was before the Board when the claim was allowed in March, 1850, and the testimony taken afterwards, for this reason: I think I have shown not only that there is no proof tending to show that Mr. Corwin knew that the testimony was false or forged, but that the first evidence produced was of such a character that he could not have known it, without a personal knowledge of the district of Lagunillus, in Rio Verde. And of the character of the last testimony, he could have known nothing, for the reason that he never saw it. The testimony of Edward W. Johnston, Secretary of the Board of Commissioners, and of Robert T. Paine, one of the Board, show how carefully this claim was passed upon by the Board.

Edward W. Johnston appeared as a witness on the part of the committee, and was sworn.

Witness resides in Washington city, and was secretary of the Board of Commissioners from July, 1849, till April, 1851. The first secretary of the Board was Mr. Jones, who served a few months. Witness says, that, from the beginning, the claim of Gardiner was regarded by the Board with some suspicion. These suspicions arose from the rumors which reached the Board, in regard to the case—as one either without merit originally, or founded upon slight merits, and grossly exaggerated in the amount. In consequence of these suspicions, the Board was especially careful in the examination of this case. A great mass of proofs, apparently very complete and very authentic, was introduced with the case. These papers were very carefully sifted, and the Board repeatedly imagined that it found circumstances in the details of the case which betrayed the latent fraud or exaggeration which they had been led to expect. I think, in as many as five or six instances of this sort, they called the claimant or his counsel before them to explain these points and clear them up. After the first instances, the Board became satisfied that Dr. Gardiner himself understood his own case better than anybody else, and that the best means of arriving at the truth would be to receive his own statements, and cross-examine him on all these points. They did so; therefore, and I am clear that there was no instance in which he did not satisfy them, by his apparent truthfulness, clearness, consistency, and readiness to reveal all facts in a remarkably manly and frank way, that the particular objection in each case was unfounded. There was no suspicion on the part of the Board that the claim was laid at a place where there was no mine; though there was suspicion, at the beginning, that there was no foundation for his claim, and this suspicion existed at the beginning and all through the examination of the claim, until finally dissipated by the progress of the proof and explanations. Witness says, that, coming to learn, either from without or from the statement of the claimant himself, that his occupation in Mexico had been that of a dentist, they of course conceived from this fact that it was unlikely that he should have capital for great mining undertakings, as this really was: thereupon he was required by the Board to appear before them in person, and to state in what manner he obtained the resources necessary for such purpose. Upon this subject, he went into the history of his own earlier connection with mining speculations and operations, stating that he was skilled in chemistry and mineralogy, as a part of his own pursuit; and the opportunity of seeing in Mexico the fortunes which a skill, inferior to his own, often enabled men to make, led him to addict himself, first of all, to the direct study of metallurgy, and, by-and-by, to speculations in mines themselves. Gardiner stated, that this is a great matter of gambling in Mexico; and nothing but talent and skill could make it anything else. The great king of Mexican mines, Perez Galvez, at last remarked his (Gardiner's) uniform success, and, taking him into favor, offered him his credit to carry forward any of his undertakings. Of these statements I think he produced proofs, in the shape of a correspondence between himself and Perez Galvez. Its extent I cannot speak of. I am not sure that it established anything beyond an intimacy between Perez Galvez and Gardiner. Among the general proofs there were some which made a particular impression upon the Board, as of a character fixing the unavoidable authenticity of Gardiner's mining operations, and chief of these the register, or book of accounts of the mine itself, kept by the Government commissary.

Upon the register or book of accounts referred to being shown to the witness, he says that, upon inspection, he still continues of the opinion that it was kept by the Government commissary.

Question by the committee. Did the Board ever take any means, by depositions or otherwise, to obtain any testimony from Mexico touching the Gardiner claim?

Answer. They did not, either in that case or any other. The counsel in the Gardiner case was, as well as I recollect, originally General Waddy Thompson, who was understood to have prepared the papers. Afterwards Mr. Thomas Corwin was introduced into the case; then Messrs. Curtis, Lally, and Robert G. Corwin.

Question by Mr. Corwin. Did I ever appear before the Board after I went into the Cabinet?

Answer. Never. The practice of the Board was, after having settled the principle of an award, to make up the amount of pecuniary damages on those principles; but the latter were not disclosed—the former only was communicated to the public—nor known even to the Secretary himself; but this is not because he could not know, but voluntarily.

Question by the committee. When the decision in favor of Dr. Gardiner was first made, was the amount to be awarded him, as well as the validity of his claim, determined by the Board?

Answer. A definite amount was then awarded. Of course, he (Gardiner) did not know the amount, nor his counsel; and I understood, at the time, that an intimation was given to Dr. Gardiner by the Board, that if he could satisfy them on certain points where his proofs were insufficient, his award would be increased accordingly. In this case it chanced that I heard the amount of the award before I could quit the Board, as I usually did, to avoid learning the amount of the particular award. This is the only instance in which the like happened. The amount originally awarded was, I think, $300,000.

It was the practice of the Commissioners to keep each a memorandum-book, in which he entered the amount of the award, and the particulars of which it was made up. These books were kept under their own personal lock and key; and whenever they left the city, I took care that they should be sealed up by themselves.

Question by the committee. When was the amount determined to be awarded, upon the first decision of the Board as to the validity of the claim, announced to the claimant or the public?

Answer. In this instance, as in all others, it was communicated to neither the claimant nor the public, nor anybody else, as long as I was in office, and only made known when the awards were all published together, so far as I know.

After the thorough sifting which the Board gave to the testimony, after repeated examinations of the claimant, and, as well as I recollect, several arguments of counsel, the Board came to the conviction that the case, as to its merits, was as well made out, as little to be suspected, as any which was before them. This conviction was gradually reached, in spite of the original prejudices of the Board, which were slowly, and only upon complete examination, abandoned. I do not think that any case before the Board was more jealously canvassed. Originally, they of course extended to the person of Dr. Gardiner the prepossessions which they entertained against his case; but the Doctor himself gradually forced himself upon their esteem, by conduct so remarkable for its delicacy and propriety, that I have heard the feeling expressed again and again, by all the members of the Board, that not only had Dr. Gardiner shown in the progress of his case great sense, but that unquestionably his behavior in everything connected with his case had been signalized by its exact propriety. I may state, further, that the impressions which I have narrated as those of the Board, were closely followed by my own; for both went upon the same circumstances, and, of course, arrived at the same conclusions. In myself this is the more to be remarked, because I had a personal difficulty with the junior counsel of Dr. Gardiner; and as this was at the period when I was prepossessed against the claim itself, of course I had an individual dislike to overcome, in addition to such prejudices as the Board itself entertained. Yet, by the conclusion of the case, I had ceased to entertain the slightest suspicion against its complete fairness, or its full establishment by proofs.

Question by the committee. In how many cases was the amount determined upon, when the validity of the claim was decided, changed in the final award?

Answer. The book of opinions will show in how many cases. I think there were several cases in which awards were changed—as many as four or five, perhaps.

Question by the committee. When did the Board decide to increase the amount of award in the Gardiner case, and determine the amount of increase?

Answer. I do not know—the books do not show; but I presume it was when the Board made its final award, which did not occur till after I resigned. It was the practice of the Board to suggest doubts to the claimants as to the validity of their claims, to give them an opportunity to improve their testimony, or to argue points of law. This was often done.

Question by Mr. Corwin. Are you sure the amount of $300,000, which you understood to be the first award to Gardiner, was the gross sum; or might it not have been $300,000 with interest, from the date of his expulsion up to the rendition of the award?

Answer. I was endeavoring to get out of the way, and I only heard the sum of $300,000 named. Whether more was said or not I cannot say.

EDWARD WM. JOHNSTON.

TUESDAY, October 5—10 a. m.

Robert T. Paine appeared as a witness, and was sworn.

Question. Were you a member of the Board of Commissioners to adjust claims of American citizens against Mexico, under the late treaty?

Answer. I was. I served from the beginning to the end of the commission. It met the 16th of April, 1849. It adjourned on the 15th or 16th of April, 1851. The Board adjourned in June, 1850, to meet again in November, same year. General Taylor died before the Board met in November. I heard of his death while at home.

Question by Mr. Corwin. Did I ever appear before the Board as attorney, in any case, after General Taylor's death, and after the formation of Mr. Fillmore's Cabinet?

Answer. Never, sir, to my knowledge. I knew at the meeting of the Board that Mr. Corwin had disconnected himself as counsel in any case.

Question. Were there two sets of papers and proofs exhibited to the Board in the case of George A. Gardiner, at different times?

Answer. There was additional testimony introduced after the Board had decided upon the validity of the claim.

Question. Was I counsel at the time that additional testimony was introduced?

Answer. I cannot tell what time that additional testimony was filed, but it was not laid before the Board until the meeting of the Board in November, 1850.

Question. The claim of G. A. Gardiner was first received by the Board on the 30th November, 1849, as appears from the journal of the Board. What papers were filed at that time?

Answer. I cannot say certainly; I know his memorial was then filed, that being the first thing that the Board considered. When the case was taken up for consideration, I remember that the book of accounts and affidavits, showing the possession of Gardiner in the mine, the amount of property he had on hand, or the value of its fixtures, the profits of the mine for a number of months, and the value of the ore on hand, and that in a state of amalgam, were then before the Board, and with these there was some evidence of title to the mine in Gardiner, but not sufficient to establish his legal title, and other evidence going to establish the validity of his claim. I do not recollect what that evidence of title was—whether it was a certificate or affidavit, or what it was.

Question. Are you certain that there was any paper showing Gardiner's title to the mine at the time the first decision of the Board was made?

Answer. I feel confident that there was no deed, but I cannot tell whether there was any paper or not. My impression is that there was.

Question. Was there any objection, at the Board, that the title was not proved?

Answer. It is impossible for me to speak of the consultation of the Board in this case in particular. It was contended, on the part of the claimant, that he was entitled to pay for the mine. That claim was met, on the part of the Board, by saying that there was not sufficient proof of his title to the mine.

Question. Why were not the damages determined when the Board of Commissioners allowed the claim?

Answer. They were determined, so far as they were in any case. The Board decided upon the validity of a claim, at the same time looking into the amount which they thought ought to be awarded to the claimant. This award was, however, not considered final by the Board. It was left open for various reasons. The Board thought that if the award should be published as the case was decided, it would produce a great deal of dissatisfaction among claimants, and give trouble to the Board; and because testimony might afterwards be introduced or discovered, which might materially affect the award. Memoranda were kept, by deponent and Mr. Smith, of the Board, of the amounts of the awards.

Question. When the claim was allowed, was there any intimation to Gardiner, or his counsel, that the award would be increased upon the production of additional proof?

Answer. I cannot undertake to say whether intimation was given to Gardiner's counsel or not. I know the Board did not give such intimation to Gardiner. I am confident the Board would not have allowed consequential damages unless Gardiner showed title to the mine.

Question. Do you remember what amount the Board decided to award when they first determined that the claim was valid?

Answer. I feel confident that the members of the Board did not agree on this question; but the award was augmented by the introduction of the subsequent evidence, though not very largely—I think some fifty or sixty thousand dollars.

Question by Mr. Corwin. Did you, as one of the Board, have the papers in this case in your custody, and give them a careful examination?

Answer. I did, for it was one of the largest claims before the Board; and there were rumors in circulation in relation to the claim, and I received an anonymous note cautioning me in relation to it. The note bore the stamp of the Irving Hotel, and was signed by a North Carolinian. I used every exertion to find out the writer, but could not.

Question. Before the final award, were there any suspicions or suggestions of fraud in the testimony?

Answer. There were none; and I never heard of any until I saw it in the public papers.

Question. Do you know any other fact material to this case?

Answer. I do not remember any other.

ROBT. T. PAINE.

Mr. Speaker, I am done with the case in the aspect in which it was presented to the Board, and have assumed that it is true as stated by the committee, that the claim is now shown to be a naked fraud. That question, I am content to leave as the committee have left it. The question for us is, had the Secretary of the Treasury any knowledge of its fraudulent character? The committee say that there is no proof that he had, and I have attempted to show that it is proved he had not.

But it is due to Dr. Gardiner to say, as has been said by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. CHAPMAN,] that the testimony against him is almost wholly ex parte; and I will add, that although it makes a strong ex parte case against him, it is far from being conclusive as to his guilt. If it shall finally appear that the claim of Gardiner is a sheer fabrication, it is not only one of the most stupendous frauds ever committed, but the most extraordinary.

It is shown by the testimony that he went to Mexico in 1839 or 1840, and resided at Vera Cruz and the city of Mexico until 1844, when he left for the interior; and from 1844, until the fall of 1846, it is not shown where he was by the testimony against him. In October of that year, he appeared in the department of Rio Verde for the first time, as the witnesses examined by the committee state; but William Goyeneche, in a letter to Mr. Letcher, which is printed with the testimony taken by the committee, states that he saw him a few months after he left the city of Mexico in 1844 in Rio Verde, where he staid a short time. Gardiner's proof before the Board shows where he was from July, 1844, to October, 1846, but the testimony against him does not.

The Mexican witnesses, Mr. Barragan and others, swear that his claim was fabricated in 1848, at Rio Verde, by himself, Manuel Verastegui, José Pio Guttierrez, and Domingo Ithurry, and that it was publicly known to have been gotten up by them, in Rio Verde, in consequence of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. This, they state, was generally known in the city of Rio Verde.

Now, sir, that cannot be true, unless the testimony of Colonel Gates and C. J. Learned, Esq., both men of high character, taken to sustain the Gardiner claim as before stated, and that of Anne Chase, the wife of our Consul at Tampico, taken by the committee, are false, which, I suppose, will not be pretended. The fraud of Gardiner was designed by him, if it is a fraud, before the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was made. That treaty was made on the 2d of February, 1848. The witnesses above named say, that he came to Tampico in the summer of 1847, as early as July. He applied for a surgeon's place, and obtained it, and continued there as surgeon until the American troops left the city. He represented there that he had been driven out of Mexico, and described his large property, his silver mines, and consequent losses upon his expulsion. He consulted with Mr. Learned, who was judge of the place under American authority, as to what course he should pursue to establish his claim against Mexico.

It was generally understood in Tampico, during the time our forces were there, that Gardiner had been driven out of Mexico, where he had a large property in mines. At that time there was no treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. General Scott had not taken the city of Mexico. It was between the time of the capture of Vera Cruz and his arrival in the city of Mexico. It was in the midst of the war—flagrante bello. It may well be asked, what object Gardiner could have had, prior to the treaty, to make these representations? The war was then in progress, and no man could tell what would be its termination. At that time he could have had no other expectation than that he would have to make his claim against Mexico under the treaty which he claimed had been violated in his case.

After the Commissioners made their final award, in April, 1851, Gardiner deposited in this city and New York, $220,000, nearly the whole of the amount awarded, that was coming to him; and when, in July, suspicions that the claim was unjust were entertained, and proceedings commenced against him, that amount was found in the hands of Corcoran & Riggs, of this city, and in the Life Insurance and Trust Company of New York.

In this connection, there is a singular correspondence between Manuel Verastegui and José

Antonio Barragan, printed in this book of evidence which was furnished to the committee, I suppose by Mr. Barragan, or brought by Mr. Slacum from Mexico, with the testimony taken by him as agent of the United States, in December, 1851. The letters are dated in December, 1851, at the time Mr. Slacum was in San Luis Potosi. The first letter is dated Rio Verde, December 15, 1851, and is written by Verastegui to Barragan, in which he complains that the Mexicans are a set of poor devils, and blames Mr. Barragan and others for the course they were pursuing in relation to the Gardiner claim, and implicating him in it. He protests that what he did was for the benefit of creditors. Barragan replies on the 22d of December, 1851, and after protesting that he was doing nothing unfair towards Verastegui, he charges that the whole story of Gardiner's mine is a pure fiction, and then proceeds:

"This fiction could only have been credited where they had not even the most distant knowledge of the country, as in effect did happen where there was no one to contradict it. But now, if it is asked of those who lived in Rio Verde, do you believe that there is one who would have the courage to say that a thing exists which never was? See the Monitor Republicano, number 2,189, of 19th May, and you will see that the money in question belongs to Mexico, and not to the North, for the total of the claims admitted comes up to $3,903,523; so that, deducted from the $3,250,000 which the North retains for the claims of its citizens, there remains to be delivered to the Government of Mexico $46,477; and this without counting the claims set up by Gardiner and Mears. To the first we adjudged $428,747 50, and to the other $153,125. These two amounts added to the anterior, make the amount $628,349 50, which undoubtedly belong to the Mexican Government."

To this letter, Verastegui replies on the 24th of December, and says, that he will now change his course.

This correspondence shows two things: first, that Verastegui, when acknowledging his entire want of moral principle, insists that Gardiner had creditors in Rio Verde, whose interests he was looking after; second, that Barragan, who is comptroller of rents of the State of San Luis Potosi, in his testimony and his activity in this affair, believed that the fraud perpetrated by Gardiner is not a fraud upon the United States, but upon Mexico. How far that idea may have influenced the witnesses who have testified in relation to the claim, I do not know. The tenor of the correspondence referred to would indicate that its influence was considerable.

This much I have said in relation to the case of Gardiner himself, not that it has any connection with the propriety of Mr. Corwin's conduct, but simply as an act of justice to the cause of truth as applicable to him. I therefore repeat, that if it shall turn out that the claim of Gardiner is a sheer fabrication, it is not only a most startling and stupendous fraud, but one of the most extraordinary in the history of crime.

Mr. Speaker, I will now take another view of this matter. The first clause of the fifteenth article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo reads as follows:

"The United States, exonerating Mexico from all demands on account of the claims of their citizens, mentioned in the preceding article, and considering them entirely and forever canceled, whatever their amount may be, undertake to make satisfaction for the same, to an amount not exceeding $3,250,000. To ascertain the validity and amount of those claims, a Board of Commissioners shall be established by the Government of the United States, whose awards shall be final and conclusive: Provided, That in deciding upon the validity of each claim, the Board shall be guided and governed by the principles and rules of decision prescribed by the first and fifth articles of the unratified convention, concluded at the city of Mexico, on the 20th day of November, 1843; and in no case shall an award be made in favor of any claim not embraced by these principles and rules."

This treaty bears date February 2, 1848. On the 3d of March, 1849, an act of Congress was passed, providing for the appointment of a Board of Commissioners to carry into effect the agreement of the United States, contained in the fifteenth article. The Board was appointed soon afterwards, and in April, 1849, met and organized. In May, 1849, Mr. Corwin was employed by General Thompson to assist him in the prosecution of the Gardiner claim. On November 30, 1849, the claim of Gardiner was presented to the Board. In February, 1850, Mr. Corwin purchased one half of one fourth of the claim. In July, 1850, he disposed of his interest in that claim, with his fee interest in thirty-six other claims pending before the Board, to George Law, Esq., by an absolute, unconditional sale. In November, 1850, he received from Mr. Law the money for his claims, and made the final written transfer.

On the 3d of March, 1851, Congress passed an appropriation bill, of which I will read a section:

"For the payment of the money to those entitled under the fifteenth article of the treaty between the United States and Mexico, concluded February 2d, 1848, according to the provisions of the sixth section of an act entitled 'An act to carry into effect certain stipulations of the treaty between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico, of the 2d day of February, 1848,' the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to sell the stock to be issued under the said section, and to issue it under the same restrictions, limitations, and provisions as are contained in the second section of an act entitled 'An act authorizing the issue of Treasury notes and a loan,' and approved July 22, 1846: Provided, however, That the stock so issued shall not bear a rate of interest greater than five per centum per annum, and that it shall be redeemable in ten years from its date."

By this section it appears that eight months after Mr. Corwin had ceased to have any interest in the Gardiner claim, and more than three months after he had made the final transfer and received his money, Congress authorized him to sell United States stock to pay the claims of those entitled under the fifteenth article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. What claims? Those that had been and should be awarded by the Board of Commissioners.

At the time of the passage of the law of March 3d, 1851, the Gardiner claim had been passed upon by the Board of Commissioners nearly a year. Congress then knew as much about the character of this claim as Mr. Corwin. It was also known that he had been interested in claims before that Board, and had sold out. Did Congress at that time think the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury improper? So far from it, they authorized him to sell United States stocks to pay all the claims that had been or should be allowed by the Board! The Gardiner claim had been allowed before, and was finally decided upon in April, 1851, and was paid, not a dollar of it, however, to Mr. Corwin.

Some importance is attempted to be given to this affair, because Mr. Corwin, being a Senator, was engaged in the prosecution of claims before the Board of Commissioners—because, being a Senator, he was prosecuting claims against the United States.

Is it true that the claims allowed by the Board of Commissioners were claims against the United States, and were those engaged in their prosecution engaged in prosecuting claims against the United States? The Government of the United States had agreed to pay the claims to a limited amount—that is very true. But they were not that class of claims usually meant when we speak of claims against the Government. We had agreed to absolve Mexico from all liability for the claims of our citizens against that Republic, and to pay them to an amount not exceeding $3,250,000. We then established a court for the adjudication and settlement of the claims of our citizens against Mexico. Our Government by this arrangement liquidated the gross amount of these claims, and agreed to pay it out in the manner stipulated.

If we could pay the claims of our citizens against Mexico with a much less amount than was stipulated, Mexico would have no right to gainsay it. And yet there is some reason in the view taken by the Mexicans that they are entitled, in equity to all the surplus, after the payment of all the valid claims of our citizens. We exacted from them the amount fixed upon, and received value for that amount. If the claims of our citizens against Mexico fall short of the amount agreed upon, the United States, by the arrangement, have the advantage of Mexico to the extent of the surplus. But if the claims of our citizens had exceeded the amount agreed upon, then Mexico would have been benefited to the extent of the excess, and our citizens would have been the losers. It was an arrangement by which we secured from Mexico $3,250,000 for the benefit of our citizens.

The claims presented before the Board of Commissioners were, as I conceive, in no legitimate sense of the word claims against the United States. The Commissioners were merely appointed to award to the several claimants their proper shares of the sum stipulated for their liquidation.

I have adverted to this for the sole purpose of showing that there is no real difference in principle between the prosecution of claims of this character and the prosecution of claims against private individuals.

The Mexican Claims Commission was a court created by law, and to all intents and purposes a judicial tribunal; not a permanent court, to be sure, but one created for a special purpose, all of whose functions were judicial. Such tribunals have been created from time to time since the organization of the Government. There have been two or three for the purpose of adjusting Mexican claims; one under a treaty with Spain a number of years ago for the settlement of claims against that country, and several others at different periods.

The practice has always been for members of Congress to appear before them. From the first, sir, men of the most undoubted honor and integrity, and of commanding influence in Congress, have engaged in practice before such courts. They never dreamed of its being improper, or a disparagement to their character or position. No one thought so. The celebrated Mr. Pinkney, one of the ablest as well as purest public men of his day, appeared before the Board of Commissioners for the settlement of claims against Spain while he was a Senator from the State of Maryland.

In this very case, Mr. Corwin was not the only Senator or member of Congress who appeared before the Board of Commissioners and prosecuted claims. A distinguished Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON;] the able Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT;] the highly accomplished Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. SOULE,] all appeared before the Board as counsel, I am informed. Mr. Webster had many cases before it. Gentlemen of distinction in this House appeared before it, and several gentlemen who were then members of Congress, but are not now, had cases before the Board, as I have been informed.

Why, then, should Mr. Corwin be singled out from all the host who appeared as counsel before that Board, and other Boards, as the object of reproach? Why should any man be reproached for appearing before that and similar tribunals? There was no law against it. No principle of morals or propriety forbade it. And if Mr. Corwin deserves censure, then the whole practice of our public men, from the beginning of the Government, is deserving of censure. The other members of Congress who appeared before the same Board are equally subject to reproach.

I cannot see any violation of sound morality, or even punctilious propriety in the practice. The Board of Commissioners was a court as much as the Supreme Court of the United States is a court. It was a court of high character, composed of men of distinction and ability as lawyers and statesmen—men appointed by a Whig President and confirmed by a Democratic Senate. I can see no more reason to censure a Senator for practicing before such a court, than to censure him for practicing before the Supreme Court of the United States, or before the State courts. Is a lawyer to lose his character as such when he becomes a member of Congress? I suppose, in fact, many men become members of Congress because they are considered good lawyers; and why should they lose their characters as lawyers, and cease to practice their profession, because they are members of Congress? If that rule should be adopted, I think the bar would lose much, and the country and the cause of justice would lose more.

Mr. Speaker, I consider this to be the whole point, and the only point in this case: Shall members of Congress for the time being cease to practice their profession, if they are lawyers? If it is thought best to make such a rule for the future, I shall not object to it, though I can see no propriety in it.

Mr. Corwin was employed in the usual manner that lawyers are employed in collection cases. He was to receive a certain per cent. on the amount collected. The manner of his employment is not objectionable; his being employed at all is the impropriety, if any, in his conduct. His purchase of an interest in what he considered an honest claim is not, surely, a matter of just reproach. It is as perfectly legitimate, for aught I see, to purchase a claim for money pending before a proper tribunal for adjustment, as it is to purchase any other species of property which is the subject of litigation. I know of no law anywhere to prohibit such purchase, nor any principle of morality that is violated by it.

It is not, therefore, the manner of the employment, nor the fact of his purchase of an interest, that makes Mr. Corwin's conduct censurable, but his employment in the case as a lawyer, that is the subject of complaint. On this subject I think I have said enough.

But this claim of Gardiner is shown to be fraudulent—a fact which it is admitted Mr. Corwin did not know, and which it is abundantly shown he could not have even suspected—and therefore his appearance before the Board in the prosecution of the claim was improper. In other words, a lawyer is to be held responsible for the forgeries, perjuries, and other villainies of his clients and their witnesses. Mr. Speaker, this would be a fearful responsibility. That proposition is too monstrous to be thought of. If that rule shall obtain, we may well exclaim, "Wo unto ye lawyers!" Mr. Clay once said in the Senate, by way of compliment to Mr. Grundy, that if he (Mr. Grundy) were to be held responsible for all the rascals he had saved from the gallows, he would have a fearful account to render. If lawyers are responsible for all the bad cases they have, for all the perjuries and forgeries committed by their clients and their witnesses, God forbid that any of us should practice the profession!

I can see a manifest impropriety in members of Congress being interested in the prosecution of claims before Congress. I can also see that their attending to the prosecution of claims before the Executive Departments, and becoming interested in them, might lead to abuses. The intercourse between the Executive Departments and members of Congress is so intimate that the practice might lead to abuse. The prosecution of claims before Congress by the members of Congress for a compensation, is morally wrong; for upon such claims members have to decide. In the prosecution of claims before the Executive Departments the case is different, and though the practice may lead to abuse, it is not morally wrong. Claims pending before Congress and the Executive Departments are properly said to be claims against the Government; but claims pending in court are wholly different, and are beyond the reach of Executive or legislative influence.

Mr. Speaker, as I have said, the Mexican Claims Commission was a court, and one of high character; and neither law, morality, or propriety, was any more violated by practicing before it, than by practicing in the Supreme Court of the United States.

But it is said Mr. Corwin was employed because of his high political position, and therefore his conduct was improper. My experience is, that men will follow blindly after political and religious leaders; that they will be duped and humbugged in almost all the relations of life; but that lawyers are employed because of their legal abilities. In that matter, men generally act with reason and discretion. Lawyers are not employed because they have been judges, or because they are Senators, Governors, or Representatives, but because they are lawyers.

Mr. DEAN, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to ask him a question? I understood the gentleman to say that these persons who prosecuted this Gardiner claim were employed because they were lawyers, and for their standing at the bar. Does the gentleman mean to say that Major Lally was employed for the same reason, because he was a lawyer?

Mr. BARRERE. I do not know what the gentleman from New York understood. I said nothing about the reasons why the gentlemen in this particular case were employed, for I do not know. I stated a general proposition as the result of my experience. What was Gardiner's motive for employing Major Lally I do not know, nor the motive of General Thompson for employing Mr. Corwin. Major Lally was a distinguished officer in the Army; whether he is a lawyer or not I do not know. I have understood that he is the confidential friend of the President elect, and I suppose is a very honest and upright man. I never heard anything to his disparagement. I understand that he is a business man of high character.

The morals of the profession of law I think as high-toned and elevated as those of any other class of men. I know, sir, that there are those who consider the bar as corrupt and dangerous members of the community. The question has even been argued, whether a man can be a Christian and a practicing lawyer? It is not uncommon for demagogues to denounce lawyers, and to heap odium upon the profession. But as a class I know of no more useful, honorable, and upright body of men, none who have done so much to plant and establish liberty and justice in the world. The profession, true to itself, its honor, and the cause of justice, will always condemn its unworthy members and their unworthy practices, as the whole American and British bar did the celebrated Mr. Phillips for protesting to his belief of the innocence of a client who had confessed his guilt to him. But the profession never dreamed that they were responsible for the justice of their client's causes. Like others, they are liable to imposition, and when they become cognizant of the frauds or misconduct of their clients, then it is their undoubted duty to expose them; and that an honest lawyer will do to the extent of his ability.

In this case Mr. Corwin has been shown to have rendered every assistance in his power to the full development of the nature of this claim. In July, 1851, the claim became suspected for the first time by an officer in the State Department, and from that time to the present, the Administration have been using their utmost endeavors to ferret out the true nature of the Gardiner claim, and to bring the perpetrators of the fraud to justice.

I fear, Mr. Speaker, that I am insulting the House and the country by seriously arguing this matter. The committee have reported that there is nothing found in all this investigation, even having a tendency to prove that Mr. Corwin had any knowledge of the unfounded character of Gardiner's claim, or that any improper evidence was used or to be used. That, his friends have thought, was an entire acquittal of every imputation cast upon him or attempted to be cast upon him, by getting up this investigation. But from the finding of the committee, an appeal has been taken to the country. The question is before it. The committee say that the Government has been defrauded without his knowledge. They do not question either his honor or his integrity, but by their finding have vindicated both. This finding is not the work of his political friends, but of his political adversaries, arrived at, too, in the midst of high party excitement. If it were improper to appear before the Board of Commissioners at all, that censure he must bear; but he will bear it in company with many of the purest and most distinguished men that have lived among us, in the earlier, and as some have thought, better days of the Republic, as well as with some of the most distinguished of his cotemporaries.

Mr. Speaker, I have not spoken on this subject because I thought it was necessary for me to vindicate the character of Mr. Corwin. That the committee have done in the amplest manner. I have spoken because my constituents love the man. Mr. Corwin has never sought office; office has sought him. He desired not his present position in the Cabinet. He was importuned by his friends until he accepted the place. He served in our Legislature several years, was a member of this House ten years, then Governor of our State before he took a seat in the Senate. During all that time he escaped the bitterness of partisan opposition. Until he made that celebrated, that immortal speech against the Mexican war, I never knew of any bitterness of political hostility against him. But since that time he has been the subject of constant vilification and abuse by the baser sort of his political opponents.

I care not what any man may say about that speech, or what he may think of the time and the occasion of its delivery; it is a speech that will live, not only as a production of brilliant eloquence, but for its high and noble moral sentiments. No man but one of high moral bearing could have made that speech. It required a moral hero to do it. It was not a speech made to suit the popular clamor of the day. The man who believes that the Mexican war was just and right—that the Government acted right in prosecuting it with all its energy and power, looking to the circumstances by which Mr. Corwin was surrounded at the time—must concede, if he have a proper appreciation of true merit, that it was not only an eloquent and powerful speech, but a speech which showed him to be possessed of superior moral powers.

What was that speech, viewed in its true spirit? Why, sir, it was nothing more nor less than an effort to impress upon the mind and conscience of this great people the importance of the rule, that they should do unto others as they would that others should do unto them.

The history of nations teaches us, that the stronger powers have always disregarded the rights of the weaker, when in conflict with their schemes of interest or ambition.

Mr. Corwin was among the first of the distinguished men of the country who assumed the position that the law of nations ought to be practically what it is in theory; that the United States should disregard what they might suppose to be their interest, when the eternal principles of justice were in conflict with it; that the laws of God, the laws of morality, should be the rule of our foreign policy. This is the scope and spirit of that truly eloquent speech.

Mr. Corwin had then been long in public life, and had almost entirely escaped the bitterness of partisan hostility. Since he made that speech, however, he has been the object of calumny, detraction, and unsparing and unscrupulous abuse. He cares nothing about that. He knows that political abuse will pass away with the hour, and that his character and motives will be appreciated by his countrymen. The charges that gave rise to this investigation were of a different character. They impugned his honor and his integrity as a man. For that reason he demanded inquiry into his conduct in this transaction. The committee have honorably acquitted him of the injurious imputations preferred against him. Still it is insisted that he is guilty. I therefore repeat what I said in the outset, that if guilt attaches to him at all, it is of that kind that ought to consign him to the penitentiary. And I will add, if no guilt attaches to him—if he stands vindicated from the foul aspersions attempted to be cast upon him—that they ought to be in the penitentiary who wantonly and maliciously insist upon his guilt.

COLONIZATION IN NORTH AMERICA.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

TUESDAY, January 25, 1853.

On the Resolutions of Mr. CASS, relative to colonization in North America.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution, which is as follows:

"Be it resolved, &c., That the United States do hereby declare that 'the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European Power.' And while 'existing rights should be respected,' and will be by the United States, they owe it to their own 'safety and interests' to announce, as they now do, that no future European colony or dominion shall, with their consent, be planted or established on any part of the North American continent.' And should the attempt be made, they thus deliberately declare that it will be viewed as an act originating in motives regardless of their 'interests and their safety,' and which will leave them free to adopt such measures as an independent nation may justly adopt in defense of its rights and its honor.

"And be it further resolved, That while the United States disclaim any designs upon the Island of Cuba, inconsistent with the laws of nations and with their duties to Spain, they consider it due to the vast importance of the subject, to make known, in this solemn manner, that they should view all efforts on the part of any other Power to procure possession, whether peaceably or forcibly, of that Island, which, as a naval or military position, may, under circumstances easy to be foreseen, become dangerous to their southern coast, to the Gulf of Mexico, and to the mouth of the Mississippi, as unfriendly acts, directed against them, to be resisted by all the means in their power."

The question pending was on the following amendment offered by Mr. HALE:

"And be it further resolved, That while the United States, in like manner, disclaim any designs upon Canada inconsistent with the laws of nations, and with their duties to Great Britain, they consider it due to the vast importance of the subject to make known, in this solemn manner, that they should view all efforts on the part of any other Power to procure possession, either peaceably or forcibly, of that Province, (which, as a naval or military position, must, under circumstances easy to be foreseen, become dangerous to their northern boundary, and to the lakes,) as unfriendly acts directed against them, to be resisted by all the means in their power."

Mr. SOULE. The sole object I had in view when, on a former occasion, I moved a postponement of this debate, was to protect myself against the danger of too hasty an expression of sentiment with reference to so grave and momentous a subject as that in which it had originated. I felt some unwillingness crudely to commit my judgment upon any scheme of speculative and abstract policy concerning matters which, in the significant language of the distinguished Senator on my right, [Mr. CASS,] were so liable to present themselves from hour to hour for practical consideration. And I wished for time, that I might school my mind, and prepare it to face the stern exigencies which I could not but anticipate would arise from the issues put in agitation. That time was most liberally allowed me; and I am now ready to let what opinions I have been able to mature go to the country in the unambitious form under which it will be my purpose to present them to the Senate.

Before I proceed, however, I will ask leave, Mr. President, to express my deep regret that I have to disagree, on any of the points in controversy, with the two eminent Senators who spoke first from this side of the Chamber, [Messrs. CASS and MASON.] I cannot join them in the favorable opinion which they have been pleased to express of the course pursued by this Administration, on the occasion of our late difficulties with the officials of the Spanish Government at Havana. The policy of the Administration in that, as in most other instances in which our interests have been in conflict with those of a foreign Power, has struck me as peculiarly unwise and undignified. While it bequeaths to those who will soon have the control of the Government a fearful inheritance of difficulties and dangers, it has lowered itself to a contest in which we have seen the mighty hand of the Republic ready to strike an innocent and isolated individual. The verdict of the country has decidedly gone against it, and I am indisposed to question its justice, or to weaken its significancy.

Sir, when these questions came up the first time for our consideration, I felt great anxiety lest, by being prematurely brought into debate, they might embarrass and cripple General Pierce's Administration. May I hope that the dangers I then apprehended can still be averted? I will certainly not be found recreant towards making any effort that may secure so desirable a result. Yet, I cannot forbear asking myself the question, Why was the correspondence on the tripartite treaty called for? Had not the President's message informed honorable Senators of its bearing and import? Did not the resolution originating the call, intimate a thorough knowledge of its character? Or did Senators merely wish to give themselves the enjoyment of its rhetoric? They could not have meant opening the way to a remonstrance against England and France: that would have been in opposition to their admitted principles, and hardly in keeping with the praises they had so freely bestowed upon the manner in which the intrusive step of the two great Powers concerned in the matter had been met and rebuked. The mover could not have entertained any dissatisfaction on account of the President's answer: that was all right and proper. What was it, then, that prompted the inquiry? Nothing, I am sure, but the best of motives; and yet, what could it bring forth—what has it brought forth—but a legitimate triumph to the distinguished statesman who fills, with so much credit to himself, the chair of State, and obstacles, difficulties, and dangers, in the way of the coming Administration?

Senators complain, however, that the mystery of the Cuban correspondence has been let out. Why? Is it because of the disclosure that we had made up our minds to purchase Cuba? But, in the same breath, they avow their settled purpose still to purchase it, if it should be for sale. Is it because the amount offered was divulged? But, they proclaim that they are ready to purchase it at any price. Why should the Administration be reproved for having done precisely what we hesitate not to do ourselves? Had honorable Senators denounced the Administration, in unmitigated terms of reprobation, for having transferred to the public gaze a transaction hidden in a mysterious safe, where it lay under seal, surrounded with all the paraphernalia of a secret of State, I might understand them. But this they did not attempt to do; and it will be for some one else to afford us, in the progress of this debate, an insight into what circumstances, connected with that correspondence, should have imposed upon our present rulers the obligation of keeping it out of the public view.

A band of youthful and enthusiastic adventurers congregate in a southern port, at the call, as they think, of suffering brethren, and stake what of life and of hope there is in youth upon a dread adventure. Spain takes the alarm, and, under the promptings of the President's proclamation, which brands them as outcasts, dooms them to indiscriminate slaughter. A spirit is engendered—which soon pervades the whole population inhabiting this, the most valuable, and the last of the possessions of that Power within the waters that bathe this continent—which but increases her fears, and prompts her to implore England and France to come to her rescue, and to devise a scheme through which she may be maintained in the dominion which she holds over it. Your answer, as well as that of the Government, is, that you will not comply with the presumptuous summons through which that scheme has found the means of manifesting itself. But, at the same time that you rebuke the attempt of the proud intermeddlers by a flat refusal of your solicited coöperation, you emasculate what of virtue there might be in your bold resolve by the strongest protestations that you aim not at disturbing their quietude and equanimity. And as if to give them ample assurance that you covet not the possession which they have so deeply at heart to protect against your grasp, you stigmatize all those who are in the least suspected of being directly or indirectly concerned in any undertaking that may give Spain the least displeasure concerning it. They are all "marauders"—those who engaged in the unfortunate expedition which terminated in the Atarez slaughter, as well as the stubborn contractor who, on another occasion, presumed to believe that there was something in individual and national rights worth struggling for. What strange marauders must have been those five hundred youths who betook themselves to a strange land, where they knew they would meet five hundred thousand of their equals, guarded and defended by twenty-five thousand armed soldiers watching their approach—who, upon landing, sent back the buoyant steamer that had brought them to the unwelcome shore, with a last adieu to their native land, and then engaged in that deadly struggle which was to terminate in the enfranchisement of the island, or in the consummation of their ruin—who left, wherever they went, but indelible traces of heroic devotion, and against whom even Spain has not, as yet, uttered a word of reproach that could attaint the morality of their aspirations! Were Crittenden and his gallant followers but common marauders, or vile pirates? See how they died! How proudly that boyish chief who headed the band confronts his fate, and protests against the degrading exactions through which he is required to bend his knee before his executioners! "I kneel to none but God! I defy your tortures! 'You may kill me, but you cannot kill the hopes 'that bound within me, and arraign your cruelty 'at the bar of the future!" Why talk you of marauders? Lafayette and Kosciusko were just such marauders. The one has his picture hung up in the other House of this our National Legislature, and the other his impress wherever beats an American heart!

What are the late conquests of England in Eastern India, of the French in Africa, but marauding upon a large scale? What has been the course of Britain within the last century, on the coast of Central America, but a continuous marauding? Why should Senators show themselves so supremely fastidious about marauding, when they admit themselves, while speaking of the vexed acquisition, that they but await for the ripening of the fruit? Will the plucking of it when ripe be less "marauding" than the plucking of it while still green? I had thought that honorable Senators would have recollected that at common law the taking of the fruit from the tree is but a trespass, while the taking of it after it has been separated from the parent stem is larceny. Let them beware lest the fruit rot while they await its ripening. Senators protest against stealing their neighbor's property, and yet would have those who hold it under precarious tenure to appropriate it to themselves. They would not commit theft, but might consent to receive the stolen goods!

Senators speak of national honesty. I revere it; for I know but too well that nations are very near losing their power when they begin to lose their sense of justice. But while Senators speak of their abiding respect for the rights of other nations, they hesitate not to denounce the Government of a friendly Power as the worst that ever existed, and to proclaim their willingness to extend the hand of fellowship to those who may succeed in overthrowing it.

Senators commend the President for his course with reference to our troubles with the Cuban authorities. I would wish to know what of it they mean to commend?

It pleases the editor of a New York paper to credit Purser Smith with certain memoranda, relative to affairs in Cuba, in the following words:

"The United States mail steamship Crescent City, Lieutenant D. D. Porter commanding, arrived at this port at a late hour last night, &c., from New Orleans, via Havana.

"We are indebted to the purser, Mr. Smith, for prompt delivery of memoranda."

Then follows a succinct account of the excitement created in Havana by the imprisonment of a large number of Creoles in loathsome dungeons, &c.

A letter addressed from New York to the Diario at Havana brings the matter to the attention of the Cuban authorities; and thereupon an order issues from Martin Galiano, Secretary to the Captain General, and addressed to the consignees of the steamer, where is to be found the following:

"September 4, 1852.

"If Purser WILLIAM SMITH, or any other person, shall in future venture to PUBLISH IN THE AMERICAN PAPERS ANYTHING RELATIVE TO THE AFFAIRS OF CUBA, the vessels having such offending persons on board shall be denied entry into the ports of this island: and Mr. SMITH, especially, is on no account to be permitted to return here, under penalty of the above order being carried into effect, and the steamer dismissed the port."

In vain does Smith, as early as the 21st of October, deny, under oath, his connection with the publication in the paper above alluded to, referring to the affairs of Cuba. In vain does Lieutenant Porter give every assurance that he is innocent of the act laid to his charge. The President condemns Smith, and, by an order emanating from his Postmaster General, suspends the sending of the United States mail by the Crescent City, "OR BY ANY OTHER VESSEL WITH MR. PURSER SMITH ON BOARD." Why this? "For a reason which does 'not furnish, in the opinion of the Government, 'even a good presumptive ground for such a pro-'hibition;"—so reads the President's message;—"for a punctilio in reference to the purser of a private steamship, who seems to have been entirely innocent of the matters laid to his charge;" so says Mr. Everett. But it is alleged that "the 'President has patiently submitted to these evils, 'and has continued FAITHFULLY to give to Cuba 'the advantages of those principles of the public 'law, under the shelter of which she (Cuba) has 'departed, in this case, from the comity of na-'tions." And why has the President exhibited such a forbearance? The only reason I can find for it is, that "the Captain General, notwith-'standing, is an officer apparently of an upright 'and conciliatory character." Such is the assurance given us by Mr. Everett; and that "his con-'duct (so says the President) towards the steamers 'employed to carry the mails of the United States 'to Havana has, with the exception above alluded 'to, been marked with kindness and liberality, 'and indicates no general purpose of interfering 'with the commercial correspondence and inter-'course between the Island of Cuba and this coun-'try."

Had the President—had Mr. Everett—forgotten what occurrences, previous to this last affair, had taken place, which were far from exhibiting the dispositions of the chief magistrate of Cuba in the favorable light in which they are presented in the message of the President and in Mr. Everett's letter? Had they forgotten the treatment met at the hands of that officer, by the steamship Ohio, then commanded by Lieutenant Schenck, of the United States Navy, who was refused communication with the shore, and was ordered to anchor under the guns of the Moro Castle, while engaged in peaceful and lawful commerce, and though no charge could be laid against any person on board of her? Had they forgotten that the Falcon, while on her usual passage from Chagres to Havana, had been fired into on the high seas, not far from the island, and was boarded and overhauled under the flippant pretense that the officers committing that indignity were ignorant of the character of the steamer, though she had borne the flag and mails of the United States a hundred times into the port of Havana, and was as well known to the Spanish cruisers and authorities as to American officers in the ports of New Orleans and New York? Had they forgotten the outrage perpetrated on the steamer Philadelphia, while on her route from Aspinwall to New Orleans? This steamer, with mails and two hundred and twenty-five passengers, and the cholera on board, had lost twenty-seven persons, and had many more prostrated and lying in agony. She entered the harbor of Havana in the forenoon of the 27th of June last, and anchored some distance from the coal wharf. The captain immediately reported to the health officer, and informed him of the condition of the ship, stating that it was indispensable to her safety and the lives of the passengers, and to enable him to proceed to New Orleans, to procure supplies of coal, provisions, water, and medicines. He ordered the ship to quarantine at once, whither she proceeded, but, directly after anchoring and blowing off steam, was ordered outside of the harbor by the captain of the port. The captain of the steamer assured him that the fires were out, and that it would take time to comply with the order. The officer said that if he did not go out at once, the guard-ship had her orders, which was understood to mean that she would fire on the steamer. As soon as possible, the Philadelphia proceeded to the outside buoy, perhaps two miles out to sea. The coal lighters, ordered by the company's agent, were towed out and brought alongside; a few tons were taken on board, when the captain of the port gave them forty minutes to complete their coaling and watering; at the end of which time, under the remonstrances of the officers of the steamer and the appeals of the suffering passengers, she was driven off with only a small quantity of coal, and none of the water, the lighter with the latter being within fifty yards of the ship at the time. She had no alternative but to abandon her route to New Orleans, and attempt to make Key West. Had not the captain of the steamer been exempt from the disease, and had not the weather proved favorable, the ship would have been lost, with all on board. Coal could not be procured at Key West; and after much delay, a sailing vessel was chartered to take the mails and a portion of the passengers to New Orleans; the residue were detained, under great suffering, until an extra steamer could be dispatched by the company from New York. The company's agent, through the American Consul at Havana, entered a protest against these proceedings. And how could the President and the Secretary of State have forgotten that a month after the above occurrences, the El Dorado, having left Aspinwall with two hundred and ninety passengers, the California mails for New Orleans and New York, and $1,700,000 of bullion, was also ordered not to enter the port of Havana? The health officer approached her off the Morro, and ascertained that a few deaths had occurred on the voyage, from the Isthmus fever, and that three railroad laborers were sick of that complaint, but that there had been no case of cholera or infectious disease on board. The Captain General, who is president of the board of health, convened the board, and the result was to order the ship to sea forthwith. The captain asked to go into quarantine only long enough to procure supplies; urging that the ship was perfectly healthy. This request was denied. The agent then desired that the ship might remain at her station, a mile outside, until he could dispatch the Empire City, another of the United States mail steamships, then in port, to her assistance. This was also refused, and all communication between the ship and the shore interdicted. The captain of the port then ordered the ship, in the most peremptory manner, to go to sea immediately. Captain Mitchell had no alternative but to obey, and to proceed to sea, destitute of all necessaries for his voyage. The Empire City was compelled, as soon as possible, to follow and overtake her, and to change her own route to New York instead of going direct to New Orleans, whither she was bound by the company's contract with the Government. This case was also made the subject of a protest by the company's agent at Havana.

Such were the dispositions exhibited by the Captain General—dispositions which seem to have conciliated to him the good will and approbation of the American Government. But, strange to say, while our rulers here were heaping censure and condemnation on the company's President, (Mr. Law,) and on the officers and employees on board the mail steamers, the Captain General himself, satisfied with Purser Smith's affidavit, was revoking the order excluding Purser Smith, and any vessel which might have him on board, from the shores of the island. Mr. Law's course in this whole matter, though made by some the object of severe censure, was but that of a spirited and independent American. Conscious that no fault could attach to the officers on board of his ships, and that the Cuban authorities, in the language of the President, had not even a good presumptive ground for the line of conduct which they had adopted, he hesitated not to vindicate at all risks, and to maintain unflinchingly, his rights, and the rights of those under him. And is it for this that he is unmercifully branded, in the very Hall of the Senate, as a dangerous and reckless intermeddler, and as an enemy to his country? Nor had he acted incautiously. In a letter dated October 6, 1852, he sets forth his grievances, and asks to be advised as to whether the Government of Cuba is justifiable in the course it has been pursuing. He reiterates the same request in a second letter, bearing date the 27th of the same month. What answer is given him? Why, the Government declines giving any; and Mr. Law, left to his own judgment, hears no more of the Government, except through President Fillmore's letter to Hugh Maxwell, through the orders transmitted by the Postmaster General to the postmaster in New York, to withhold the mails from his ships, and through the dismissal from their command of officers allowed him from the United States Navy.

In all this the Government is invariably on the side of Spain, and against our citizens. Such had been its attitude in the deplorable affair of the Lopez expedition. When approached by Commodore Parker, and when asked why had the Atarez victims been executed without being allowed a trial within the guarantees stipulated in our treaty with Spain, Captain General Concha answers that it is because "he considered them as pirates, they having been so denounced in the proclamation of the President of the United States." And when Consul Owen makes a solemn appeal to his clemency, the unbending proconsul rebukes him by the remark, that "he is doing what he must know to be against the wishes of his Government."

But we are told that the conduct of the Captain General, in the matter of the Crescent City, "has been made the subject of serious remonstrance at Madrid." Has it, indeed? We may easily anticipate what the answer of the Spanish Cabinet will be. Will they not say: We claim the benefit of those principles of the public law under which, according to your own admission, we stand sheltered? There can be no departure from the comity of nations imputed to us as long as we remain thus protected by your own avowals? And here, as in the case of the Lopez followers, we will be told: You have absolved us—cease to complain.

And now, recurring again to the commendations which Senators have so lavishly bestowed upon the President's course, I will ask leave to know if those commendations be meant as an endorsement of the President's proclamation—of the Havana butcheries under it—of the Government's forbearance under the insults offered to our flag—of Galiano's edict—of the Secretary of State's letter to Mr. Law—and of the President's letter to Hugh Maxwell?

But though Senators are unwilling to wrest Cuba from Spain in any manner that might be construed into a violation of the high pledges repeatedly made to the contrary, yet they will not have the President to repudiate its acquisition on account of any scruple he may entertain as to its expediency. And here Senators find themselves again at points with him. They are for purchasing at any time and for any price; the President is against purchasing at present. His unwillingness, Senators will see, is not absolute. He finds difficulties in his way:—

"Were the island comparatively destitute of inhabitants, or occupied by a kindred race, the President should regard it as a most desirable acquisition; but under existing circumstances, he should look upon its incorporation into the Union as a very hazardous measure:—"

And he is opposed to acquiring it at present, even with the free assent of Spain. His very able and shrewd Secretary of State goes somewhat further, and urges domestic reasons as militating against its acquisition at present. Is there, then, to be a time when, such reasons existing no longer, it may become desirable to acquire it? For it is admitted that its acquisition might, in certain contingencies, be almost essential to our safety. Let southern Senators, especially, ponder upon this, and ask themselves, what are those domestic reasons which exist now and may not exist hereafter? Are we to wait until Lord Palmerston's views with respect to the policy which should prevail in the Spanish councils concerning Cuba, be realized? Shall we wait "that measures be adopted for contenting the people of Cuba, with a view to secure the connection between that island and the Spanish Crown; as it must be evident that if the negro population of Cuba were rendered free, that fact would create a most powerful element of resistance to any scheme for annexing Cuba to the United States, where slavery exists?" Do southern Senators understand that even in the opinion of Mr. Fillmore, and of his Secretary of State, Cuba is bound to be eventually ours? And hear they not the portentous warning sent forth through the Heraldo of Madrid, which proclaims that "it is well for all to know, whether native or foreign, that the Island of Cuba can only be Spanish or African," adding that, "should the day come when the Spaniards should be found to abandon her, they will do so by BEQUEATHING THEIR SWAY TO THE BLACKS."

Are Senators sincere in their professions? Do they mean seriously to purchase Cuba? They give up, then, the settled policy of the past, and belie the repeated asseverations made by America's statesmen, that her only wish was that Spain should retain its possession. We play into the hands of those British writers who denounce our duplicity to the world, and maintain that while we seemed to suspect the intentions of foreign Powers against Cuba, we had all along an eye on making it ours.

It is not an uncommon occurrence that we are taunted, and unsparingly taunted, with the charge of hypocrisy, and with being addicted to uncontrollable grasping propensities. And we are called by ugly names, indeed; and one can hardly suppress a smile when meeting with the vulgar abuse with which we are so often assailed by the British press. I have already alluded to the vast system of buccaneering pursued by England in East India, and by France in Algiers. They are both welcome to find fault with us on account of the pretended filibustering tendencies exhibited by our people. If such tendencies do actually exist, we have from whom to claim the inheritance. I hold in my hands a most curious and interesting scheme of buccaneering, bearing no earlier date than May 14th, 1739, originally deposited in the Archives of England, and the original of which, under circumstances which it is unnecessary I should state, has found its way to this continent. It is worth perusing, and I hope I shall not be deemed intrusive while imparting it to the Senate. Here it is:

A Proposall to take the Island of Cuba with very little Expence to England by a Force rais'd in the American Colonys.

If the Crown of England could become posses'd of the Island of Cuba, that Key of all America, no man of knowledge can denye but that Great Britain, in that case, must become posses'd of the whole Trade of the Spanish Empire there; and if the simple Priviledge of trading with those People, upon very high Terms, is now become one of the greatest Prizes contended for by all the Powers in Europe; sure England will not neglect any oppertunity which is offer'd of acquiring such a possesion as must Infallibly Secure that whole Invaluible trade to its Subjects alone, especially since Great Britain is now in a fair way of loosing all the Trade She has hitherto had with those parts. It is propos'd, therefore, to take Cuba without puting England to any Material Expence, or trouble, in ye following manner, (viz:)

For a person of conduct and experiance to be Commission'd from hence, for the Chief Command in this Expedition, to take Cuba, &cd. That as soon as such person is so Commiss'd and properly instructed, He is to repair, with all Expedition, to America, and at the same time another proper person should be Commission'd & sent to America, with Instructions, to begin at the most Northren Colony, and proceed from one Province to another, and apply to ye several Governments for each of them, according to their Respective Capacitys, to furnish their Quota of proper Transports with 6 months provisions in each for as many men as they will severally carry; and that each Province, according to the number of Transports they severally furnish, shall raise a suffitient number of men to fill them, compleately arm'd with amunition, &cd. That the number of men thus rais'd and arm'd shall consist of 10,000; and at the same time yt such persons are commission'd and sent away it will be necessary to send Instructions, of the same Import, to the several Governers in America to Issue orders, and give their best assistence, to fitt out, with all Expedition, such Transports, &cd, and men so equip'd.

That when each Province has furnish'd their Quota of Transports and Men, according to their abilitys, these shall imediately repair to one Place appointed, which may be at South Carolina, and from thence proceed, under the command and direction of the person to be Commission'd from hence. They may (if it shall appear advisable) in their passage make a faint to take St. Augustine, and having manag'd that stratigem properly, they are to proceed to the Island of Cuba, and Land in the Bay of Matances, that being a good Harbour and not Guarded, yet lying the nearest of any other proper one to ye Havana. Here they shall land 7 or 8000 men, more or less, as necessity shall require, and with that Force to March down and pich at a proper distence to surround the Havana and cutt of all manner of provisions—going thereto by land, at the same time that some ships shall lye before the town to prevent any provisions or relief coming to it by sea; in which situation that Important Place must surrender in a very short time. In order to render this Conquest both sure and Expeditious, it will be necessary to send 6 or 8 60-guns Ships and 2 Bomb Keches, with about 2,000 Troops on Board them, which, if necessary, may be joyn'd by some of ye station ships now in America. These Ships of Warr are intended, some to lye before the Havana to play against ye town and cutt off all relief and provisions by sea, while the American Forces Besieges it by Land; and the rest of the Ships are to take care of the Gard da Coaste.

These 10,000 men being furnish'd & maintain'd by ye several Colonies in America will render ye Conqt. of this Important Place not only secretly secure, but very cheap to England; for that number of Forces being rais'd there will, with greater certainty, Conqr. that Place than 40,000 men would to be sent from Britain, because they are Inur'd to the American Climate, and will live soberer than Britains can be prevail'd to do. By these Forces, and by them only, every man of judgment, who knows ye situation of that place, and will speake with truth and candour, will lay it down as a Fact that it is to be gain'd, with great certainty, in ye way propos'd; and if it can be thus gained, upon such easy terms to England, it would be offering an affront to ye understanding of every man of sense to pretend to recount the unlimited advantages which must accrue to Great Britain from its being posses'd of the Island of Cuba alone.

If the Conquest of Cuba is effected, a small part of the Forces which does that, may, with very little trouble, take Porto Rico, & St. Augustine if it will appear advisable so to do. The British Colonys in America lying so near the object in view, before ye knowledge of ye propos'd attempt can reach to Europe ye whole designe will be executed.

It may be asked, how it is possible to go upon ye proposed Expedition without its being known by Inquisitive deligent foreign spies, since ships of Warr are to be sent from England? In answer to that, 'tis to be hop'd England can be as Politic as Her Neighbours, (viz:) look one way and steer ye contrary. It may, for this purpose, be given out by some that England is going to reinforce some of its Colonys, by others that she is going to resume the settlement of Darien, &c. In short there's no human appearence of this attempts miscarrying if the knowledge of it is confin'd to a Cabinet Council, & a fitt person appointed for ye Chief Command. The proposor is so well assur'd, of his own knowledge, that the American People can be brought, by proper managm't, to fitt out the Transports, and raise the men proposed, that he will undertake to accomplish it by his own personal application without either view or inclination of Cuting out or accepting of any Place or Command of profit in ye whole Transaction.

If there be an inclination to attempt this Greatest of Acquisitions it is presum'd no material objection can be made to the nature of the Proposall. It may be urged, indeed, yt it will be Dishonorable to make such an attempt while there's a Treaty on Foot with Spain; but such an objection must stand or fall by the Wisdom and at ye Discretion of His Majestys Ministers; tho' 'tis humbly presum'd if the word Politick be not an empty sound, that objection, nor none like it, can hold. It is to be observ'd that if ye preparation of ye Transports and men propos'd is not to be set on Foot 'till it is seen that nothing can be done with ye Court of Spain, by Treaty, for the advantage of ye British nation, it will then be too late to begin to prepair and colect them: It is presum'd they should be prepair'd as soon as possible, in order to be colected, and ready to go upon the Attack when necessity may make it proper; and if it shall appear that there will be no occasion to make such an attempt, after they are got in readiness, the design may be laid aside without inconvenaincy to England in either case.

It may be ask'd, were Cuba taken, how it would be Garrison'd without Forces from England? for 'tis to be understood that ye American People who are propos'd to be rais'd must not be compell'd to stay in ye Garrison against their own inclination. In answer to yt 'tis suffi't now to say that ye propos'r has also conceived a pretty certain method to Garrison, not only that, but all ye Places mention'd, if they are taken, without much expence to England, but wch he begs leave to reserve to himself, it being too long to incert here, 'till he sees how this proposall will be approved off. J. H.

Endorsed Proposall for taking Cuba in America. In Mr. Hamilton's of May ye 14, 1739.

Had I suppressed but the date of that document, Senators might have supposed that I was reading from some stray paper, fallen from the portfolio of General Lopez. But it is truly a British conception; and that it was entertained by the British Government, Senators will have but little doubt, when, upon perusing the correspondence sent us yesterday by the Executive, they will come to that part of it which brings to light a letter from Sir William Pultney to Admiral Vernon, bearing date August 27th, 1740, where, speaking of Cuba, "TAKE AND HOLD" is said to be the cry, and in which the bold adventurer boasts that "when we (the British) are possessed of IT, the whole world will not be able to dispossess us again."

Nor should Spain show herself over-sensitive about such undertakings. Know we not that but a few years ago a general of some repute (Flores) found the coffers of the Queen Mother open to him, that he might organize an expedition to conquer Ecquador, and establish a monarchy there, under one of Christina's sons by the Duke of Rianzares? If the papers of that day deserve any credit, Isturitz, who was then at the head of the Spanish Cabinet, so far favored the undertaking that he allowed Flores to take from the ranks of the army some of the best officers, furnishing them with passports that they might engage in the adventure without losing their rank at home. Men, under their lead, gathered from all parts of the kingdom, and assembled to the number of two thousand at Santander, where they could publicly be seen during two entire months, parading with Flores's colors. The whole scheme was afterwards defeated, through the agency of the British Government, which, dissatisfied with the state of affairs in Spain, and especially with certain transactions in which Christina was supposed to have favored the interests of France, stopped the gathering of an equal number of troops already enrolled, and about to depart on board of the two steamers then in the Thames, seized the steamers, and defeated the whole plan. Have we not seen the identical vessels, restored afterwards to Queen Christina, in part compensation for her disbursements, come and ply in the waters of the Havana, under the names of the Cetro and Tridente? Why, I am afraid there was something of the "filibuster" in the American general, who, in 1812, misreading the instructions given to him by Mr. Monroe, then Secretary of State, took forcible possession of Amelia Island and Pensacola; and even in Mr. Monroe himself, who, while disavowing the act of the unmindful general, advised the retaining of the points taken for an amicable adjustment with Spain.

In his letter of April 10th, of the same year, to Mr. Mitchell, Governor of Georgia, Mr. Monroe says:

"The policy of the law and of the President is not to wrest the province forcibly from Spain; but only to occupy it with a view to prevent its falling into the hands of any foreign Power, and to hold that pledge under the existing peculiarity of the circumstances of the Spanish monarchy, for a just result in an amicable negotiation with Spain."

He was a "filibuster" (Hamilton) who, in 1797, strove so hard to organize an invasion of the Spano-American colonies under the protection of this Government, and in concert with General Miranda, with a view to help those colonies towards their independence. There were "filibusters" among those who, in 1819, '20, and '21, rushed from our shores to the Mexican main, with arms and ammunition, and so efficiently assisted in bringing about the overthrow of the Spanish rule there, and among those who, in 1836, could be seen parading publicly in the streets and thoroughfares of New Orleans, under the inspiring eye of General Andrew Jackson, preparatory to their joining the Texans in their struggles against Mexico. Ay, sir, I have shown that there might be found some "filibustering" in the President's message. But I assure you that there is much of it in Mr. Everett's letter—a document which needs no eulogies of mine, as it goes now the rounds of the country, escorted by the well-deserved commendations of the highest intellects of this body. In it the Secretary of State disdains to confine himself to the mere contingency of a disposition on the part of Spain to alienate Cuba. He boldly approaches the very heart of the question, and claims at the outset that "THE CONDITION OF CUBA IS MAINLY AN AMERICAN QUESTION." This, I suppose, is intended to be a sufficient reply to the assertion in Mr. de Turgot's instructions to Mr. de Sartiges, "that the condition of the island is of no less importance TO THE RELATIONS EXISTING BETWEEN THE GREAT MARITIME POWERS than to the interests of Spain herself." And he proudly declines entering into obligations that would impose a permanent disability on the American Government, and prevent it, "under any future change of circumstances, from doing what has been so often done in time past;" for the possession of the island might, under certain contingencies, "BE ALMOST ESSENTIAL TO OUR SAFETY." He vindicates the law of progress, which is "as organic and vital in the youth of States as of individual men."

But mark how careful he is to remind Spain that while the President will never, by word or deed, question her title or shake her possession, he is unwilling that she should indulge deceitful dreams. Speaking of the present condition of the island, he asks the question whether "it can be expected to last very long?"—adding, with marked emphasis, "Can it resist the mighty current in the fortunes of the world?" And lastly, referring anew to the onward tendencies of our people, how contemptuously he touches upon the impotency of conventions to arrest "THE LAW OF AMERICAN GROWTH AND PROGRESS!"

But while I am most willing to join in every commendation which has been bestowed upon that most important document, I cannot overlook its remissness in not rebuking the impertinent threat implied in the very first sentences of both the communications sent to Messrs. De Sartige and Crampton by the Cabinets of Paris and St. James. With the exception of the paragraph through which Mr. de Turgot reminds the American Govment of the orders sent to the British and French naval forces in the Gulf of Mexico, with a view to protect the Island of Cuba against new attempts at invading it, and wherein he asserts that the great maritime Powers have, in the destinies of that island, an interest equal to that of Spain herself—with that exception, the two communications are identical. And the presumptuous intermeddlers hesitate not to declare that we are to be made responsible for any repetition of such "attacks as have lately been made on the Island of Cuba by lawless bands of adventurers from the United States;" for "those attacks have engaged the seri-'ous attention of their Majesties' Governments—'the more especially as they are most anxious 'that the friendly relations now existing between 'those Governments and the United States SHOULD 'NOT BE ENDANGERED, as they might be by a rep-'etition of such attacks."

Are you not struck, Mr. President,—are not Senators struck,—with the haughty tone which pervades these communications? Do we mean to bear that England and France should speak to us in so arrogant and menacing a language? Are we to bend submissively to their dictation? And must we put up with such revolting indignities? Had we met them as it behooved a mighty nation like ours, when they presumed to career their fleets over the Gulf, and to cruise with them between Cuba and our shores, with the avowed design of constituting themselves the supervisors of our movements in those waters, and of inquiring into and determining "with what intent" adventurers of ANY NATION might attempt to land on the Island of Cuba;—had we insisted upon those explanations being given which Mr. Crittenden, then Acting Secretary of State, had required at the hands of the British Minister;—it will hardly be supposed that we would at this day be approached in the supercilious style with which we are given to understand that we must henceforth hold ourselves responsible for any attempt which it may please adventurers of any nation to make on the Island of Cuba—as if America had to defend enormities which she never permitted.

But will not Senators ask themselves, What is that interest which thus prompts those haughty Powers to interfere with our concerns, and to dictate to us what policy we should pursue? What are those relations now existing between those Powers which interest them in the destinies of Cuba as deeply as Spain can be? I am afraid, Mr. President, there are storms in the answer. I can hardly account for the forbearance which we have of late been in the habit of exhibiting, whenever we have found ourselves in conflict with foreign pretensions, and especially whenever we have had to meet the exactions of England. The nations of the world know that we cannot be willing to disparage ourselves in their eyes, and to endanger the high position which we can so easily hold at their council-board. But we cannot expect to retain our character as one of the great Powers of the earth unless we jealously watch what contingencies may endanger it. And of all the duties imposed upon Government, there is none whose accomplishment is more essential to its own preservation than that of providing for the exigencies of an impending future. The right of self-preservation is paramount to all other rights, and lends sanction to whatever measures necessity may impel a nation to pursue in order to vindicate and maintain it. Under what requirements our country may be placed by the late demonstrations through which France and England have manifested their restlessness with reference to our increasing strength and power, it will be for those, and for those alone, to determine who, when a proper occasion arises, shall be at the head of the Government. In the mean time, however, I am indisposed to yield my assent to any policy that would divorce us from those great principles and doctrines laid down by those eminent men who, under the pressure of a fearful crisis, took counsel from their duty and not from their fears. Those principles and doctrines have been presented to the Senate by the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] with such lucidity of exposition and force of argument, that I had imagined it would hardly be contested that they constituted one of the main articles of our political and diplomatic creed, and extended to all contingencies which might have arisen, or may hereafter arise, out of the position which we have occupied ever since 1823, and still now occupy, with reference to the other Powers of this continent. Yet, much to my surprise, and still more to my regret, I find my friend from Virginia [Mr. Mason] arrayed in full armor against those principles and doctrines being allowed a virtue through which they might be extended beyond the narrow circle of the incidents in which, it is said, they originated. The merits of that rather new view of the question are well worth being tested. Let us have a fair understanding of its terms. In his message of December 2d, 1823, Mr. Monroe lays down the two following propositions:

First. "The American CONTINENTS, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European Power."

Second. "The United States consider any attempt on the part of European Powers to extend THEIR SYSTEM to any portion of this hemisphere as DANGEROUS TO THEIR PEACE AND SAFETY."

The negotiations brought about between this Government and that of Russia, in consequence of the ukase through which the Czar had assumed the supremacy of the Northern Pacific sea, to the exclusion of other Powers, had been deemed by Mr. Monroe a proper occasion for asserting the principle involved in the first of these propositions. But the motives of his proclaiming it to the world were foreign to those negotiations, which had been brought to a close, and had ended in its practical recognition by the Czar. Its reassertion in the message looked, therefore, to other occurrences which had then lately transpired, and to meet which the policy implied in the second proposition had been adopted.

Now, what were the circumstances that gave birth to, and furnished an occasion for, the proclamation of such a doctrine? Was it any demonstration of hostility on the part of any of the European Powers against America? Not in the least. It was the "the unsettled state of Europe;" the fact that "the allied Powers had thought it proper, on a principle satisfactory to themselves, to interpose by force in the internal concerns"—of whom? Of America? By no means; but "of Spain." And why this sensibility about an interposition, on the part of European Powers, with the concerns of Spain? We have it in the words of Mr. Monroe himself. He says:

"The question of the extent to which such interposition might be carried on the same principle, was one in which all independent Powers whose governments differed from theirs were interested, even the most remote; and surely NONE MORE SO THAN THE UNITED STATES."

For the statesmen of that day, if I may be permitted to use the language of a most accomplished and able writer on American diplomacy, (Mr. Henry Winter Davis,) the question was not "whether the threatening cloud arose in Europe or America, but whether it was likely to burst upon us." But we have Mr. John Quincy Adams's assurance that both the principles I have just quoted from Mr. Monroe's message were meant to be enforced as a permanent rule of American policy. In his message of March 15, 1826, he tells us that the principle (referring to the non-colonization by European Powers of any part of this hemisphere) had first been assumed in the negotiation with Russia; that it rested upon a course of reasoning equally simple and conclusive, because, "with the exception of the existing European colonies, which it was in no wise intended to disturb, the two continents consisted of several sovereign and independent nations, whose territories covered their whole surface;" and because "by this, their independent condition, the United States enjoyed the right of commercial intercourse with every part of their possessions." And he goes on asserting that "to attempt the establishment of a colony in such possessions would be to usurp, to the exclusion of others, a commercial intercourse which was the common possession of all." We see it stated, also, in the same message, that one of the main objects of the Panama Congress was "to take into consideration the means of making effectual the assertion of THAT principle, as well as the means of resisting interference from abroad with the domestic concerns of the American Governments." And should not this satisfy my friend from Virginia [Mr. Mason] that the import of those two principles extended further than the circumstances that gave them birth? I have still some additional evidence to show how strangely mistaken he was when he thought he discovered in Mr. Rush's Notes on his mission to England convincing intimations of his having entertained, in reference to the same question, the restricted views which the honorable Senator has expressed. In his communication to the American Secretary of State, dated April 30, 1823, I find the impressive remark, that he is "fully sensible of the magnitude of the subjects to be treated of, and of their momentous bearings, in present and future ages, upon the interests, the welfare, and the honor of the United States."

These doctrines had originated in the principle of proximity, which all writers on public law admit to be the paramount rule of a nation's policy with reference to all matters that may endanger its safety. Rufus King, while our Minister to England, in 1801, had an eye to that principle, when, taking the alarm at the rumored cession of Louisiana by Spain to France, he presumes to interpose his objections to let any European Power make new acquisitions on this continent, and to insist that Louisiana should remain in the possession of Spain, if it had not to fall into that of the United States. How wittingly he quotes the unsparing sarcasm of Montesquieu, who remarks that "it is happy for trading Powers that God has permitted Turks and Spaniards to be in the world, since, of all nations, they are the most proper to possess a great empire with insignificance." Mr. Livingston, then our Minister to France, is still more restless than Mr. King himself. While industriously engaged in seeking information with reference to the true state of things, he takes occasion to allude to certain mischievous proceedings had, on the part of Spanish officials at New Orleans, towards citizens of the United States, and unceremoniously expresses the wish that our Government may avail itself of the pretense Spain has given us, at once to take possession of Louisiana. "It will be best," says he, "to treat with the subject in our hands."

Thus early sprung up in the minds of our statesmen the consciousness of the impending danger attaching to any enterprise through which foreign Powers might seek to resume or extend their dominion over this continent. And when the days of Mr. Monroe came, what had assumed but the form of a suggestion in 1801, grew up to the dignity of an axiom. And, indeed, sir, it matters little whether or not Mr. Monroe's sentiments on this all-important subject were intended to reach other cases than that on the occasion of which he thought proper to proclaim them to the world. They have so far infused themselves into the public mind that the power exists not that can divest them of their ominous significancy. They are deeply seated in every American heart, and dislodge them thence who can. Besides, sir, what is the use of debating whether they were intended for future ages? Are they not adapted to our present condition? And shall we repudiate them when we are taunted with the threats of Powers smarting under what they consider to be the inflictions of our growing greatness?

Sir, I am against this Government favoring any scheme through which an attempt might be made to wrest Cuba from Spain, in violation of the strictest precepts of the law of nations. But it were idle for us to disguise that there are contingencies under which it might not be possible for us to avert the necessity of laying hands over it. Why, Mr. Everett himself cannot forbear setting forth those circumstances which might, in the future, bring the great crisis within the pale of immediate action. How candidly does he avow that no administration of this Government, however strong in the public confidence in other respects, could stand a day under the odium of having entered with the great Powers of Europe into stipulations through which the exigencies arising out of those circumstances might be repudiated! Most skillfully does his letter present to the consideration of the British and French Ministers the various contingencies that might press upon us the necessity of its acquisition. See how guardedly, and yet how pointedly, they are enumerated in the closing page of that most curious and interesting document. First, "A change of circumstances." What those circumstances may be, it is not for me to say; I will, however, take it for granted that they have some reference to those domestic reasons which disincline the President, at present, to effect its acquisition on any terms. The second is the prospect of an "amicable arrangement with Spain;" and this I suppose, means a purchase, should ever Spain make up her mind to sell. The third is "an act in a lawful war;" and that might suggest an idea of conquest. The fourth is "the consent of the inhabitants;" and this looks to their independence. The fifth is "the overruling necessity of self-preservation;" and this lays open before us the full scope of all those complications I had occasion to allude to, which may, from hour to hour, ask at our hands prompt and energetic action.

Yet, sir, how far is all this from the true state of the national sentiment on the same subject! I am for disguising nothing. Truth is not only a virtue; it is wisdom. Perhaps the time is not far distant when the question of the possession of Cuba may have to be weighed as a contest of power in the scale of war. And while it is for us openly to avow what unbending exigencies a stern and proximate future may have in store for our coming rulers, let Spain herself ponder on what her perils may be, under the pressure of such exigencies.

Sir, I am against purchasing Cuba. The idea must be abandoned. It is obsolete. Whoever knows anything of the high-toned susceptibilities of Castilian pride, could hardly presume to counsel the approach of so delicate a question as of one that could be dealt with through mere dollars and cents. I am unwilling to wound those susceptibilities. And they are not the only obstacles in the way of a purchase. There are still other susceptibilities which ought to be spared. One could hardly conceive of any inducement which could prompt the inhabitants of Cuba to join us in the attitude in which they would be placed by a purchase. They are also proud and haughty, and might be unwilling to accept even their liberation, if purchased at such a sacrifice of what they deemed to be their dignity and honor. Were it not better for Spain to take counsel from the past, and turn to profit the lessons of the history of her own relations, as well as that of the relations of England, with the colonies of this continent? What has it availed them to resist the wisdom of those statesmen who advised a reconciliation of their mutual interest and wishes upon the basis of the independence of the colonies? Had she not better bravely face the future, and ask herself if it be not time for her to realize that mighty boast of Canning with respect to what remains of her colonies within the waters of this continent, and to call a new nation into existence? Might she not, by treaty, secure what there is valuable in the commerce of that island with the mother country? And would not this political child of her old age willingly come forth, and, assuming its share of the burdens which so heavily load her, aid towards the restoration of her finances, and thereby facilitate those improvements which of late have marked a new era in the tendencies of Spain, and may prepare for her destinies worthy of her past?

To us, Mr. President, the independence of Cuba is just as desirable as her annexation to this Confederacy. That there is a spirit amongst its inhabitants which must, sooner or later, rouse them to a decisive stand against their present rulers, cannot be the subject of a doubt with any thinking man. The very disasters which have befallen those who, in times past, hoisted the banner of rebellion, will be but new inducements for renewing the attempt. Misfortune but nerves those whose breasts shelter noble aspirations; and while great and powerful emotions spring from impending dangers, a host of virtues rise in arms to brave them.

Let not Spain be deceived. Let her not slumber, wrapt in deceitful security. It would not do for her to indulge in enervating dreams. One cannot repel the invasion of advancing years by the remembrances of youth. Cuba cannot long be hers; and its becoming African, would not redeem its loss. We can have no wish that it become a bone of contention between her and us. As long as the Powers of Europe shall not presume to interfere with the relations which its proximity to our shore, and the possibility of its being made an obstruction to one of our great commercial outlets, create between her and us, she need apprehend no tampering on our part with any scheme that may be devised against its remaining longer under her dominion. Should, however, her sons assert and vindicate the eternal rights of freemen, and, being grown to manhood, claim to be their own rulers, let her not take offense at our pursuing towards them the course which we pursued towards her other colonies when they were preparing for their independence. When a country reaches that amplitude of consequence and power which reveals its ability to suffice to its own government, we deem that it becomes of right entitled to independence of State.

I am also unwilling to disguise that by suffering England and France to assume over her a kind of tutorship, and to become the guardians and sponsors of her sovereignty, Spain has surrendered her main title to the dominion of such possessions as she thus places under the strong arm of those Powers. The complications arising from that very state of things are but too well calculated to produce the very necessity which, under peculiar circumstances, and with the law of nations pleading for us, might justify on our part one of those decided measures which are not uncommon in the history of nations, and might entirely invert the relations in which we stand to her. This I most earnestly wish to avoid. And whatever there is in reserve for us, in a more or less distant future, I am willing to leave for the untrammeled wisdom of those in whose keeping our destinies will soon be.

But let not Spain be unmindful of her true position, and think that she can, by unworthy devices, protect her possessions against their impending doom. In vain would she direct her Ministers to let the island sink into the ocean rather than see it transferred to any other Power. Should the hurricane rage, the island would still be found looming above the waters, and smiling upon the angry wave, while her sovereignty might disappear in the storm. When the time comes, neither the surges of the sea, nor her forts, nor her cannon, nor her garotes, nor the edicts of her Galianos, will save her from our mighty grasp. Hear the historian: "In vain did Sabinus place ancestral statues 'upon the threshold of the gates of the Capitol, 'that they might prevent the enemy from penetra-'ting, torch in hand. The very eagles supporting 'the arches took fire, and communicated it to the 'edifice."

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, I should be unwilling to address the Senate upon the general subject at this time, when we have just listened to the eloquent remarks of the honorable Senator [Mr. SOULE] who has but now resumed his seat—remarks which I have not heard surpassed in this body, either in power or beauty. I do not intend to commit the folly of provoking a contrast, under such circumstances; but I have prepared extracts from several documents, touching the question, which has been raised of the extent and duration of the Monroe doctrine, and I desire to accompany them with some brief observations, which I will now submit to the Senate, if I can be favored with its attention for a few minutes.

For thirty years the world, at any rate the American portion of it, and a good deal of the European, has talked of the MONROE DOCTRINE, and every school-boy thought he understood it, and that it was founded upon a great principle, that the destiny of this hemisphere should be controlled by the people inhabiting it, and that European influence should be excluded from it, as far and as fast as existing rights would permit. Mr. Monroe, in 1823, presented, in a message to Congress, his general views of the relations of the Powers of Europe to this continent, as well with respect to their interference with its independent States, as to projects of new colonization. To be sure, as has been remarked, these two topics are to be found in different parts of the same message, but merely because each connected itself more directly with different practical measures; but both together formed his DOCTRINE, which was founded on the great principle advanced by Mr. Jefferson, that "America, North and South, has a set of interests 'distinct from those of Europe, and peculiarly her 'own. She should therefore have a system of her 'own, separate and apart from that of Europe." And by Mr. Polk, "that the people of this continent have a right to decide their own destiny."

Mr. Polk, in 1848, when the "Holy Alliance" was a matter of almost remote history, in a message to Congress on the subject of the application of the Government of Yucatan for aid against the Indians, reaffirmed the Monroe doctrine, and observed:

"According to our established policy, we could not consent to a transfer of this dominion and sovereignty either to Spain, Great Britain, or any other European Power. In the language of President Monroe, in his message of December, 1823, 'We should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety.' Our own security requires, that the established policy thus announced should guide our conduct, and this applies with great force to the peninsula of Yucatan."

It would be a mere waste of time to comment upon these views of Mr. Polk. They speak for themselves with equal force and clearness, and they were avowed more than a quarter of a century after Mr. Monroe had promulgated his doctrine, thus considered by Mr. Polk as the permanent American policy. The principles it asserts are perpetual in their obligation, and the policy itself challenges our attention and enforcement, in all time, present and to come.

It is now said that this Monroe doctrine, so far as respects the independent States of the continent, embalmed, as it was and is, in the hearts of the American people, instead of being a great system of policy, as enduring as our political condition, was but a temporary measure, applicable only to the anticipated design of the "Holy Alliance," as it was unholily called, to restore the recently-emancipated American States to the dominion of Spain. Instead of being a great principle of action, worthy of this Republic, it would thus become a mere expedient, passing away with the occasion, that called it into being. Whether this be so or not is a question which does not touch the subject before the Senate, for that must be determined upon its own merits, and not upon the authority of names, never, however, to be slightly regarded; but it touches the fame of Mr. Monroe as a practical and enlightened statesman, for such he truly was; but upon this construction of his views he did not comprehend the consequence of his own positions, and could not see that the grounds of his policy extended beyond the single case then more immediately before him. His principles were unquestionably called out by the peculiar danger of the South American States, and by the claims of Russia on our north-western coast. These circumstances led him to this investigation into the principles of our position with respect to this continent, and the result we have in this farfamed message.

And generally, it happens in the policy of nations, that particular exigencies call forth the discussion and assertion of great principles; but while the former disappear in the march of events, the latter remain to be reasserted and maintained, under all circumstances to which they are applicable. As the foundation of his doctrine, he assumed the then existing status or condition of the continent, disclaiming all intention of interfering with existing rights, but maintaining principles which denied to the Powers of Europe the assumption to interfere with any independent State at any time thereafter, or ever plant or establish new colonies. Upon these general principles, European influence might decrease in this hemisphere, but could not increase; for independence, once obtained, then and thereafter, the States so obtaining it passed from the danger of European subjugation, and would be beyond the reach, not of Spain merely, but of France, or England, or any other transatlantic Power. And I may remark here, as a proof that Mr. Monroe considered both of the topics in his message but parts of one plan of policy, that in the anti-colonization passage he makes no reservation of existing colonial rights, but declares, that these would be respected, in that part of the message where he protests against the subjugation of the Spanish States, thus showing the intimate relation of the whole subject in his mind. This inquiry into the origin of this doctrine belongs, in truth, to the domain of history, and not to that of our permanent policy; for the name of the doctrine, whether Monroe, or Polk, or Jefferson, or yet better, American, matters little; the true question being whether it shall be enforced, now and hereafter.

But Mr. Monroe, in his message of December, 1824, a year after the one containing the views referred to, renewed the subject, and in such language as leaves no doubt, but that this DOCTRINE, in his view of it, was perpetual, and to be made part of our national code of policy. He said:

"Separated as we are from Europe by the great Atlantic ocean, we can have no concern in the wars of the European Governments, nor in the causes which produce them. The balance of power between them, into whichever scale it may turn, in its various vibrations, cannot affect us. It is the interest of the United States to preserve the most friendly relations with every Power, and on conditions fair, equal, and applicable to all. But in regard to our neighbors our situation is different. It is impossible for the European Governments to interfere in their concerns, especially in those alluded to, which are vital, without affecting us. Indeed, the motive, which might induce such interference in the present state of the war between the parties, if a war it may be called, would appear equally applicable to us."

Now, it will be seen, that these principles had no peculiar relation to the "Holy Alliance," as it is contended those of the first message had, but they extend to all time, and to all the European Governments. Indeed, we learn from Mr. Clay, in some remarks made in the House of Representatives in June, 1824, that the fear of the action of that alliance upon these States had given way, and "that if such a purpose were ever seriously entertained, it had been relinquished." Mr. Monroe, in fact, in the passage from which the above extract is taken, considers the condition of these States much improved and strengthened, and his observations evidently bear upon future difficulties, not then foreseen, but which might happen, and would then have to be met. We may yet have to meet them.

Mr. Monroe, it is well known, was in the habit of consulting Mr. Jefferson in all grave conjunctures, and fortunately he consulted him on the subject of his doctrine, and we have the sentiments of that patriarch of the Democratic faith in relation to it. These are to be found in a letter from him to Mr. Monroe, dated October 24, 1823, a few weeks before the message appeared, written in answer to Mr. Monroe's application for his opinion.

Mr. Jefferson said:

"The question presented by the letters you have sent me, is the most momentous, which has ever been offered to my contemplation, since that of independence. That made us a nation; this sets our compass, and points the course, which we are to steer through the ocean of time. And never could we embark on it under circumstances more auspicious. Our first and fundamental maxim should be, never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe. Our second, never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with cisatlantic affairs. America, North and South, has a set of interests distinct from those of Europe, and peculiarly her own. She should, therefore, have a system of her own, separate and apart from that of Europe; the last is laboring to become the domicil of despotism—our endeavor should surely be to make our hemisphere that of freedom."

Can one man be found, who will contend, that these noble sentiments, worthy of him who uttered them, and now become a precious legacy for the American people,—can one man, I say, be found, who will venture to contend, that these words of wisdom and patriotism are temporary in their force and application, belonging only to the passing hour, and confined to the efforts of a league, which, I believe, died before the writer, short even as was his tenure of life? Thus to narrow down a great national principle, is wholly to mistake the liberality and far-reaching policy of this, the greatest of American statesmen, after the first and the dearest, Washington. "His OCEAN OF TIME OPENING UPON US" was bounded by no such contracted limits. It was a true ocean, and not a mere duck-pond.

And this same letter of Mr. Jefferson exhibits, in a still more signal manner, the vast importance he attached to this principle of never suffering "Europe to intermeddle with cisatlantic affairs." Why, sir, he was actually ready, even then, to go to war for its practical maintenance. He was far ahead of all of us, and I must confess that I have seldom been more gratified, than to find myself thus not only supported, but anticipated by a name, which will live in the hearts of the American people as long as they cherish a reverence for real patriotism, true Democracy, and the highest qualities of our nature, ennobled by a life devoted to his country. I can now stand proudly upon this position, pointing to Mr. Jefferson's declaration, that he was willing to fight even along side of England in such a cause—"not that I would purchase," he says, "her amity at the price 'of war. But the war in which the present prop-'osition might engage us, should that be its con-'sequence, is not her war, but ours. Its object is 'to introduce and establish the American system 'of keeping out of our land all foreign Powers, of 'NEVER, (not to-day,) of NEVER permitting those 'of Europe to intermeddle with the affairs of our 'nations. It is to maintain our own principle, not 'to depart from it." Any question of the justice or expediency of the first of these resolutions, I may hereafter consider a question between the objector and Mr. Jefferson, and not one between the former and myself.

The opinion of Mr. Adams, who of course could not but understand the views of Mr. Monroe, as he was then Secretary of State, and of Mr. Clay, who took a deep interest in this matter, and introduced a joint resolution into the House of Representatives on the 29th of January, 1824, affirming the non-interference doctrine of Mr. Monroe, are distinctly shown in the instruction of Mr. Clay to Mr. Poinsett, dated March 25, 1825, wherein Mr. Monroe's message and principles are referred to, and their existing force asserted and assumed. Mr. Clay, while reporting these instructions to Mr. Adams, for transmission to the House of Representatives, observes, "that 'all apprehension of the danger to which Mr. 'Monroe alludes, of an interference by the allied 'Powers, (otherwise the 'Holy Alliance,') to 'introduce their political systems into this hemi-'sphere, have ceased." But notwithstanding this, in these instructions to Mr. Poinsett, he is told that the great principle of non-interference "was declared in the face of the world" (by Mr. Monroe) "at a moment when there was reason to appre-'hend, that the allied Powers were entertaining 'designs inimical to the freedom, if not to the 'independence, of the new Governments. There 'is reason to believe, that the declaration of it had 'considerable effect in preventing the maturity, if 'not in producing the abandonment, of all such 'designs. Both principles [this and the anti-col-'onization one] were laid down after much and 'anxious deliberation on the part of the late Ad-'ministration. The President, [Mr. Adams,] 'who then formed a part of it, continues entirely 'to coincide in both, and you will urge upon the 'Government of Mexico the utility and expedi-'ency of asserting the same principles on all 'proper occasions."

What principles? Not a single one, so narrow and temporary, as to be confined to a mere passing occurrence, to a league which had as much passed away from any operation on this continent as the Grecian league for the destruction of Troy. If Mr. Adams and Mr. Clay did not wholly misunderstand Mr. Monroe's doctrine, it was precisely the doctrine enunciated in the resolution before the Senate. One fact stated by Mr. Clay upon the authority of Mr Adams, shows, that this declaration of Mr. Monroe was a Cabinet measure, fully considered, and no doubt amply discussed. Indeed, without this authority, judging from the cautious character of Mr. Monroe, it would have been safe to conclude, that so important a step would not have been taken by him without consultation with his confidential advisers. And especially, as it is known that his messages, before being sent to Congress, were always read, and, if occasion required, discussed, paragraph by paragraph, at Cabinet meetings; and such indeed was the practice of his predecessors.

Mr. Clay states that the declaration of Mr. Monroe had been useful. Still its efficiency was limited by the considerations already adverted to, that it was the act only of the Executive Department, which could not pledge the nation to any particular course of policy. Congress alone could do that; and the propriety of its action was so obvious, that both Mr. Clay and Mr. Poinsett introduced resolutions into the House of Representatives affirming the doctrine. It is probable, that the reason given by Mr. Clay for not pushing the one presented by him to a final vote, operated also on others; and that was that the apprehended danger from the "Holy Alliance" had disappeared, and I suppose, then, as now, the difficulty of carrying such a measure increased, as the cause of apprehension decreased. We stopped short in our true work, and waited for another expedient before proclaiming a principle. Mr. Jefferson also, with his sound practical wisdom, saw that Mr. Monroe's declaration, in order to attain its object, needed the support and authority of Congress; and he therefore recommended to him, in the letter already referred to, that "as it may lead to war, 'the declaration of which requires an act of Con-'gress, the case shall be laid before them for con-'sideration at their first meeting, and under the 'reasonable aspect, in which it is seen by himself," (the President.)

With respect to Cuba, I am glad to be able to fortify my position by the opinions of both Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Clay. No man will now accuse either of those distinguished statesmen with being influenced by any other motives, than a love of country, and a desire to promote her interest in a spirit of justice.

Mr. Jefferson, in the same letter, said:

"I candidly confess I have ever looked on Cuba as the most interesting addition, which could ever be made to our system of States. The control, which, with Florida Point, this island would give us over the Gulf of Mexico, and the countries and isthmus bordering on it, as well as those whose waters flow into it, would fill up the measure of our political well being. Yet, as I am sensible that this can never be obtained, even with her [Spain's] own consent but by war, [he means a war with England from her opposition to the measure,] and its independence, [that of Cuba,] which is our second interest, and especially its independence of England can be secured without it, I have no hesitation in abandoning my first wish to future chances, and accepting its independence, with peace and the friendship of England, rather than its association [query: accession?] at the expense of war and her enmity."

It is due to Mr. Jefferson to state, that at the time he wrote, free institutions through the world seemed to have much to apprehend from this Holy Alliance, and believing that England was really desirous of thwarting their views, he was therefore the more willing to act in concert with her.

Thirty years have produced a wonderful change in the world, since these remarks of Mr. Jefferson. They have produced none in our interest and our desire to procure Cuba, when we can do it justly, nor in our willingness, that it should become independent. But as to any fear that England would oppose us in taking possession of Cuba, under a voluntary arrangement with Spain, or under any other proper circumstances, it is a feeling which will never, I trust, enter into our public councils, certainly never into the hearts of the American people. Events since that period have augmented our power in a mighty ratio, and have taught us to use it when our honor and interest require the exertion. Mr. Jefferson, when he wrote this letter, undoubtedly supposed that Cuba would follow the example of the other Spanish provinces, and become independent.

Mr. Clay appreciated the importance of Cuba, as well as of Porto Rico; for we find, in a letter which he wrote to Mr. Middleton, on the 26th of December, 1825, that Minister was directed to inform the Russian Government that "we cannot 'allow the transfer of these islands to any Euro-'pean Power;" and the same determination was avowed, in still stronger terms, in a dispatch to the American Minister to Paris, to be made known to the French Government, "that we would not 'consent to the occupation of those islands by any 'other European Power than Spain, under any 'circumstances whatsoever."

Now, sir, I shall pursue this topic no further, satisfied that these resolutions are not only just in themselves, but that they assert a system of policy sanctioned by the opinions of some of the highest names in our political history. It will appear, in looking back to the extracts I have made from the letter of Mr. Jefferson, that I am supported by the weight of his opinion in the following propositions, embodied in or connected with these resolutions:

First. That European Powers should not be permitted "to intermeddle with cisatlantic affairs," meaning thereby those affairs which relate to the political condition of the people of this continent, and accepting the reservation of Mr. Monroe that existing colonial rights should not be interfered with.

Second. That this doctrine should be adhered to, even, if necessary, at the expense of war.

Third. That the United States have a deep interest in the acquisition of Cuba, and that if we cannot obtain possession of it without too great a cost of blood or treasure, it must be secured (especially from the control of England) by its independence. And we may add, now, since circumstances have much changed, and the immediate dangers, then impending over the island have passed away, that it may with safety remain in the possession of Spain, so long as she can hold it, and takes no step to convert it to our injury.

Fourth. That it is proper, that declarations upon these subjects should be submitted to Congress, in order to procure their coöperation, as, without it, such declarations might be fruitless.

Fifth. In addition to these propositions, there is another opinion advanced by Mr. Jefferson in this letter, which I confess I have read with unmixed satisfaction, for it confirms in full the propriety of the proposition, which I submitted to the Senate at our last session, to declare our protest against the atrocious violation of the rights of nations by the interference of one Power, the Emperor of Russia, in the internal affairs of another, the Hungarian kingdom. Mr. Jefferson's words deserve to be held in perpetual remembrance. Here they are:

"Nor is the occasion to be slighted, which this proposition offers, of declaring our protest against the atrocious violation of the rights of nations, by the interference of any one in the internal affairs of another, so flagitiously begun by Bonaparte, and now continued by the equally lawless alliance, calling itself holy."

Here we have the principle distinctly asserted of the propriety of a national protest upon such an occasion, and we have the authority of the very author of the expression "entangling alliances," so triumphantly appealed to last session as a reason for our inaction, for denying its applicability to the case; which, indeed, ought to have been obvious enough, without this exposition of his own doctrine, unless it could be shown, that we could form an alliance without allies, and that allies are created simply by a protest against an assumption to prostrate a great principle of public law which protected the freedom and independence of nations. But we could not keep on the line of political knowledge, and shrank from the responsibility imposed upon us by our position as the great Republic of the world. We now know, that Mr. Jefferson would have voted for the proposition had he then been a member of this body. That is honor enough for those of us, who found ourselves in the minority.

Mr. SEWARD. I have some remarks to submit upon this question; and I will, therefore, as the usual hour of adjournment has arrived, and as the Senate may not desire to sit longer, move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DIXON. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. SEWARD. The honorable Senator from Kentucky gave notice the other day, that he intended to move to refer the resolutions before us to a committee, with instructions. Those instructions I should like to see before I address the Senate. I therefore withdraw my motion and yield the floor to him for the purpose of moving that they be printed.

Mr. DIXON. When this subject was last before the Senate, I gave notice that I should, at the proper time, move to refer the resolutions offered by the Senator from Michigan, and the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with the following instructions, which I now present to the Senate.

"First. That the said committee be instructed to examine the treaty concluded at Washington, on the 4th day of July, 1850, between her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, by her Minister Plenipotentiary, Sir Henry L. Bulwer, and the Government of the United States, by John M. Clayton, Secretary of State; and ascertain whether the Government of Great Britain, since the ratification of said treaty, has violated any of the provisions thereof, by the establishment of any colonial government, the construction of fortifications in Central America, or otherwise; and that they report the facts in connection therewith; and if, in their opinion, there has been any violation of said treaty, that they may make further report, by resolution, of such measures as they may deem necessary to enforce a faithful observance of the stipulations of said treaty, and preserve the honor and interest of the country.

"Second. That said committee inquire and report whether or not the establishment in the Bay of Honduras, by the Government of Great Britain, of the colony called 'the Bay of Islands,' is or is not a violation of the provisions of the said treaty, or of the doctrines of Mr. Monroe, as proclaimed in his message of the second of December, 1823, on the establishment of colonies on this continent by European Powers: and if it shall appear that the rights of the United States have been invaded, by either a disregard of the provisions of the said treaty, or of the doctrines proclaimed by Mr. Monroe in his message aforesaid, that they report the facts to the Senate, together with such measures as, in their judgment, may be deemed necessary to vindicate the honor of the country.

"Third. That said committee inquire whether the seizure by the French Government of the peninsula of Samaná, in the Republic of Dominica, is or is not a violation of the same great principle proclaimed, as aforesaid, in the message of Mr. Monroe, and if so, what action is necessary on the part of this Government to protect itself against such encroachments on its rights."

Mr. SEWARD. I hope they will be printed.

Mr. DIXON. I move that they be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, January 26, 1853.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. DIXON to refer the resolution and the amendment of Mr. HALE to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with certain instructions.

Mr. SEWARD said: Mr. President, on the 23d day of February, 1848, John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, who had completed a circle of public service filling fifty years, beginning with an inferior diplomatic function, passing through the Chief Magistracy, and fitly closing with the trust of a Representative in Congress, departed from the earth, certainly respected by mankind, and, if all posthumous honors are not insincere and false, deplored by his countrymen.

On a fair and cloudless day in the month of June, 1850, when the loud and deep voice of wailing had just died away in the land, the Senator from Michigan, of New England born, and by New England reared, the leader of a great party, not only here, but in the whole country, rose in the Senate Chamber, and after complaining that a member of the family of that great statesman of the East, instead of going backwards with a garment to cover his infirmities, had revealed them by publishing portions of his private diary, himself proceeded to read the obnoxious extracts. They showed the author's strong opinions, that by the Federal compact the slaveholding class had obtained, and that they had exercised, a controlling influence in the government of the country.

Placing these extracts by the side of passages taken from the Farewell Address of Washington, the Senator from Michigan said:

"He is unworthy the name of an American who does not feel at his heart's core the difference between the lofty patriotism and noble sentiments of one of these documents, and——; but I will not say what the occasion would justify. I will only say, and that is enough, the other, for it is another." * * * * "It cannot, nor will it, nor should it escape the censure of an age like this." * * "Better that it had been entombed, like the ancient Egyptian records, till its language was lost, than thus to have been exposed to the light of day."

The Senator then proceeded to set forth by contrast his own greater justice and generosity to the southern States, and his own higher fidelity to the Union. This was in the Senate of the United States. And yet no one rose to vindicate the memory of John Quincy Adams, or to express an emotion even of surprise, or of regret, that it had been thought necessary thus to invade the sanctity of the honored grave where the illustrious statesman who had so recently passed the gates of death was sleeping. I was not of New England, by residence, education, or descent, and there were reasons enough, why I should then endure in silence a pain that I shared with so many of my countrymen. But I then determined, that when the tempest of popular passion that was raging in the country, should have passed by, I would claim a hearing here, not to defend or vindicate the sentiments which the Senator from Michigan had, thus severely censured—for Mr. Adams himself had referred them, together with all his actions and opinions concerning slavery, not to this tribunal, or even to the present time, but to that after age which gathers and records the impartial and ultimate judgment of mankind—but to show how just and generous he had been in his public career towards all the members of this Confederacy, and how devoted to the union of the States, and to the aggrandizement of this Republic. I am thankful that the necessity for performing that duty has passed by, and that the statesman of Quincy has, earlier than I hoped, received his vindication, and has received it, too, at the hands of him from whom it was justly due—the accuser himself. I regret only this—that the vindication was not as generously as it was effectually made.

There are two propositions arising out of our interests in and around the Gulf of Mexico, which are admitted by all our statesmen. One of them is, that the safety of the southern States requires a watchful jealousy of the presence of European Powers in the southern portions of the North American continent; and the other is, that the tendency of commercial and political events invites the United States to assume and exercise a paramount influence in the affairs of the nations situated in this hemisphere: that is, to become and remain a great western continental Power, balancing itself against the possible combinations of Europe. The advance of the country towards that position constitutes what, in the language of many, is called "progress;" and the position itself is what, by the same class, is called "manifest destiny." It is held by all who approve that progress and expect that destiny, to be necessary to prevent the recolonization of this continent by the European States, and to save the Island of Cuba from passing out of the possession of decayed Spain, into that of any one of the more vigorous maritime Powers of the Old World.

In December, 1823, James Monroe, President of the United States, in his annual message to Congress, proclaimed the first of these two policies substantially as follows:

"The American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European Power; and while existing rights should be respected, the safety and interest of the United States require them to announce that no future colony or dominion shall, with their consent, be planted or established in any part of the North American continent."

This is what is called, here and elsewhere, the Monroe doctrine, so far as it involves recolonization.

John Quincy Adams and John C. Calhoun were then members, chief members, of Monroe's administration. John Quincy Adams afterwards acknowledged that he was the author of that doctrine or policy; and John C. Calhoun, on the 15th of May, 1848, in the Senate, testified on that point fully. A Senator had related an alleged conversation, in which Mr. Adams was represented as having said that three memorable propositions contained in that message, of which what I have quoted was one, had originated with himself. Mr. Calhoun replied, that Mr. Adams, if he had so stated, must have referred to only the one proposition concerning recolonization, (the one now in question,) and then added as follows:

"As respects that, his (Mr. Adams's) memory does not differ from mine." * * * * * "It originated entirely with Mr. Adams."—App. Cong. Globe, 1847-8, p. 631.

Thus much for the origin of the Monroe doctrine on colonization. Now, let us turn to the position of John Quincy Adams, concerning national jealousy of the designs of European Powers upon the Island of Cuba. The recent revelations of our diplomacy on that subject begin with the period when that statesman presided in the Department of State. On the 17th of December, 1822, Mr. Adams informed Mr. Forsyth, then American Minister in Spain, that "the Island of Cuba had excited much attention, and had become of deep interest to the American Union;" and referring to reported rival designs of France and Great Britain upon that island, instructed him to make known to Spain "the sentiments of the United States, which were favorable to the continuance of Cuba in its connection with Spain." On the 28th of April, 1823, Mr. Adams thus instructed Mr. Nelson, the successor of Mr. Forsyth:

"The Islands of Cuba and Porto Rico still remain, nominally, and so far really dependent on Spain, that she yet possesses the power of transferring her own dominion over them to others. These islands, from their local position, are natural appendages to the North American continent; and one of them, Cuba, almost in sight of our shores, from a multitude of considerations, has become an object of transcendent importance to the commercial and political interests of our Union. Its commanding position, with reference to the Gulf of Mexico and the West India seas; the character of its population; its situation midway between our southern coast and the Island of St. Domingo; its safe and capacious harbor of the Havana, fronting a long line of our shores destitute of the same advantage; the nature of its productions and of its wants, furnishing the supplies and needing the returns of a commerce immensely profitable and mutually beneficial—give it an importance in the sum of our national interests with which that of no other foreign territory can be compared, and little inferior to that which binds the different members of this Union together. Such, indeed, are, between the interests of that island and of this country, the geographical, commercial, moral, and political relations, formed by nature, gathering in the process of time, and even now verging to maturity, that, in looking forward to the probable course of events, for the short period of half a century, it is scarcely possible to resist the conviction that the annexation of Cuba to our Federal Republic will be indispensable to the continuance and integrity of the Union itself. It is obvious, however, that for this event we are not yet prepared. Numerous and formidable objections to the extension of our territorial dominions beyond sea, present themselves to the first contemplation of the subject; obstacles to the system of policy by which alone that result can be compassed and maintained, are to be foreseen and surmounted, both from at home and abroad; but there are laws of political as well as of physical gravitation; and if an apple, severed by the tempest from its native tree, cannot choose but fall to the ground, Cuba, forcibly disjointed from its own unnatural connection with Spain, and incapable of self support, can gravitate only towards the North American Union, which, by the same law of nature, cannot cast her off from its bosom.

"It will be among the primary objects requiring your most earnest and unremitting attention, to ascertain and report to us every movement of negotiation between Spain and Great Britain upon this subject." * * * * "So long as the constitutional Government may continue to be administered in the name of the king, your official intercourse will be with his Ministers, and to them you will repeat what Mr. Forsyth has been instructed to say, that the wishes of your Government are, that Cuba and Porto Rico may continue in connection with independent and constitutional Spain."

Thirty years afterwards, viz: on the 4th day of January, 1853, the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] without one word of acknowledgment of Mr. Adams's agency in instituting those measures of "progress" towards the "manifest destiny" of the country, submitted the resolutions which are under consideration, and which are in these words:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States do hereby declare that 'the American continents, by the free and independent condition 'which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth 'not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by 'any European Power;' and while 'existing rights should be respected,' and will be by the United States, they owe it to their own 'safety and interests' to announce, as they now do, 'that no future European colony or dominion shall, with their consent, be planted or established on any part of the North American continent;' and should the attempt be made, they thus deliberately declare that it will be viewed as an act originating in motives regardless of their 'interests and their safety,' and which will leave them free to adopt such measures as an independent nation may justly adopt in defense of its rights and its honor.

"And be it further resolved, That while the United States disclaim any designs upon the Island of Cuba, inconsistent with the laws of nations and with their duties to Spain, they consider it due to the vast importance of the subject to make known, in this solemn manner, that they should view all efforts on the part of any other Power to procure possession, whether peaceably or forcibly, of that island, which, as a naval or military position, might, under circumstances easy to be foreseen, become dangerous to their southern coast, to the Gulf of Mexico, and to the mouth of the Mississippi, as unfriendly acts directed against them, to be resisted by all the means in their power."

In bringing together these actions of John Quincy Adams in 1822, and of the Senator from Michigan in 1853, and placing them in juxtaposition in the history of the Senate, I have done all that the Senator from Michigan seems to have left undone, to vindicate the departed statesman from the censures heaped upon him by the living one in 1850.

I proceed to consider the resolutions thus offered by the Senator from Michigan.

The honorable Senator from New Hampshire offers an amendment, as a condition of his vote, in these words:

"And be it further resolved, That while the United States, in like manner, disclaim any designs upon Canada inconsistent with the laws of nations, and with their duties to Great Britain, they consider it due to the vast importance of the subject to make known, in this solemn manner, that they should view all efforts on the part of any other Power to procure possession, either peaceably or forcibly, of that Province, (which, as a naval or military position, must, under circumstances easy to be foreseen, become dangerous to their northern boundary, and to the lakes,) as unfriendly acts directed against them, to be resisted by all the means in their power."

I will vote for that amendment. It is not well expressed.

Mr. HALE. Will the honorable Senator allow me a moment? I am glad that my amendment meets his concurrence and will secure his vote; but as to the question of taste, I desire to say that it is copied word for word from the second resolution of the honorable Senator from Michigan, only striking out "Cuba" where it occurs, and inserting "Canada," and striking out "Spain" and inserting "Great Britain." I am, therefore, responsible for the policy involved in my amendment; but the question of taste belongs to the honorable Senator from Michigan. [Laughter.]

Mr. SEWARD. It is quite immaterial. I shall vote for it any how. It implies the same policy in regard to Canada which the main resolutions assert concerning Cuba. The colonies, when they confederated in 1775, invited Canada to come in. Montgomery gave up his life in scaling the Heights of Abraham, in the same year, to bring her in. Scott, in 1814, poured out his blood at Chippewa to bring her in. If the proposition shall fail, I shall lament it as a repudiation by the Senate, of a greater national interest than any other distinct one involved in this debate; but I shall, nevertheless, vote for the resolutions of the Senator from Michigan. I shall do so, because—

1st. The reverence I cherish for the memory of John Quincy Adams, the illustrious author of the policy which they embody, inclines me to support them.

2d. While I do not desire the immediate or early annexation of Cuba, nor see how I could vote for it at all until slavery shall have ceased to counteract the workings of nature in that beautiful island, nor even then, unless it could come into the Union without injustice to Spain, without aggressive war, and without producing internal dissensions among ourselves, I nevertheless yield up my full assent to the convictions expressed by John Quincy Adams, that this nation can never safely allow the Island of Cuba to pass under the dominion of any Power that is already, or can become, a formidable rival or enemy; and cannot safely consent to the restoration of colonial relations between any portions of this continent and the monarchies of Europe.

The reestablishment of such relations would of course reproduce, in a greater or less degree, the commercial and political embarrassments of our relations with other American communities, and even with European nations, from which we obtained relief only through the war of 1812, and the subsequent emancipation of the Spanish colonies on this continent, and their organization as free and independent Republics. Sir, I am willing, on the demand of the Senator from Michigan, or of any other leader, and without any demand from any leader, to declare myself opposed—radically opposed—opposed at all times, now, henceforth, and forever—opposed, at the risk of all hazards and consequences, to any design of any State or States on this continent, or anywhere else, which may, by possibility, result in reproducing those evils—the greatest which could befall this country, short of that greatest of all, to which they would open the way—the subversion of our own hard-won independence, and the returning dominion of some European Power over ourselves. I shall therefore vote for these resolutions, if it shall please the Senate to come to decisive action upon them, and I shall vote for reaffirming and maintaining the principles of John Quincy Adams, as defined in the Monroe doctrine, and in his policy in regard to Cuba, at all times, and under all circumstances whatsoever.

But while thus expressing my devotion to those principles, I cannot too strongly express myself against the manner in which they have been brought in issue, here on this occasion. The issue is made at a time, and under circumstances, which render it inevitable that we must fail, signally fail, in maintaining the great principles which it involves.

The issue is raised at a wrong time. We are more than half way through a session constitutionally limited to ninety days, and engaged with vast and various subjects which cannot be disposed of without long and most discursive debate.

I think the issue is raised in a wrong way. Practically, and by custom, the President of the United States holds the initiative of measures affecting foreign relations. The President now in the Executive House will go out in thirty days, and his sanction, even if we had it, would therefore be of no value. But even that sanction, such as it would be, is withheld—and, I must confess, rightly withheld. The people have elected a new President, who is just ready to assume, and upon whom the responsibilities of the conduct of foreign relations, for four years at least, must rest. Not only do we not know what his opinions on this question are, but our action would anticipate the publication of those opinions, and embarrass—is it too strong an expression to say, factiously embarrass?—the incoming Administration.

Moreover, we are not only required to advance in this matter without the light that Executive exposition might throw upon our path, but we are required to proceed without the aid or advice of the committee to whom the care of foreign relations has been confided by the Senate, and, as there is reason to believe, in opposition to their deliberate judgment.

Again, it results from the very nature of the case that a majority for the resolutions cannot be obtained, either in the Senate, or in the Congress, or in the country.

The principles involved in the resolutions have become a tradition among the American people, and on acknowledged occasions they would act upon them as traditions vigorously and with unanimity. On the other hand, the Americans are a practical people, engrossed with actual business affairs; and they will not act upon abstract principles, however approved, unless there be a necessity, or at least an occasion. So it has happened with the Monroe doctrine on colonization, and with the national policy concerning Cuba. They are thirty years old; they are generally accepted, and yet, not only have they never been affirmed by Congress, but Congress has refused to affirm them, solely for the reason that there was no pressing necessity, no particular occasion, for such an affirmation. Whenever a necessity or an occasion arises, it produces a popular sentiment or passion. The northern States are content now; they do not fear recolonization, and do not want Cuba. The southern States are content; they do not now desire political excitement, and they are not prepared for anything that may involve the nation in war. It is not to be denied, also, that the recent unwise and unnecessary exposition of our diplomatic correspondence throughout a period of thirty years, concerning the Island of Cuba, is regarded as having created embarrassments which only the lapse of some time can remove.

The Senator from Michigan seems to be aware of these difficulties, and therefore he labors to show that there is a necessity, or at least an occasion for action. But he fails altogether in showing any new occasion—which, to the apprehension of the Senate and country, is equivalent to failing to show any necessity or occasion at all. What are his facts? 1st. In regard to Great Britain and recolonization. The grasping spirit shown by Great Britain in the Maine border question, and in the Oregon question. The Monroe doctrine, as expounded by Monroe himself, declared that existing rights were to be respected—Great Britain asserted that her claims in those cases were existing rights. Those questions have been settled, rightly or wrongly, and have passed away. What more? The British claim on the Mosquito coast. That, also, is settled by treaty. The organization of the Bay of Islands as a distinct colony. That, too, falls within the subject-matter of a treaty. In each of these cases Great Britain has violated treaty stipulations, or she has not. If she has not, then there is no cause for any action; if she has, then the remedy is not an affirmance of the Monroe doctrine, but direct protest or war.

I give Great Britain small credit for moderation. I think she has just as much as we have, and no more. We are of the same stock, and have the common passion of a common race for dominion. But the country will be unable to discover that the recent events show any aggressions on her part, which constitute an occasion for an affirmance of the Monroe doctrine by Congress.

And now, secondly, as to Cuba. What has Great Britain done? Nothing but just what we have done. She has sent armed ships to prevent invaders from revolutionizing the island, and so severing it from its ancient connection with Spain. We have done the same. She has also proposed to enter into an agreement with us, that neither will acquire Cuba, or suffer others to acquire it. We have declined. The natural conclusion would be, that she was more forbearing than we. But the Senator avoids this by charging that the proposition was insincerely and hypocritically made on her part. British writers were before him in making that charge against us, founded on our voluntary revelations of our own diplomacy in regard to Cuba. I am too American to confess their charge to be just, and not enough American to fling it back upon Great Britain for mere retaliation.

What has France done by way of recolonization? Nothing. A French adventurer, Count Boulbon, has attempted to revolutionize the Mexican State of Sonora, and failed. There is not a word of evidence to connect the French Government or people with that movement. And for all that French newspapers here or in Paris may say, we know full well, that just as fast as the Mexican States shall be severed from the Mexican stock, by whomsoever it may be effected, they will seek annexation, not to France or any other European Power, but to the United States. Nor has France interposed, in regard to Cuba, otherwise than as we have ourselves interposed, to keep it in the possession of Spain.

So much for the acts of European Powers on the subjects of colonization and Cuba.

What remains of the Senator's case seems scarcely to merit grave consideration. It consists, first, of ominous articles in newspapers. But even we, the most newspaper-loving nation in the world, make our designs and policy known, not through the newspapers, but by public acts and official agents; and France and Great Britain do the same. The press speaks on all occasions, but for itself always. No wise and calm statesman in either country feels himself compromised by what the press may assume to speak for or against him, much less does either Government acknowledge any necessity for avowing or disavowing what the press may allege. The language of the press of any country, therefore, even if it were general, would not warrant national action by any other Government—much less would that language warrant such action when it was spoken by only one out of a thousand or five thousand journals.

Secondly, the Senator from Michigan invokes our attention to what Lord George Bentinck has said in the British Parliament. Well, sir, that is important. What an English Lord has said, and said in Parliament, too—that must be looked into. Well, what did Lord George Bentinck say? Sir, he said very angry things—very furious things—indeed, very ferocious things. Prepare yourself to hear them, sir. Lord George Bentinck did say, in so many words, and in Parliament, too! what I am going to repeat. His lordship did say that—

"He quite agreed with Captain Pilkington."

Ay, sir, his lordship did say that "he quite agreed with Captain Pilkington!" Ominous words—fearful conjunction; an English Lord and an English Captain. But this was not all, not by any means all that Lord George Bentinck said. He said, also:

"They would never put down the slave trade, so long as it depended upon blockading ten thousand two hundred and sixty miles of coast, and he would do what Captain Pilkington had recommended."

And what do you think it was that Captain Pilkington had recommended? Be patient, I pray you, and hear Lord George Bentinck explain. What Captain Pilkington recommended was, "to 'strike a blow at the head, and not the hand. 'He would not send an army to destroy every in-'dividual hornet, but he would go to the hornet's 'nest at once." Yes, sir; and Lord George Bentinck not only echoed all these severe things which had been said by Captain Pilkington, as aforesaid, but he said also on his own account, "Let us take 'possession of Cuba, and settle the question alto-'gether. Let us distrain upon it for the just debt 'due, and too long asked in vain, from the Span-'ish Government." As for the rest of the alarming sayings of his lordship, I forbear from repeating them. Are they not written in the Appendix to the Congressional Globe, for the years 1847 and 1848, published by Blair & Rives, printers of the Debates of Congress, at page 607?

And now, sir, it may assuage the passion and abate the fear that these threats of Lord George Bentinck to distrain upon a hornet's nest have excited, when I state, first, that they are old, and not new. They were uttered four years ago: namely, on the 3d of March, 1848. Secondly, that George Bentinck was only a lord by courtesy, and so not a real lord at all. Thirdly, that Lord George Bentinck was in a very harmless minority in Parliament when he uttered them, it being, indeed, unknown that he had any confederate in his wicked designs but Captain Pilkington. Fourthly, that this alleged speech was brought before the Senate and the American people, in 1848, by a late member of this body, whose constitutional proclivity to wit and humor was so great as to justify the belief that the speech, like the Donaldson and Greer correspondence, was a hoax, (Mr. W.) Fifthly, that Lord George Bentinck died some years ago, and Captain Pilkington not having been heard of for a long time, there is a strong presumption that the loss of his noble friend and chivalrous ally has thrown him into a decline.

The tone of the speech of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. SOULE,] was one of complaint against the Administration of our Government, and against France and Great Britain. The Administration was censured for austerity towards the associates of Lopez. But either it could have protected or vindicated them consistently with law and treaties, or it could not. If it could, then the Senator's censures are too lenient; if it could not, then they are altogether unjust. Since the day when the gifted, ingenuous, and gentle Andrè was executed on a gallows as a spy, by order of Washington, we have known the painful delicacy of executing general laws upon persons whose motives and bearing justly excited our respect and compassion. The Senator's sympathy in this case is right. It is only the perversion of it to awaken prejudice against the Administration that I condemn. Again: France and Great Britain are said to have menaced us, by saying in their correspondence that a renewal of such an expedition as that of Lopez might endanger the peace of the nations. No such expedition can be undertaken of which it can be certainly affirmed that it will not in its consequences lead to a war. I think, therefore, that none but a jaundiced eye, such as does not belong to the President, or to the Secretary of State, could have discovered the insult thus complained of, and therefore they may be excused for having received it in silence.

The Senator shows us that six or seven years ago Spain herself meditated the establishment of a monarchy in New Granada, and only one hundred and forty years ago, a proposition was made to the British Ministry to privately seize the island of Cuba in a time of peace and friendship with Spain. These facts would have been pertinent, perhaps, if the Senator had advised us to seize the Havana. But I understood him, on the contrary, to discountenance not only conquest, but even purchase, and to agree with those of us who propose to wait for the fruit to ripen, although he has been at some pains to show us that it may rot in the ripening. Indeed, Mr. President, the Senator's argument seemed to me a meandering stream, that visited and touched all the banks of controversy, but glided swiftly away from them, and especially avoided plunging into the depths of any conclusion.

Its tendency, I think; was to exasperate the American people against the European Powers, and to irritate them. I cannot sympathize with such a spirit. I would submit to no real wrong, and justify no oppression or tyranny committed by them. But, on the other hand, I will seek no factitious cause of controversy. I want no war with them. We are sure to grow by peace. A war between the two continents would be a war involving not merely a trial which was the strongest, but the integrity of our Republic. Before such a war shall come, I want to see Canada transferred from her false position in Europe, to her true position on this continent, Texas peopled like Massachusetts, the interior of the continent cultivated like Ohio, and Oregon and California not only covered, like New York, with forts and arsenals, and docks and navy-yards, but grappled fast to New York and Washington by an iron chain that shall stretch its links through the passes of the Sierra Nevada and the Rocky Mountains.

The Senator tells us that the question of the acquisition of Cuba may be upon us to-morrow, and may not be upon us for twenty-five years. That is to say, it stands now, so far as we can see, where it has stood for twenty-five years past. But he advises us to be ready. That is just what I propose to do. And the way to keep ready is to keep cool. If we keep cool, we shall be none the less prepared, if the portentous question shall indeed come to-morrow; while, on the other hand, excessive heat prematurely generated, will be sure to pass off before the expiration of the longer period.

Mr. President, let us survey our ground carefully and completely. Political action, like all other human action, is regulated by laws higher than the caprice or policy of princes, kings, and States. There is a time for colonization, and there is a time for independence. The colonization of the American hemisphere by European Powers was the work of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; the breaking up of colonial dependence, and the rise of independent American States, is the work of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. It is a work that does not go on as broadly and as rapidly as we could wish, but it does not go backwards. It goes faster than was to have been expected, under the circumstances, for it began when the United States alone, of all the colonies, Spanish, French, and English, had attained adequate strength, and sufficient preparation for successful self-government. European States cannot establish new colonies here, for the same reason that they cannot long retain their old ones. As for France, she surrendered all her continental American empire to Great Britain in 1763, except Louisiana and Cayenne. Napoleon sold Louisiana to us in 1803, because even he could not keep it for France. She keeps Cayenne only because it is not worth the cost of conquest. What does she want of more American colonies to be severed from her as soon as matured?

Great Britain, too, lost in the American Revolution all her American possessions but a remnant. She keeps that remnant from pride, not interest, as Spain does Cuba. What does she want of more American colonies, to draw upon the home treasury for defense and support, and to become independent as soon as they shall become strong? Canada is only a nominal colony or dependency. Great Britain yet retains Canada only by yielding to her what she denied to us,—fiscal independence.

And now, what does France or Great Britain want of Cuba? It is a slave colony. They have abolished slavery in all their possessions. Should either of them obtain that island, the first act of Government there must be the abolition of slavery. The abolition of slavery, too, must be made with compensation, and the compensation must be drawn from the home treasury. Will either of them take Cuba at such a cost? And what would Cuba, without slavery, be worth to either of those Powers? Let their experience in the West Indies answer. Cuba, without slavery, can belong to no European State but Spain. Cuba, without slavery, would be worthless to any Power but the United States: and John Quincy Adams was right; Cuba, either with or without slavery, gravitates towards, and will ultimately fall into, the American Union.

What then! Has France ceased to be ambitious, and has Great Britain adopted the policy that Augustus Cæsar bequeathed to Rome, to forbear from extending the bounds of empire? Not at all. France and England are unchanged. I do not know that as yet they have learned that their power cannot be renewed or restored in America. But I do know that they will find it out when they try to renew and restore it again; and therefore all the alarms raised by the Senator from Michigan pass by me like the idle winds. The Monroe doctrine was a right one—the policy was a right one, not because it would require to be enforced by arms, but because it was well-timed. It was the result of a sagacious discovery of the tendency of the age. It will prevail if you affirm it. It will equally prevail if you neglect to affirm it hereafter as you have refused to do heretofore. As a practical question, therefore, it has ceased to be. It is obsolete. You are already the great Continental Power of America. But does that content you? I trust it does not. You want the commerce of the world, which is the empire of the world. This is to be looked for not on the American lakes, nor on the Atlantic coast, nor on the Caribbean sea, nor on the Mediterranean, nor on the Baltic, nor on the Atlantic ocean, but on the Pacific ocean, and its islands and continents. Be not over-confident. Disregard not France, and England, and Russia. Watch them with jealousy, and baffle their designs against you. But look for those great rivals where they are to be found—on those continents and seas in the East where the prize which you are contending with them for is to be found. Open up a highway through your country from New York to San Francisco. Put your domain under cultivation, and your ten thousand wheels of manufacture in motion. Multiply your ships, and send them forth to the East. The nation that draws most materials and provisions from the earth, and fabricates the most, and sells the most of productions and fabrics to foreign nations, must be, and will be, the great Power of the earth.

Mr. CASS. I have a right to say a word or two, Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from New York; and the first remark that I have to make is, that I cannot characterize his speech in the proper manner, so long as I entertain a respect for myself and for the Senate. But I will say this, that of all the speeches I have ever heard from that honorable Senator—and that is saying a good deal—this was the most disingenuous, and marked with the most self-complacency, that I have ever heard in the American Senate. Sir, I am not going to follow the honorable Senator through the whole of his remarks. I have risen simply to read the passage which he would not read—and which an honest and just man would have read in his speech—because he did not want it to go out with his own remarks.

Mr. MANGUM. I feel constrained to call the honorable Senator to order.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, I do not mean to say a word out of order, but the honorable Senator will recollect what the Senator from New York said. One expression which he used was, that he "absolutely compassionated" me for my "laboring" in my "speech;" and there is no mistake about that sentiment running through the whole of the speech of the Senator from New York. I wonder that the honorable Senator from North Carolina was not prompt enough to stop some of its expressions. As he has not, I think I have a right to say a word or two in reply. I have done nothing yet but to characterize the speech.

Allow me to say a few words about the Senator's allusion to what I said about Mr. Adams. As I said, he did not quote those remarks, and his speech going out printed to the world would lead the world to suppose that I had indulged in remarks about Mr. Adams without the least propriety. Sir, the Senator's commentary should have been accompanied by my remarks, so that they might have gone out in the same paper, and been compared together. But I will read those remarks; and I do not believe there is another man in the Senate that will say they were not justified under the circumstances. Before I do that, however, I desire to make an observation with respect to the wording of the resolutions.

Some remarks were bandied backwards and forwards between the honorable Senators from New York and New Hampshire, about the expression used in the resolutions. All I have to say now in regard to that, is what I said in the beginning—they are in the words of Mr. Polk and Mr. Monroe; so that I consider myself only an auditor, so far as respects that—not of Mr. Adams, but of Mr. Monroe and Mr. Polk. With respect to Canada, I have nothing to say, except that the honorable Senator from New Hampshire knows as well as I do that there is no kind of parity in the condition of Canada and Cuba. I am not going to argue that, because he knows it as well as I do. He knows that the reasons applicable to this resolution in regard to Cuba are not applicable to Canada. He knows that if Canada falls out of the possession of England, it could not go into the hands of a stronger Power. He knows that there is no great route of our commerce which Canada commands, as does Cuba. But I am not going to argue that with him; for he will not say that he does not know it as well as I do.

But I wish to make a remark upon one other point. The honorable Senator from New York has arraigned me for introducing this resolution—and I am amazed at the expression, but these are the very words—"without the sanction of the President of the United States." Well, sir, I have very little to say on that subject. It requires no answer. I have introduced a solemn resolution into this Senate, as a member of the body, without the sanction of the President of the United States, and I have even ventured to do it without the sanction of a committee. But the honorable Senator asserted what he had no right to assert—no gentleman has a right to assert a fact unless he knows it to be so—that I introduced it without the knowledge of any other member of the Senate. He was mistaken in that; and I repeat again, no man has a right to assert a fact as such, unless he knows it to be so. Yes, sir, I have introduced it without the sanction of the President of the United States; and if my constituents find fault with me for that, they will recall me, and I will reply to them there.

But the honorable Senator said that this is no proper time to introduce this resolution. Why, sir, as soon as I understood what was going on in Honduras and the Bay of Islands, the resolution was introduced. It was introduced to meet the case. And did I suppose—had I any right to suppose—that the Senate would procrastinate in such an emergency? Suppose it had been put off until another session? Why, then the question would have been put, as it was raised by the Senator from New Hampshire this session, Why did you not introduce it before? That would have been the result. I had no right to believe that the American Senate would procrastinate such a measure unnecessarily. There is no reason why it should not act upon it in a week as well as in a month; but whether it act upon it in a week, or in a month, or in a year, is no good reason why I should postpone it. If I deemed its introduction necessary to the welfare of the country, I was not obliged to wait any longer.

The honorable Senator from New York—and it is a specimen of what I said was the nature of his remarks—alluded to the subject of the Maine controversy, and said that I gave that as one of the reasons for introducing this resolution. There is nothing like it, sir. There is no such thing in my speech, from beginning to end—not one word. What I said about the Maine controversy was this: I was recapitulating the conditions under which we were heretofore placed. The case of Maine was one, among others, which I mentioned, where, I said, we yielded to improper pressure from a foreign Power; and I believe, as the strength of the country increases, and the sentiment of the country supports its own dignity, we will not submit to it any more. That was one of the facts which I recapitulated, and it had nothing to do with the principle before us. It was a mere reference to our history, and was not given as a reason for instigating this movement.

But the honorable Senator has talked a great deal about Lord George Bentinck, and his being only a lord by courtesy, and all that. I have nothing to say about that. I have nothing to say about his title. He has talked a great deal about Lord George Bentinck and Captain somebody. I shall not go into that. But, sir, this Lord George Bentinck was not only a lord and a member of Parliament, as the honorable Senator and myself are members of the Senate, but he was the acknowledged Tory leader in the House of Commons—a most important personage in English political history. He stood up, not as a mere member of the House of Commons, but as the head of the Tory party, and that fact gave weight to his opinions; and when such a man as that—a man who, from day to day, might have been Prime Minister of England, from his political position, makes such a statement, I think we have a right to notice it. But the honorable Senator has said that he is now dead, and that he cannot "distrain" upon Cuba. I did not allude to his remarks so much as the opinions of the individual; but I alluded to the principle avowed, as belonging to men holding the same political views. That is the reason why I alluded to it; and whether Lord George Bentinck be now living or dead, it is the same thing to me.

The sentiment to which I alluded was that of a high political Tory in England, who might, from day to day, have been at the head of the British Ministry, and his declarations are good for all time. But the time when he made that declaration has passed away! It has been four or five years since it was made! Sir, four or five years is a short time in English policy. That policy does not vary so rapidly as that. What England was then she is now. And when a man in Lord George Bentinck's position, stands up in the House of Commons, and avows that he wants to have Cuba for debts due to English subjects, I ask if it should not engage some attention? It is true, sir, the remarks were taken from a newspaper; but I do not disregard newspaper reports, as the honorable Senator affects to do. I think they are important; important indications of public opinion; important indications and precursors of the movements of a Government. I should say that the indications in The Times are very important. No man can doubt that. Therefore they are to be regarded, not as absolute facts, but as strong indications of what is the leading sentiment of the country.

Well, sir, the honorable Senator has said, that the time for colonization is passed. I will say but one word about that. We have had two colonizations this year, and how many more we are going to have I know not. That is the best commentary upon the Senator's remarks.

But I rose principally to make some remarks in reply to the allusions of the honorable Senator to my observations about Mr. Adams. It is now three years since those observations were made; and they are now resuscitated by the honorable Senator from New York—as Mr. Adams's remarks were brought, so to speak, out of the grave by a near relative. What were the facts in regard to my remarks on Mr. Adams? During the pendency of the discussions arising out of the annexation of portions of the Mexican dominions,—in fact, during the discussion on the Wilmot proviso,—an extract from the Diary of Mr. Adams, bearing upon the principle involved in that proviso, was published by his son, to show that Mr. Adams's opinion was that such a law should pass Congress. The extract was taken from his Diary, written when he was Secretary of State, and published with the purpose of influencing Congress to perform an act which I believed then, as I believe now, would have been utterly ruinous and destructive to this Confederation. Had I no right, then, to comment, in the proper spirit, upon it?

Mr. Adams, when Secretary of State, wrote the extract to which I allude. And do you, Mr. President, believe, does the honorable Senator from New York believe, is there a man in this Senate who believes, that at that time, when he was among those who looked to the Presidency, which he ultimately attained, he would have made these sentiments known to the American people? And yet he would put them in his Diary, that they should die with him; and no relative, it seems to me, looking to the real condition, should have brought them out. Under these circumstances, what did I say? I will read to the Senate what I said:

"These are the views bequeathed to us by an eminent citizen (Mr. Adams) who, after filling the office of President of the United States, was taken away in the midst of his labors, as the ancient warriors fell, with their harness upon them. It has been long known that he kept a diary of passing events, and a portion of this record of daily occurrences has been recently taken from the depository, where it had better been shielded by time and dust, and exposed to the light of day by a member of his family. How often has the memory of distinguished men been injured by the zeal of indiscreet friends, who, instead of going backward with a garment to cover them, reveal their infirmities to the curiosity of the world! This revelation will add nothing to the claims—and they are many—which the deceased statesman had to the consideration of his countrymen, founded upon his services, his talents, his acquirements, and his unimpeached probity."

I never felt disposed to do injustice to Mr. Adams.

"Strong prejudices, not to say bitter ones, and a temperament often ill-regulated and always excitable, too frequently interfered, especially when men and measures were closely connected, with that calm investigation so essential to the exercise of a correct judgment."

Mr. President, is there a man here who knew Mr. Adams, who does not know that fact?

"This cotemporaneous record of his feelings and opinions exhibits these traits of character in bold relief, and is, indeed, a melancholy proof that a vigorous intellect may be overshadowed by strange aberrations, and rendered useless and sometimes dangerous by wayward views, originating in passing impressions, and maintained with characteristic tenacity, and with little respect for the opinions of others.

"In this diary, the compromise by which the Constitution was established, and without which it could never have been established, is denounced as 'the bargain between freedom and slavery;' and it is pronounced morally and politically vicious;"——

He pronounced the Constitution of the United States "morally and politically vicious."

——"with various harsh epithets and illogical deductions, little creditable to the judgment of the writer at any time, and least of all at that time, considering the position in the Government he then occupied, and the acknowledged claims he had to still higher distinction.

"This condemnation of the Constitution as morally vicious, is left upon record by a statesman who sought and enjoyed the confidence of his country in many stations of high honor and responsibility—in more, indeed, perhaps, than any other man of the past generation; whose services commenced about the commencement of the present Government, and continued almost without intermission, until his career was terminated by death. At the very time he thus embodied this opinion of the Constitution, he was the second officer of the Executive Department of the Government, and became, ere long, the first; and in each of these capacities, as in many a preceding one, he voluntarily assumed, under the most solemn sanction, the obligation to support this Constitution, thus stamped with the charge of moral and political vice. I take no pleasure in the expression of these views. But the document has been given to the country, and, regret it as we may and must, it has already passed into history; and, like all the other materials of which history is composed, cannot escape the scrutiny, nor will it escape the censure of an age like this. Nor should it. Its tone of moral sentiment is bad. The doctrine and the example are bad. That the Constitution is a vicious instrument is an opinion, it seems to me, that no right minded American can hold. That its honors and emoluments may be sought and enjoyed, and its obligations assumed by him who considers it liable to this grave censure, is certainly not reconcilable with any elevated standard of morality; nor is the opinion or the example by which position is held under such circumstances calculated to produce a salutary impression upon the American youth."

Those were my sentiments then, and they are now.

"I am sorry to say there are other portions of this resuscitated paper equally obnoxious to the censure of patriotism and of good taste. How different are its tone and temper from that legacy of true wisdom and patriotism, the Farewell Address—a monument of high moral and political feeling, and of affectionate interest, as well as of practical wisdom, such as no other citizen ever bequeathed to his countrymen.

"The one appeals to the better feelings of our nature—to the common 'name of American'—and bids us hold on 'to the unity of Government, which constitutes us one people,' by all the motives that belong to the past and the present, to common exertions crowned with success, and to common hopes as bright as, in the providence of God, were ever offered to any people. It warns us also of the mischief of sectional prejudices, and of the danger of sectional questions which 'tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection.' And that voice, which now comes to us from the tomb, should speak in trumpet tones to every American ear, and strike a responsive chord in every American heart, when it calls upon us to 'FROWN INDIGNANTLY UPON THE FIRST DAWNING OF 'EVERY ATTEMPT TO ALIENATE ONE PORTION OF OUR 'COUNTRY FROM THE REST, OR TO WEAKEN THE SACRED 'TIES WHICH NOW BIND TOGETHER THE VARIOUS PARTS.'

"The other——but I will not speak of it as I might well do. Better that it had been entombed, like the ancient Egyptian records, till its language was lost, than have been thus exposed to the light of day. I will place in contact, and that will place in contrast, a few passages from the Farewell Address, and from the Diary of Mr. Adams, and close this ungrateful topic with a few remarks."

I did place in the same column opposite to each other, the remarks of General Washington in his Farewell Address, and those of Mr. Adams. I will not read the remarks of General Washington; there is no need of it; every American has them in his heart; he knows what they are. The remarks of Mr. Adams I will read, and I will then appeal to every man who hears me, be he Senator or be he auditor, if any language of condemnation can be pronounced too strong upon the revelation of such language, written secretly by the second officer in this Government, aiming at the first post, which he afterwards attained? What did Mr. Adams say? He said this:

"The progress of this discussion——"

The discussion upon the Missouri compromise question was what he referred to—

"The progress of this discussion has so totally merged in passion all the reasoning faculties of these slaveholders, that these gentlemen, in the simplicity of their hearts, had come to a conclusion in direct opposition to their premises, without being aware or conscious of inconsistency. They insisted upon it, that the clause in the Constitution which gives Congress the power 'to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory and other property of the United States,' had reference to it only as land, and conferred no authority to make rules binding upon its inhabitants," &c., &c.

That, you will recollect, is precisely the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Adams to the contrary notwithstanding. That court has decided that it relates to land alone.

"It is, in truth, an all-perverted sentiment, mistaking labor for slavery, and dominion for freedom. The discussion of this Missouri question has betrayed the secret of their souls. In the abstract, they admit that slavery is an evil. They disclaim all participation in the introduction of it, and cast it all upon the shoulders of our old grandam Britain. But, when probed to the quick upon it, they show at the bottom of their souls pride and vainglory in their very condition of masterdom."

"The impression produced upon my mind by the progress of this discussion is, that the bargain between freedom and slavery, contained in the Constitution of the United States, is morally and politically vicious, inconsistent with the principles upon which alone our Revolution can be justified, cruel and oppressive, by riveting the chains of slavery, by pledging the faith of freedom to maintain and to perpetuate the tyranny of the master; and grossly unequal and impolitic, by admitting that slaves are at once enemies to be kept in subjection, property to be secured or restored to their owners, and persons not to be represented themselves, but for whom their masters are privileged with nearly a double share of representation. The consequence has been, that this slave representation has governed the Union. Benjamin, portioned above his brethren, has ravened as a wolf; in the morning he has devoured the prey, and at night he has divided the spoil.

"It would be no difficult matter to prove, by reviewing the history of the Union under this Constitution, that almost everything which has contributed to the honor and welfare of the nation has been accomplished in spite of them, or forced upon them, and that everything unpropitious and dishonorable, including the blunders and follies of their adversaries, may be traced to them."

What a sentiment is that to be uttered by an American Secretary of State, and one who was ultimately a President of the United States! What a sentiment is that to be dug out of the tomb by one of his sons at this day, and now brought forward by the honorable gentleman as a reproach to me, because I commented upon it. I will read but one paragraph more from my own speech, and then I have done:

"He is unworthy the name of American who does not feel at his heart's core the difference between the lofty patriotism and noble sentiments of one of these documents ——; but I will not say what the occasion would justify. I will only say, and that is enough, the other—for it is another.

"'Benjamin, portioned above his brethren, has ravened as a wolf; in the morning he has devoured the prey, and at night he has divided the spoil.' So much for Scripture and patriotism. When translated into plain English, this means that the South has fattened upon the North, as the wolf is gorged with his prey! Lest the apologue should not be sufficiently clear, we are told that almost everything which has contributed to the honor and the welfare of the nation, has been accomplished by the North, in despite of the South; and that everything unpropitious and dishonorable, including the blunders and follies of their adversaries, may be traced to the South.

"And this judgment is pronounced upon the land of Patrick Henry, and Jefferson, and Laurens, and Rutledge, and Sumter, and Marion, and Madison, and Marshall, and Monroe, and Jackson, and—above all and beyond all—Washington; and upon the land of a host of other statesmen and warriors, as true and tried as in field or Cabinet ever maintained the honor of their country in times as perilous as any country ever encountered and survived.

"And yet almost all of good that has been gained by our country, has been gained by the North, in despite of the South; while the South has brought upon us all our misfortunes, and upon their adversaries all their blunders and follies!!! I suppose this word 'adversaries,' in the vocabulary of Mr. Adams, means the other portion of the Union.

"Now, sir, I am not going to mete out to the various regions of this broad land the share of each in the wonderful career in all the elements of power and prosperity into which we have entered, and have, indeed, far advanced. The glory belongs equally to all, and all have equally contributed to obtain it. And still less will I undertake seriously to refute a proposition which, if the refutation is not in the heart of an American, he is faithless to the common deeds of the past, and to the common hopes of the future.

"I am no panegyrist of the South. It needs none. I am a northern man by birth, a western man by the habits and associations of half a century; but I am an American, above all. I love the land of my forefathers; I revere the memory of the Pilgrims for all they did and suffered in the great cause of human rights, political and religious; and I am proud of that monument which time and labor have built up to their memory—the institutions of New England—a memorial of departed worth as noble and enduring as the world has ever witnessed—glorious and indestructible. But while I feel thus, I should despise myself if any narrow prejudices or intemperate passions should blind my eyes to the intelligence and patriotism of other sections of our united country: to their glorious deeds, to their lofty sentiments, to their high names, and to those sacred aspirations, common to them and to us, for the perpetuity and prosperity of this great confederation, which belong to the past, to the present, and to the future; and whose feelings and opinions are brought here and reflected here by a representation in this Hall and in the other, which now occupies, and has always occupied, as high a position as that held by any other portion of the Union—a representation which does honor to our country in all that gives worth to man, and dignity to human nature."

Mr. President, I have nothing more to say. All I desire is, that the substance of these remarks may go forth with the commentary which has been made upon them. What does the Senator say? After going on and saying that I had done so and so with respect to the remarks of Mr. Adams, how does he exonerate Mr. Adams from those charges, or in what manner does he accuse me of inconsistency? He says, that in 1825, Mr. Adams, in some remarks about the Panama mission, was in favor of a good deal of the doctrine that I approve. What if he was? I have not taken a word from Mr. Adams—not one syllable. I have taken from Mr. Monroe and Mr. Polk. The Panama doctrine in full I do not approve of; but I approve of the doctrine of Mr. Monroe and Mr. Polk. What, then, does the Senator's defense of Mr. Adams amount to? His sentiments remain; for the press is more imperishable than the marble of Egypt, more indestructible than brass or marble. But the gentleman has resuscitated the remarks of Mr. Adams, with a view to cast obloquy on me. Very well; if what I have read casts obloquy upon me, I am willing to bear it.

Mr. SEWARD. I shall take only three points upon which to speak in reply to the Senator from Michigan. The first is, that I may be wrong about Lord George Bentinck, but I think not. That is an important point in this case, and therefore I wish to be right in regard to it. My understanding is, that Lord George Bentinck was a son of the Duke of Portland, and I believe he was the second son and not the oldest son; but at the worst, the oldest son and heir. In that case, when the Duke of Portland should have died, he would have been a lord, and entitled to a seat in the House of Lords; but at the time he made the savage sayings to which I have referred, he was only a member of the House of Commons, and was called a lord by courtesy, as the heirs of barons are usually called.

I am glad to learn that the Senator thinks Lord George Bentinck was so distinguished a man in Parliament. It was known to me that he was distinguished upon the turf, but not that he was eminent upon the floor of Parliament. He was said by his contemporaries to be the most stable man in England, because he kept the largest stud of horses. But the honorable Senator has mooted an important point in this case. Most of the opinions which he attributed to Lord George Bentinck, were by Lord George Bentinck himself acknowledged to have been derived from Captain Pilkington, who was a man so obscure that we have no account of him whatever from the honorable Senator.

I have a word more to say upon the merits of the case. The honorable Senator says there have been two European colonizations in this year, or within the last two or three years; one of them the Bay of Islands, and the other British Honduras. Now I do not know that; and I referred, the other day, to a speech of his own, made in 1848, in which he showed that three thousand troops had been marched out of the Balize by order of the colonial authorities there. The Balize is British Honduras. It is just as much a recolonization as it was a reëstablishment of independence in the State of New York, when, about seven years ago, the people of that State exchanged their old constitution, which they did not like, for one which they liked a little better. As to the Bay of Islands, the British Government said, and say, that the Bay of Islands was a dependency of the Balize and a part of that colony, and that now they have, for the sake of convenience, made two colonies instead of one. If these make two colonizations with which Great Britain is to be charged, she must also be credited with one less colony on this continent, because within some half-dozen years she has merged Upper and Lower Canada, which were two distinct colonies, into one.

In regard to the honorable Senator's vindication of himself for his censures of Mr. Adams within some eighteen or twenty months after his death, I have only to say this: If we allow the facts stated by the honorable Senator here to be true, if the Diary is authentic, if it was published by a relative of Mr. Adams—for which we have the honorable Senators assertion, and which I am not disposed to dispute—then it appears that Mr. Adams, instead of publishing to the world any such sentiments—and whether they be right or wrong, I am not now to speak—secreted them, and they lay for thirty years in the dust. Within this short period after his death, the honorable Senator brings extracts, which he censures so severely, from oblivion, or from the newspapers, into which an indiscreet friend, according to his own account, had placed them, and spreads them upon the records, the imperishable records, of the American Senate.

Mr. CASS. No, no.

Mr. SEWARD. They were spread upon the record by the honorable Senator here in debate.

Mr. CASS. If the honorable Senator will look at the facts, he will find I took them from the publications of the day.

Mr. SEWARD. I say so, certainly. He took them from the publications of the day, and transferred them here, and placed them in John C. Rives's record of the debates of the Senate of the United States, where they are to stand imperishable forever. He vindicates himself, by bringing the same record, and giving it a new and distinct page, place, and repetition here to-day. That is his defense.

Sir, as to the sentiments of John Quincy Adams on the subject of slavery, they were controverted, and the sentiments of the honorable Senator on the subject of slavery are controverted. There is a great issue of truth between them. We who are here are temporarily umpires between them, but we render no final judgment. The day is coming when we shall all be mingled with the dust with him. Then none of us will hold as honored a place in the estimation of mankind as John Quincy Adams. And when the honorable Senator from Michigan, and all around me, shall have been gathered to the tomb, I pray, not that he may not have friends and relatives so indiscreet as those of John Quincy Adams are represented to be; but, that if he shall have such indiscreet friends, the Senate will never be found to contain a statesman so unjust as to drag sentiments he may deem unworthy from secrecy, or from ephemeral life, and give them publicity and permanency in the history of the Senate and of the country.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate upon the subject, but I presume it will interfere with other objects which the Senate may have in view; and, therefore, I move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the honorable Senator will be allowed to proceed and close the speech which he commenced on Monday.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until to-morrow at one o'clock, in order that I may have an opportunity to close the remarks which I commenced the other day, and which may as well be closed upon this resolution as upon the bill then under consideration.

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator permit me to make a proposition to postpone this subject till next week?

Mr. MALLORY. The honorable Senator will see the propriety of my motion. I commenced my remarks the day before yesterday, and I gave way then for the purpose of having an Executive session. My desire is simply to close those remarks, and I shall not occupy the attention of the Senate half an hour in doing so.

Mr. SHIELDS. Perhaps the honorable Senator does not understand me. His remarks were upon another subject. We must dispose of the one now before the Senate before we can take up another.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask that it may be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. SHIELDS. I was about to ask the honorable Senator to allow me to move to postpone this resolution until some convenient day next week.

Mr. GWIN. I feel that I shall be compelled to make a motion to lay this resolution on the table. It is utterly impossible for us to transact the ordinary business of legislation unless we get it out of the way, and therefore I hope the Senator from Florida will go on to-day. I do not want to interrupt him, but I really wish to get at some practical legislation.

Mr. MALLORY. Then, if the Senate will indulge me, I will withdraw my motion, and proceed now.

Several SENATORS. Very well.

Mr. GWIN. And let us have the vote on the resolution, as soon as you shall have got through.

Mr. HALE. Is this question disposed of?

The PRESIDENT. It is not. The Senator from Florida is entitled to the floor upon it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Is there any motion before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to move to postpone this resolutions until some day next week.

The PRESIDENT. That motion is not in order without the consent of the honorable Senator from Florida, who has the floor.

Mr. SHIELDS. That will not interfere with the honorable Senator. It is to accomplish the object he has in view. Let us postpone this subject until next week, and allow him to make his speech on his bill to-morrow. I would prefer that course, unless he intends to make a speech on this resolution.

Mr. GWIN. Let us finish the resolution to-day.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would suggest that we had better postpone it until next week.

Several SENATORS. No, no.

Mr. MALLORY: I desire to close the remarks which I commenced the day before yesterday, as I have said they may as well be made on this resolution as on the bill which was then under consideration. When I brought those remarks to a close, I had adverted to so much of the subject as related to the commercial restrictions upon our trade with Cuba, and I had arrived at that branch of it which had exclusive reference to the political consequences which must, in my judgment, inevitably flow from the removal of the restrictions on our trade. And permit me to say here, sir, that I regard this subject as claiming the consideration of every patriot heart, and as far removed from party trammels and sectional or political bias.

In my judgment, we have arrived at a period when our policy, with reference to the Island of Cuba, should be deliberately adopted and determinedly maintained; when it should no longer be committed to partisan hands, to be used as a card by every aspirant for political power; but that the Powers of Europe should be made to understand that whatever party may rule the political destinies of this country, our Cuban policy is unchangeable. A glance at the map of the Mexican Gulf will exhibit the remarkable position of this island, not only with reference to the fertile Mexican States which border it—not only with reference to the commerce of Texas, Louisiana, Alabama, and Florida—but with reference to that vast and growing empire of the West, whose wealth seeks its outlet to a market through the Mississippi and its tributaries. This Gulf, in shape a demijohn upon its side, has for all practicable purposes of its commerce, like the Mediterranean, but one outlet; for although voyages may be made through the Yucatan pass, out into the Caribbean sea, and thence through the Mona pass to the Windward Islands, such voyages are at all times tedious, and are rarely attempted; and voyages out from the Gulf on the south side of Cuba are tedious, if not impracticable, from the opposing winds and currents, from January to April; and this is the season when the cotton crop and the agricultural wealth of the great West is upon the sea, threading its devious way to a market through the narrow pass between Cuba and the Florida shores.

If our statistics are reliable, this commerce and navigation already reaches $300,000,000; and this aggregate is yet to be increased by our China trade; for we may fairly assume, that within twenty years every chest of tea and bale of silks, and every other article of our China trade, in the marketable value of which time is an important element, will come over the Isthmus of Tehuantepec and through the Florida Straits. The United States with their tobacco and cotton, and China with her silks and teas, are destined to carry on a trade far exceeding our present commerce with all the East. Tobacco is already growing into general use in China, and is destined to supplant the use of opium. Our raw cotton now goes three thousand miles across the sea, there to give employment to British industry, and thence to seek a market in Asia. Twenty years of commercial intercourse with China by ocean steamers, and a transit across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec must inevitably transfer to us this branch of trade, and it is one of great and growing value to us. The hills of Cuba overhang this vast and increasing wealth, and its people look down upon it as from sentry-boxes.

The strait is but sixty miles wide, (available navigation,) and six steamers may bridge it across, and speak each other every fifteen minutes. The mouth of the Mississippi is not at the Balize, but here; and the north shores of Cuba is its right bank, as the Florida Keys form its left.

If these statements are correct, and I challenge their refutation, with what propriety can a parallel be attempted between the relative value of Cuba and Canada to us, nationally? This view of the subject derives peculiar significance, not only from the position recently assumed by France and England towards Cuba, but from the geographical positions already occupied by the latter upon this continent. With that keen political forecast which has ever distinguished her statesmen, she occupies from the Oronoca to Yucatan, and thence to the Bahamas, almost every salient or important point where a gun can be planted or a standard reared; and at the lone and distant Bermudas she has an active naval rendezvous. From these commanding watch-towers, she looks out upon our passing wealth; and should she ever acquire a naval position on the north shore of Cuba, in the present defenceless condition of the Florida Straits, and our pitiful naval force, the outlet of the Mississippi, with all the commerce and navigation of the Gulf, would be as effectually sealed as if a convulsion of nature had reared up a mountain barrier before it.

By the resolutions now before the Senate, and by these discussions, the country has been awakened to the conviction that the public mind is dwelling upon the probability or necessity of acquiring the Island of Cuba; and this has been brought about by the private judgments of distinguished individuals, by the spirit of the public press, and by speeches on the floors of Congress. For one, coming from the State that I do, feeling a deep interest in this question, having taken a deep interest in it for years past, I do not wish to hear or see the acquisition of the Island of Cuba discussed in Congress. It is not necessary to discuss it to create public sentiment upon the subject. The mind of the country is made up upon it; and whenever that "overruling necessity" comes, which has been referred to in the letter of our Secretary of State, no Power on earth, no party in the country, can preclude us from acquiring ourselves the Island of Cuba.

That overruling necessity will certainly have come, whenever we shall be at war with any maritime nation of the earth—not particularly with Britain, Spain, or France, but with any naval Power. The reason is obvious: the channel through which the trade to which I have alluded must pass, will afford a temptation to a maritime nation beyond any other on the face of the earth; and if we were at war with any maritime Power to-day, the ports upon the north side of Cuba would be open to them, as they would be to us. Neutral Spain would have a perfect right to open her ports to both belligerents. And while the opening of those ports would furnish retreat, provisions, and water, and everything that a maritime enemy of ours might want, they would not be of the slightest use to us. We would then find Cuba occupying the position which Florida did on a former occasion, and we should find that that overruling necessity had then arrived; and no statesman in this country could sustain his reputation for an hour who would oppose the taking of the island.

Hence I do not wish to see the question discussed. Discussion is not essential to screw up the public mind upon that question. Any change in the condition of this country from peace brings with it, in my judgment, inevitably the Island of Cuba.

In connection with this subject, we frequently hear the suggestion thrown out of acquiring Cuba by purchase or otherwise, as if the acquisition of this colony were a mere question of dollars and cents. In my judgment, the sooner we can disabuse the public mind of this question of purchase the better. It is an untenable idea; a false one, that has not a position in a single fact. Cuba is not for sale. There has been no time since 1826 when it could have been purchased. It never can be purchased, so long as a stable Government is at the head of the Spanish nation, and the affairs of Europe maintain anything like their present position. In a season of anarchy, of revolution, of confusion, with some Prince of Peace, some second Godoy, at the head of the Spanish nation, a Government de facto might be induced to sell; but under the present condition of things, a proposition in the Spanish Cortes to sell "the ever-faithful Island of Cuba" would drive every man in the Province of Catalonia to revolution. It would drive any ministry from power, and might destroy the reigning dynasty itself.

But though we cannot purchase Cuba, it is evident to us, as it is to Europe, that Cuba is daily becoming Americanized; that the voices of our free millions are finding their echoes in her hills and valleys; that the principles of our free institutions, with that centrifugal force which they have always exercised, cannot be resisted or controlled by bayonets: nor can they be shut out by the narrow strait which divides us. And it is as evident to us as it is to Europe, that the independence of Cuba, whether under our own or a similar form of Government, is now merely a question of time. And hence the extraordinary position which has recently been assumed by the two controlling Powers of Europe on this subject; hence the extraordinary apprehension they have exhibited, the jealous watchfulness on their part, which, in my judgment, not only betokens a well-founded apprehension, but which will tend to precipitate the consummation of that against which they would guard. Why, sir, the proposition to us, the freest people upon earth, to join in an unholy war upon the dawning hopes of Cuba—a war at variance with our political origin, and every day of our political history—will meet the universal rejection of every patriot heart in this country; and thousands who have never evinced the slightest interest in the question, will find their hearts now swelling in sympathy with every action of a people whose political vassalage is thus sought to be perpetuated. No, sir; we can, thank Heaven, take no part in such unholy purpose; and I for one, wish to record my grateful acknowledgments to the distinguished Secretary of State for his letter on the subject. It is, in my judgment, the most "manifest-destiny" document that ever emanated from the State Department; it is the handwriting upon the wall. It plainly indicates the vigorous march of Young America upon these continents; and that in the paths of justice and right, guided by the spirit of peace, she can take no step backwards.

The acquisition of Cuba, will, ere long, become to us a political necessity; and when it does, there will be no dissension among us upon the subject. This period may yet be far distant; but, one year before California was acquired, it appeared to be a half century further removed from us than Cuba. But, sir, whether she come under the proud folds of the stars and stripes or not, her proximity to freedom is perilous to her present rulers.

When we reflect on the obstacles which we have overcome; when we consider that we have seen the genius of our country passing the Mississippi, rearing up a boundless republic in the West, crossing the Rocky Mountains, treading the pathless wastes of California and Oregon, standing upon the distant shores of the Pacific, and still looking southward; when we see all these, to doubt that the same mighty and peaceful progress which has accomplished these ends will shed over this beautiful garden at our feet the blessings of free government, would be as unjust to Heaven as it is to ourselves. But it is a maxim in which there is much political wisdom, that Heaven helps those who help themselves. I do not mean that we should literally help ourselves to the Island of Cuba, but I do mean that we should not cast aside the advantages of our geographical position, our boundless wealth, and agricultural products, and manufactures, and legislate them directly into the hands of foreign competitors.

Yet this has been the result of the act of 1834, which I seek to have repealed.

While we have been expending immense sums to open the trade of Muscat, and Siam, and China, and while we have fitted out an expensive expedition to Japan, here at our doors the richest island upon the face of the earth, with a present trade of fifty-one millions, capable of sustaining a population of ten millions, an island of boundless resources, with rich mines, with scarcely any of her resources as yet developed, with only sixty miles of available navigation between her and our shores, has been neglected. We have contrived to legislate ourselves out of her market.

Repeal the discriminating laws to which I have referred, and what will be the political consequences inevitably to follow? Let me ask those who have an eye to the acquisition of Cuba, if it is not better to begin in time, and invite her to our shores; inform her people that we do not exclude them; that we do not make a distinction between them and all other nations, Christian or Heathen. Examine your ports from Maine to the Rio Grande, and you will find but rarely the Spanish flag.

The Cubans whom you see in this country are either exiles from home, or men of wealth attached to the Home Government, and, in either case, are not the best exponents of the popular feeling. You cannot see them, because you have legislated them out of the country. Now, remove the restrictions on trade with Cuba, and you will have the legitimate population, the merchants and traders of the island, the proper exponents of the wishes of that people, here among you. You will establish with them the ties of commerce, and the ties of marriage. You will educate their children; you will send them abroad as proselytes of your institutions; you will teach them the value of the ballot-box, of trial by jury, of habeas corpus; in fact, you will hold up to them an image by which they can contrast their own political condition, and then, and when you shall have done this, the annexation of Cuba will have commenced.

The honorable Senator from New York threw out an intimation that Cuba was an expense to the Spanish Government, as the colonies of England and France had formerly been to those countries. In my judgment he his mistaken. Separate and apart from the pride of Spain in the possession of this, the brightest jewel in her crown, it is to her a source of great national advantages. Its trade is her school for seamen, and it is the only means she has of building up a merchant marine. The exchange of products between Cuba and Europe and ourselves now amounts to $51,000,000 a year, and this trade we have thrown away. Cuba gets all her flour, most of her manufactures of cotton, and her oils, and a vast amount of the products of Spain, from Spain. Spain takes hers in return. The province of Catalonia alone would raise an opposition, based upon a pecuniary interest, which would defeat any attempt to sell the Island of Cuba.

I do not wish to detain the Senate. I throw out these matters as suggestions which must arise in the mind of every reflecting Senator as to what will be the inevitable political results of repealing the restrictive laws, to which I have alluded, upon our commerce with Cuba. We have assumed a position in this question which no other nation on earth has assumed. Why, we have practically said to Spain, "Although we have this boundless wealth, you shall not share in it; you shall not become purchasers of our products, unless you will permit us to carry goods into your colonies upon our own terms." All the other manufacturing interests, all the other agricultural interests of Europe have been invited to come and purchase; and the consequence is, as I showed the other day, that while we exported the year before last but $11,000 worth of American products and manufactures in Spanish bottoms, Great Britain exported $4,500,000 worth in the same time.

It is said to be to the advantage of the shipping interest of this country to keep things precisely as they are. I say it is only the apparent interest of that class of our fellow-citizens, and if this bill is opposed in Congress, the opposition will come from that small shipping interest which engrosses the carrying-trade between the United States and Cuba: a few vessels in Massachusetts, a few in New York, and a few in Charleston. It is but as a drop in the bucket, in comparison to the vast agricultural and manufacturing interests of the country, and in comparison with the political consequences to which I have alluded. But if we examine this subject properly, we shall find that even the shipping interest will be benefited by the repeal of these restrictive laws. It is well known to me, as it is to every person who has given attention to the question, that Spain is not prepared to compete in the carrying-trade with American vessels within thirty-three and one third per cent. In the first place she has not got the vessels or the seamen, and she is behind American shipping at least one hundred years; and if these acts shall be repealed, only the small vessels of Cuba will engage in the trade; they have none which can compete with our vessels of a larger class. Then, when the question comes to be discussed, as I am told it will be, on the other side, I shall be prepared to show that it is just as much to the advantage of the shipping interest of the country to these measures as it is for the agricultural interest.

Let us, then, sir, avail ourselves of eighteen years of experience in this unprofitable labor of retaliation, to retrace our steps. Let us permit their tonnage to seek our commercial marts. Depend upon it, sir, no Cuban, having lived a week in our atmosphere of freedom, will return to her with any increased admiration of martial law.

But to this I will not advert; the train of consequences is too evident. Let us remove our commercial restrictions, and leave the rapid strides of Young America to do the rest.

Mr. GWIN. I know that there are a number of Senators who wish to address the Senate on this question before the vote is taken on the resolution. I know that a number of Senators claim the right of addressing the Senate, and therefore I move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until the 4th of March next. I will give my reasons for it. We shall then have an Executive session, and we shall then have this subject properly before us. It is intended, I believe, for senatorial action alone, and not for the legislative action of the two Houses of Congress. It is well adapted to an Executive session, and there is scarcely a member of the Senate who does not wish, before he votes, to give his views upon the question. We have only about thirty days of the session remaining in which to legislate, and yet we have passed none of the important appropriation bills. Other measures of momentous importance to the country are before the Senate for consideration, and I feel it to be my duty to move the postponement of this subject until the 4th of March next; and on that motion I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. I think it is hardly courteous in the honorable Senator from California to make such a motion.

Mr. GWIN. I have not spoken upon it.

Mr. HALE. I know the Senator has not spoken upon it, but he moves to postpone the subject until he has got rid of a considerable number of gentlemen who are interested in it. [Laughter.] I am exceedingly sorry that, after I have been so unfortunate as to introduce a practical measure, it has been taken up by those gentlemen who are so ambitious to display their oratorical powers upon it. The motion I introduced was simply an amendment looking to Canada; and I am prepared to show, notwithstanding what the honorable Senator from Florida has said, that, so far as the commerce of the country is concerned, Canada is as four to one when compared with Cuba. And when he speaks of the outlet of the valley of the Mississippi, I must say that I can show him that the produce of one half of that very valley finds its way to market over the lakes and through the New York canals. It is but a short time since I saw an account of the sale of flour in the Boston market which was raised in Virginia, and brought to market by way of the northern lakes, and down over the Vermont Central railroad to Boston. Virginia flour found its way to Boston for a market by that route; and I am told that the barrels were made of Virginia timber, and certainly the flour was manufactured there.

As this is a matter of so much importance, I hope we shall have a vote upon it. The honorable Senator from Michigan certainly did not introduce his resolution for the purpose of making a speech. I know I did not introduce my amendment for that purpose. The Senator from Michigan and myself are practical men, both of us.

Mr. CASS. Exactly.

Mr. HALE. And we want votes instead of speeches upon the propositions which we have submitted to the Senate.

Mr. CASS. We do not want any more speeches. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. No, sir; and I will agree to give way, although I have a great many things to say to the Senate. I see the Senator from California wants to get on the locomotive, and ride west, and I am willing to allow him to do so. I shall not delay him. I shall forego the satisfaction it would give, both to myself and the Senate, to make a speech upon the subject, for the purpose of having a vote. And the first vote, let it be remembered, will not be upon the resolutions of the Senator from Michigan, but upon the motion to refer, made by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DIXON.] If it shall be agreed to, it is probable the Committee on Foreign Relations will give us a luminous report; and when their report shall be under consideration, it will be the proper time to make speeches.

Mr. BUTLER. I think so; and I am reserving myself for that.

Mr. HALE. I am told by the Senator from South Carolina, that he has been keeping himself in reserve in the same way that I have been, for the report. I think that is the time when the speeches should be made, and I hope the vote will be taken upon the reference.

Mr. SEWARD. I have a note from the honorable Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLEMENS,] who is detained from his seat by sickness, asking me to obtain the consent of the Senate to postpone the consideration of this resolution until next Tuesday, at which time he hopes to be able to address the Senate upon it.

Mr. MANGUM. I am glad to hear from the gentleman from New Hampshire, and to hear the remarks assented to by the honorable Senator from Michigan, that they are both practical men. Now, I desire to cut out a little practical work for these gentlemen to perform to-day—a little real work. Let them stop talking upon the subject. I think the resolution has been debated quite enough; I think the country will derive very little service from the debate; and, therefore, as a test question, at least as far as I can make it so, I move that the resolution lie upon the table. That will cut off debate, and upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GWIN. That will do.

Mr. MASON. If the Senator will withdraw the motion, I will renew it if he desires.

Mr. MANGUM. Very well.

Mr. MASON. The object of this motion I presume is to arrest the debate. The debate has gone to some length. It is one that has become very interesting to the country. That is shown by the public press from every quarter. And although I have as little disposition as most gentlemen to enter into or protract a debate which appears to be of an abstract character, yet it is very certain that there is one subject at least of very great practical interest to the country, which if not immediately connected with the resolution, is worthy of engaging in public debate the attention of the Senate. It affects a ground, and a very material ground, which is covered by one portion of this resolution. I allude to the message of the President, which is now before the Committee on Foreign Relations, although, since it went there, it has been the subject of some debate in the Senate. It is in reply to a resolution of the Senate asking for information concerning a recent proclamation that appeared in the public journals, issued by the British authorities at Balize, declaring a colony established—not about to be established—but a British colony established in certain islands designated, which lie off the coast of Honduras. That becomes a question of great practical interest. Within the last few days we have received intelligence that a British colony is about to be established at the Balize. The President of the United States, it appears from his message, does not consider that there is any source of official communication open to him by which he could inform us whether or not the report in reference to the establishment of the colony of the Bay of Islands is true; but it comes in such a shape as to make it necessary that its existence for the present should be assumed by the Legislative branch, as the Executive branch is uninformed, and seeks no information.

Before the debate ends upon this resolution, I want to be heard practically in reference to this matter of colonization as connected with one branch of the resolution of the Senator from Michigan—that which affects future colonization upon or near either of the American continents. It is a matter of very great interest to the American people—one that was broached thirty years ago, and never practically brought home to them, as far as I am informed, until the present time. I should, therefore, regret that the honorable Senator from North Carolina should persevere in his motion, or that it should prevail. It is my purpose to ask the Senate to indulge me, for not more than an hour, on the general subject, when other gentlemen may have participated in the debate, if they think proper to do so.

Mr. MANGUM. I believe there are matters now before the Committee on Foreign Relations, upon which the honorable Senator from Virginia can be heard, when they shall be reported upon. My sole purpose is to open the way to some real business. When a report shall be made from the Committee on Foreign Relations upon any of these subjects, the honorable Senator from Virginia can accompany the report with a speech, and I shall hear him with great pleasure upon them; for I think my own opinions, taken on the whole upon this subject, do not differ very widely from those of the honorable Senator; but with the view that we may go to work on other matters, I renew the motion.

Mr. MASON. I would ask the Senator to withdraw his motion to lie on the table, and allow me to move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until Monday next. I shall then ask the Senate to hear me for an hour. I make that motion.

Mr. GWIN. I did not understand the Senator from Virginia to say that the Committee on Foreign Relations intended to propose any practical legislation by Congress on this question. I did not understand him to say that any legislative question would come before Congress, connected with this debate, or the subject brought to the attention of the Senate, by this resolution; and, therefore, I have been very anxious to progress with the business which we wish to bring to a conclusion during the present session. But if the Senator intends any legislation in which both Houses of Congress are to participate, I shall not interpose any obstacle in the way of his presenting it; but if he is going to do that, it must be upon some of the appropriation bills. If he intends to press positive legislation on this subject to the Congress of the United States, instead of an abstract debate in the Senate alone, it is his duty to ask to be heard, and it is his privilege. If he intends anything like legislation, I shall not interpose any objection; but if his motive is simply for the purpose of speaking to a question about which we are to have no legislative action, with all the respect I entertain for that gentleman—and he knows I entertain as much as any other Senator does—I must insist on my motion, that this question be postponed until the 4th of March. I think that is the first question; but if the Senator intends to propose practical legislation, I shall withdraw that motion.

Mr. MASON. I said this: The message of the President in reference to the alleged establishment of a British colony on the coast of Honduras is before the Committee on Foreign Relations; but the President in that message declared himself unable to give any certain information on the subject. It presents itself in such a form as to impress me, and doubtless others, with the belief that the proclamation alleged to have been issued by the British authorities at the Balize, and which we have seen in the public journals, declaring the colony there established, is official and is true. It is more than probable, indeed it is almost certain, in the present state of that question, that the Committee on Foreign Relations will feel themselves called upon to make a report upon it; and if a report be made, it may probably be necessary to follow it by legislation. Therefore, I am here free to declare, as one of the Senators of the United States, if it be true that the Government of Great Britain has established a colony at the place designated, whether it be or be not in contravention of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, that colony must be discontinued. I am prepared to say that at once. I do not know whether a colony has been established, but I agree that the probability is that it is so, and that before the close of the session there must be actual legislation upon the subject. All that I mean to say at present is, that I think it would be desirable for the country that this debate should not be arrested, as the Senator from California proposes. For myself, I ask only that I may be heard upon the general question involved in the resolution of the Senator from Michigan on Monday next; and if it is in order, pending the motion of the Senator from California, I ask that the question may be put on my motion to postpone the subject until that day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My colleague [Mr. DIXON] has put a practical question before the Senate upon this subject, for he has made a motion to refer the resolution and amendment to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with certain instructions. The gentleman from Michigan, who introduced the resolution, has informed us that he moved in the matter in consequence of the apprehension that Great Britain was violating the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, in reference to the establishment of colonies on the coast of Central America. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has informed us that the President does not know how the fact is. I think, with the chairman, that it will be important if we could ascertain what the fact is. I think, therefore, that the best course which we can pursue is to make the reference which has been proposed by my colleague, and let the whole subject go before the Committee on Foreign Relations. When the committee shall report, the chairman can accompany the report with any remarks he may be pleased to make, and the debate can be resumed. I hope this course will be pursued. I am like the gentleman from California; I feel very much disposed to begin to act upon other matters, and I am inclined to think it is time for us to take up the ordinary business of the session and dispose of it. I hope the course I have suggested will meet the approbation of the Senate. I trust the subject will be referred, and that the discussion will be postponed until the report of the committee shall come in.

Mr. SHIELDS. I made an attempt, a short time ago, to postpone the consideration of this resolution until next week, for the purpose of making a few observations upon it. I did not intend to make a speech. I am not, as the Senate very well know, accustomed to occupy their time in making speeches. I try, as well as I know how, to do a little work here, and I am rather astonished that my friend from California should endeavor to throw me completely aside, and out of the question in this matter. I have not made a speech this session, nor did I make one at the last session, and I do not mean to make one now. My only object was, so far as I knew how, to give this debate a practical application, and I intend to do that in a very few observations. I trouble the Senate very seldom with speeches, as that honorable Senator well knows.

I agree with the Senator from Virginia that it is now too late to arrest this discussion; it would be arresting it only midway. Two years ago, I brought forward, as will be recollected by the Senate, a proposition in relation to Central America. I took the initiative in that respect, and perhaps I may claim it, if there be any honor in that. I have not interfered in this debate, because I did not believe I could throw any light upon it. But I know it is a matter of great importance to my constituents, and having brought forward the proposition to which I alluded, I did intend to say a few words upon that branch of the subject, and as to the necessity of giving the debate some practical application. But I shall not force upon the Senate any observations of mine. I am as anxious to get at practical business as is the honorable Senator from California. I think, however, that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations is fairly entitled to be heard upon this subject. I care nothing about the treatment I myself may receive, for I have no claim upon the Senate in this particular matter; but I think it would be treating him very badly, after this discussion has gone so far, not to permit him, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to present his views upon it.

Mr. BUTLER. I think this is a case which calls for reference. I am unable to give any judgment on the subject, unless I have the requisite information. The honorable Senator from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, has made inquiries, and I have no doubt those inquiries will enable him to bring forward much information upon which Senators can form a judgment. Ordinarily, subjects of this kind come before the Senate through Executive communications, and I think it much the safest mode; but as this subject has been brought up for discussion, and as we are to take jurisdiction of matters of negotiation of this kind, I want to learn one important fact, and that is, if Great Britain has committed a trespass upon the rights of anybody, upon what political community she has committed this trespass. Now, her settlement upon the Bay of Honduras, if a trespass, is one either upon Guatemala or upon Honduras, or some other Central American State. The honorable Senator from Virginia no doubt can give us a great deal of information as to the true character of these States or communities; and it may be that, in the end, I shall be compelled to vote for something that would look like a mission to Guatemala, with a view to guaranty her rights so far as our interests and policy are involved; but before I can do that, I want information. How can I give a judgment until I have information? And therefore I would suggest that the reference should at once take place, and that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations should give us the information in a report, even before he makes his speech; and I will promise, though I intended to speak upon the subject, if he gives full information in regard to it, such as I can understand, and upon which I can form a judgment, that I will not make a speech. I will be entirely satisfied with his explanation. If we refer the matter at once, I think we shall accomplish something; but if we carry on this debate in this cursory manner, shooting at a barn door all the while, and having no mark, I do not know what may not be brought within its scope. The honorable Senator from Florida, in discussing another subject, I thought, made it very germane to this. It strikes me, however, that the whole question ought to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and let their report be the vehicle of information upon which we shall pronounce a responsible judgment, for we are in some measure involving ourselves in Executive business. I say, at once, then, let the subject be referred.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not in favor of referring this subject to the committee. I am anxious to hear the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the subject. Other gentlemen have spoken upon it, and I desire some information which may be important to the decision of this body. I want the privilege of speaking upon it myself. I have occupied but very little of the time of this body at this session, or at previous sessions; and though I am as anxious as any Senator to see the Pacific railroad bill progress, I imagine we shall not bring it to any satisfactory conclusion this session; and until a report is made from the special committee on the subject, I do not think that we can progress with it at all. I shall, therefore, vote against any reference until I can hear the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. GWIN. I did not wish to prevent any Senator from speaking by making the motion which I have made. The honorable Senator from Illinois knows well that I would be very much delighted to hear him; but there are many in his condition. I do not know a member of the Senate but will be compelled to say something about this question before we come to a final and decisive vote upon the resolution.

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator permit me to say that I have no wish whatever to trespass upon the time of the Senate? This is a much larger and much more important subject than that Senator seems to imagine. I have the honor to represent, in this body, the Committee on Military Affairs, and I wanted to convert this into what I deemed to be a practical subject—a subject that interests him. I mean the fortification of the coast of his State, the fortification of the southern coast, and some other matters. I felt that in doing so, I should give it, perhaps, about as practical an application as it would receive in this body. Whether I shall be permitted to do so or not, I care not. I shall do my duty in my own humble way, anyhow.

Mr. GWIN. The honorable Senator must recollect that I am chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that I understand the bearing of this question probably as well as he does. The State of California would be as deeply interested in a controversy with England as any State in this Confederacy. I have no doubt that this resolution is to have an important bearing upon the future foreign intercourse of this country, and therefore we must give our reasons for our votes; and the question presents itself, if no practical question of legislation comes up in connection with these resolutions, whether we had not better let them go over for an Executive declaration. That was the very question I had in view. I know the Senator is examining this question with regard to the military defenses of the country, and he has collected a great deal of the most valuable information on the subject, and I hope the result of his examination and his labors will be put in the form of a law before this Congress adjourns. I am sure that will be done, so far as the committee is concerned, for we have had an indication of their intentions.

As to any discourtesy to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I never thought of it. I never dreamed of it when I made the motion to postpone the resolutions until the 4th of March. I made that motion because I believed we could not come to a vote on them before the 4th of March. That is my belief. I am perfectly willing that they should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with the understanding that they will come back in a form in which we can discuss them with a practical end in view.

Mr. DAVIS. While these resolutions declare general principles which I approve, I do not think that they meet the question at issue at all. The real question for the consideration of the Government is one growing out of a treaty between us and Great Britain; and we need some further information before we undertake to give an interpretation to that. The great question, in my mind, is whether or not Great Britain has organized a colony in what is called the Bay of Islands? If she has done that, the next inquiry is, is that, or is it not, an infringement of the late treaty which has been made?

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the honorable Senator permit me to correct him in one point? It is not "the Bay of Islands," but the islands in the bay of Honduras which the British have erected into a colony.

Mr. DAVIS. It is quite immaterial which form of expression is used. There is a colony by some such name, as it is said, and a colony recently organized. Now, I do not know that it is entirely easy to ascertain all the facts which have a direct bearing upon this question. I am anxious that the facts in regard to it should be presented to us in a reliable form. I understand that by the treaties of 1783 and 1786, between Spain and Great Britain, the latter expressly renounced all claim to every part and portion of this country, except that conditional title which was granted to her, in what is called the Balize. If she renounced that—and the islands, as it appears to me, from examining the treaties, constitute no part of the Balize—then she renounced all right to them. Then, where do they belong? If I comprehend the facts correctly, the boundaries of Central America, of the five States constituting Central America, are coincident with the old kingdom of Guatemala, with this exception: there was a small province at the lower end, called Chiapas, that was taken off and annexed to Mexico. If, then, those boundaries are coincident, the Bay of Islands was renounced in the treaties, and belong to Central America, and probably to that portion of it called the province of Honduras.

I wish to have these facts ascertained. I wish for a reliable report from some source or other, which shall determine whether we are correct in this; and if it turns out to be true that the islands which are now claimed as a colony, were part and portion of Honduras, or of the Mosquito coast —for both were alike renounced—then I apprehend that Great Britain had no title to them whatever; that they were a portion of the country to which she renounced all sovereignty, and that they did belong to what is called Central America —that is, they were a part and portion of the ancient kingdom of Guatemala.

I am, therefore, with the honorable Senator from South Carolina, in favor of referring this subject to the committee, that they may present to us the facts which belong to it; and when they have presented them, we shall have a tangible subject to act upon. I think, as other gentlemen do, that it is a subject of a good deal of importance; for if what I suppose to be true turns out to be so, a great question arises, whether or not the treaty, in its very terms, has not been violated. That is the subject with which we have to deal. There can be no question but that, when there is a governmental difference of opinion between us and Great Britain, it is an important question. The dignity, and character, and power of each of the countries make it important. But I do not wish to make any mistake in the matter. I desire, when I move in it, to move understandingly; and if there has been a colony organized contrary to the terms of the treaty, as I am rather disposed to think there has been, I am willing, for one, to meet the question in the manner which becomes the dignity, and honor, and character of the country. It seems to me that we cannot approach this subject understandingly until we have this information. I shall, therefore, believing it to be the best course we can pursue, cheerfully vote for the commitment of this question to the Committee on Foreign Relations. If the honorable chairman of that committee desires to make his remarks before the commitment, I shall not interpose any objection, though I think it is obvious, for many reasons, that it would be better for him to reserve his remarks until the committee shall have reported. It seems to me that this will be the better course for all of us. I hope, therefore, it will be taken.

Mr. CASS. Thirty years ago Mr. Jefferson said that this question of European influence was the most momentous question that had been presented to him since the 4th of July, 1776. It is just as momentous now as it was then. But I desire to correct the idea which gentlemen seem to entertain, that this is a mere abstract principle. I consider it one of the most practical principles presented to the American Congress—practical in its application from day to day as a guide to the Executive of the opinions of the American Congress. No principle can be more practical; and none is more liable from day to day to be called into actual use. It is an entire mistake to call it an abstract question. And allow me to say, with reference to what has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts, that I cannot for my life understand the necessity of sending these resolutions to a committee. They have no reference to the colony of the Bay of Islands, or any other colony. They assert a great and important principle; and whether the British have the right to establish a colony there or not, and whether they have established one or not, is perfectly immaterial to this question. The principles which guide us are everlasting in their nature, and call for the declaration of the American Congress, which Mr. Jefferson said ought to have been done in 1823. The reference is not to establish the fact with respect to the colony of the Bay of Islands. I repeat, the resolutions do not refer to that, but they are upon a great principle, and every gentleman who is willing now to say that that shall be the principle of the American Government, is prepared to vote upon them. They need no reference. The establishment of no fact that can be investigated by the Committee on Foreign Relations can touch that great principle. It remains everlastingly the same. Establish your principle; apply it to cases as they arise; and then, before questions arise with foreign nations, ascertain the facts. What objection there can be to establishing the principle now, or what reference the resolutions have to any individual case, I cannot understand.

Mr. DAWSON. I desire to be heard upon this question at the proper time. I am a little surprised that the Senator from Michigan, who speaks so often and so interestingly upon this subject, should say that there is no necessity for having a practical question to act upon. As I understand it, the introduction of the resolutions was founded on the facts, supposed to be true, that there was such a colonization going on within the limits of Central America. Hence the propriety of their introduction. Now, the consequences growing out of their introduction are to be vastly important, and already are they assuming a very portentous aspect. Some language which I have heard uttered here to-day is well calculated to strike the minds of the American people. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations—the man, above all others, to whom we look for information upon foreign affairs—has uttered words and sentiments to-day that will be noticed throughout the civilized world. He said that he believed British colonization has taken place in the Bay of Islands, and that if that be true, "it must be discontinued." Hence, if all the facts be true, action becomes necessary. What action? Congressional action; war, in the view of the peace-abiding gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.] Before we proceed an inch, in the language of my friend from Massachusetts, should we not be able to place ourselves upon firm ground, and move, not only understandingly, but firmly to the consequences, whatever they may be? But the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations proposes to postpone this subject until next Monday, when he desires to be heard upon these important questions, without the presentation of a single fact arising out of the communication from the President of the United States; and when his speech shall have been made in this instance, what becomes of the reference of the message of the President?—and where are the facts to go before the country upon which we are finally to act? Nowhere.

I maintain that these filibustering resolutions in relation to foreign relations are incompatible with the dignity of the body upon an occasion like this, and that we should never deal in abstractions, and declare what shall be, and what shall not be. When we intend to act upon facts already ascertained or supposed to be ascertained, let us call upon our Committee on Foreign Relations to lay them before the body. Let us have all the facts connected with colonization in Central America, whether in Honduras, or in any other section of the country; and whenever those facts shall be presented to us, we can act. What do I know about it? What does any Senator on this floor know about it? The President tells you, in the language of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that he has no facts which he can communicate to us. The chairman, then, must do the best he can; and if it so turns out that there are no facts to establish the position that an organization or colonization has taken place, what is the result? Why, that no organization or colonization has taken place. But if it be true that it has taken place, give us the facts, and then the Monroe doctrine will come in, and come in as it was intended to come in by the honorable Senator from Michigan, founded upon the idea that this colonization had already taken place. But that fact is not officially ascertained. Let us get the official information, and then act upon it.

Let these resolutions be laid upon the table. What are they? Abstractions; a reaffirmation of the Monroe doctrine, which, although never introduced by way of resolution before, has been firmly fixed in every American statesman's mind and determination. There is no necessity of resolving that we will do so and so, in such a state of affairs. Let us ascertain the state of affairs which exists, and then resolve, if it displeases us, that it shall not exist as it is. Let the resolutions be laid upon the table, or referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; let the distinguished Senator at the head of that committee bring in his report, and accompany that report by the speech which he desires to deliver; and I will ask now what speech is it he desires to deliver? A speech upon colonization in the abstract—not upon existing colonization, because he says he knows not whether it be true or not that a British colony has been established in Central America, though he thinks it is true. Why should the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations make a speech of that kind unless it be based upon facts, and unless the facts be such as to authorize it? Should we influence the kingdom of Great Britain or any other, by saying that if they do a certain thing we will do so and so? Let us ascertain what has been done, and then, if we dislike it, ask the Government of Great Britain to disavow it; and if she will not do so, then let us decide what course we shall pursue.

Mr. MASON. I think if the exact posture of the question were understood by the Senate, there would be no difficulty in disposing of this subject. The message of the President of the United States, in connection with this alleged colonization on the coast of Honduras, is now before the Committee on Foreign Relations. There is, therefore, before them, a distinct question upon which they may, and probably will, report. The resolution of the Senator from Michigan covers certain great principles of American policy, alleged by him to have been laid down as early as the year 1823—thirty years ago. What I meant to say was this: It seems to me that the debate which has commenced, should go on in reference to these general principles of American policy, and upon them I wish to be heard. The report that may, and probably will be made upon the message of the President of the United States, in reference to a specific colony, affects the application of certain of those principles, and certain of them only. I see no necessity for the reference of the resolution of the Senator from Michigan—none in the world, so far as regards the specific question now before the committee.

Mr. DAWSON. That is the very ground upon which I go. I would say again, that I presume there is scarcely a dissenting voice in this body, with reference to the mere abstract questions which are involved in the resolution of the Senator from Michigan. But why this constant repetition and declamation upon principles in regard to which we all agree? I cannot see the necessity of it. Yet, underneath this, it is clearly to be perceived that we are going on to a particular object on the allegation that there has been a violation of these principles, by the establishment of a British colony in Central America. That is the idea. Why not, as practical men, investigate the question, ascertain the existence of the facts in the case, and then apply the principle to it? Why send out in advance these speeches to the country?—and they are read, I know, with the utmost anxiety, for people suppose there is something concealed, and that war is in our front; that the cloud is gathering. We are thereby affecting by this discussion the great commercial interests of this country. We are probably bringing ruin upon many great interests of the Union, when I know it is not the intention of gentlemen to involve the country in a war.

I repeat that the remark of my honorable friend from Virginia, that a British colony has been established in Central America, and that "it must be discontinued," is the strongest allegation which has yet been made that war is before us, or that there is danger, because a great principle has been violated. But I think the country will see that the filibustering portion of the Congress of the United States do not want to act upon the case presented; they want to commit a majority of Congress to certain principles, and then they will present a case so that the majority cannot back out, but war must follow. That is the idea; and you cannot conceal it from the public mind, for the commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing interests are too sensitive not to perceive that legislation like this would be destructive. Hence it is that I say, come boldly up to your principles; and I stand upon them myself. I would permit no foreign country to colonize this continent if we have power to prevent it. Stand upon that principle, but do not be continually speaking of it, and repeating it. It is like saying to a man, "If you say so and so about me I will flog you. I understand you have said it, and I believe it, and I have made up my mind to flog you, if you have done it." You should first ascertain the facts and then apply your principle to them.

I do not make these observations with the most distant apprehension that there is any danger of a war. I do not wish any interests of the Union to feel alarmed upon this subject. I see no occasion for believing that there is to be a war. I see no disposition in foreign countries to interfere with any great American principle. On the contrary, I believe that the industrial interests of the world, and especially of the European and American people, are now the controlling power; and that common sense, common honesty, and common justice will prevail, and keep down everything in conflict with the rights and happiness of the people. I look upon the scene which has occurred here upon this resolution, and the speeches which have gone forth, as evidence of the belligerent disposition of some gentlemen, or as an outburst of that desire for war which now and then will occur, especially in a Republic like ours.

I concur with the Senator from California—and we do not agree very often—that this subject should be put out of the way, and that practical legislation, affecting the interests of the country, should be taken up. Let us proceed to business affecting the people for whom we have to act, and if there is any violation of our principles of foreign policy, let the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations ascertain it, communicate it to us officially, and I will be one of the first to suspend all other business and act upon it.

On motion by Mr. HALE, the Senate adjourned.

THE TEHUANTEPEC GRANT.

SPEECH OF HON. J. M. MASON,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE SENATE, February 1, 1853,

On the Resolutions reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, in regard to the Tehuantepec Grant.

Mr. MASON said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: What I have to say on the subject of this right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec can involve but little more than dry detail; but yet, in my apprehension, and in the judgment of the Commitee on Foreign Relations, to whom this subject was referred, it is one of very great importance to the country.

During the last session, the Senate passed a resolution requesting the President of the United States to communicate to the Senate all the correspondence and documents, which had passed between the Government of the United States and the Government of Mexico, concerning this right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. The correspondence was sent in at a late day of the session, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That committee took the subject under consideration, and before the close of the session, but too late to be acted upon, made a report, accompanied by several resolutions. That report has been before the Senate, therefore, since the last session of Congress, and it will be found by those who have looked at the resolutions, that the committee considered the subject as one of no little interest and moment to the Government. I will ask permission to read them. The report concludes by recommending to the Senate the adoption of the following resolutions:

"Resolved, (as the judgment of the Senate,) That in the present posture of the question on the grant of a right of way through the territory of Mexico, at the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, conceded by that Republic to one of its citizens, and now the property of citizens of the United States, as the same is presented by the correspondence and documents accompanying the message of the President of the United States of the 27th July, 1852, it is not compatible with the dignity of this Government to prosecute the subject further by negotiation.

"2. Should the Government of Mexico propose a renewal of such negotiation, it should be acceded to only upon distinct propositions from Mexico, not inconsistent with the demands made by this Government in reference to said grant.

"3. That the Government of the United States stands committed to all of its citizens to protect them in their rights, abroad as well as at home, within the sphere of its jurisdiction; and should Mexico, within a reasonable time, fail to reconsider her position concerning said grant, it will then become the duty of this Government to review all existing relations with that Republic, and to adopt such measures as will preserve the honor of the country and the rights of its citizens."

The Senate will see from the character and tone of these resolutions, that the Committee on Foreign Relations have considered that this subject, by the action upon it of the two Governments, and by its intrinsic importance, has been elevated into one of very grave consideration. Mr. President, the acquisition of California, lying upon the Pacific border, and of the intervening territory, at the close of the war with Mexico, placed this Government in the embarrassing position of having some of its most important dependencies—for California was then a dependency—at the distance of some three thousand miles from the Atlantic settlements, and inaccessible unless across deserts and mountains, requiring months to pass them. It is known to the Senate, that in the instructions which were given by President Polk to the commissioner of the United States, by whom the treaty of peace was negotiated—a President who closed a very successful, and indeed brilliant administration, by the successful issue of the war with Mexico—he was directed, in view of the high and great importance of obtaining an accessible way to those Pacific possessions, to offer Mexico for the right of way a very large sum of money. The proposition was declined on the part of Mexico, because, as was alleged, that right of way was no longer within her control—that she had parted with it.

Since the acquisition of California—since it was erected into a State—and more especially since the discovery of the immense deposits of gold which have attracted the attention, not only of the people of this country, but of the entire world, the way to get access to California has filled the public mind. The enterprise of our people, with their capital, was embarked in seeking a right of way some two thousand miles distant from our coast, where the continent, or rather the isthmus that connects the two continents, was contracted to its smallest extent, across the Isthmus of Panama; and within a very short time, by the investment of a very large capital, and with some risk on the part of those who did it, a communication was opened there, in order to give us access to our possessions on the Pacific. That communication has continued since in the course of successful use.

Under the convention made between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, another communication was intended to be opened—how far it has yet been opened I am not fully informed—through Nicaragua, by way of the river San Juan and Lake Nicaragua. And now, by private enterprise, and private enterprise alone, that communication is successfully carried on. The Governments of Central America, weak and feeble as they all unfortunately are, have not interposed any obstacles; but, on the contrary, they have been disposed to make liberal and just concessions to our people to enable them to get at their Pacific possessions, by granting a right of way across their respective territories. It has been reserved for Mexico alone, a contiguous Republic, the Republic from whom these possessions on the Pacific were acquired, not only to refuse such right of way across her territory, but she has accompanied the refusal with a deliberate purpose to annul and repudiate as void the very grant, the existence of which she originally assigned as the obstacle to any treaty stipulation on her part conceding it to this Government.

Now, Mr. President, in looking at the map, we shall find that the continent of North America, at the point referred to, in the provinces or departments of Oaxaca and Vera Cruz, one of the Mexican States, is contracted more than at any other point, until you reach the Isthmus of Panama. We find that between the Bay of Vera Cruz, in the Gulf of Mexico, and the Gulf of Tehuantepec, on the Pacific side, the continent is contracted to an air line of distance between the two seas, shown by actual survey to be but one hundred and thirty miles. Before the war with Mexico, indeed for a long series of years, the attention of the world had been directed to effecting some practicable route across that part of the continent so as to connect the two oceans, and great and extended enterprises had been, from time to time, projected, but all of them had failed. There was no way for the commerce of this part of the continent, or that of Europe, to pass to the other side of the American continent or the Indies, except by a protracted voyage by the way of the southern cape of America or that of Africa. But recently, on account of the discoveries of gold in California, and since that country has become one of the States of this Confederation, the mind of the people of the United States has been concentrated upon the exploration and the successful execution of a route which shall be found most accessible and least expensive to bring the two oceans into communication.

In 1842, the Government of Mexico, Santa Anna being then President with supreme power, (and we have learned from our intercourse with Mexico that a President with supreme power is the only responsible Government that Mexico has yet had,) made a grant of a liberal character to a certain Mr. Garay, a citizen of Mexico, who seems to have been a man of wealth, as he was certainly one of enterprise. Garay forthwith took measures to have the way across the Isthmus to which his grant applied, surveyed, and the practicability of effecting a transit there ascertained. He employed for that purpose an enlightened Italian engineer, by the name of Moro, who made an actual survey of the country lying between the two oceans at the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. I will read a very short extract from the report made by him. It gives a very succinct but clear view of that country:

"The entire line of country was carefully surveyed and mapped, the face of the land, its productions and capabilities, were examined with untiring perseverance.

"From these surveys, it is established that the entire distance from sea to sea is one hundred and thirty-five miles in a straight line, and presents a wide plain from the mouth of the Coatzacoalcos to the port of Mesa de Tarifa, a table or elevated plain on the line of the Andes, which rises to the height of six hundred and fifty feet above the level of the sea, and at the distance of five miles again descends to a plain, which reaches the Pacific. The summit level to be overcome is only six hundred and fifty feet; thirty miles of the river Coatzacoalcos are navigable for ships of the lagest class, and fifteen miles beyond this for vessels of light draught, leaving only about one hundred and fifteen miles of railroad to be made. It would occupy too much space to enumerate all the details of these surveys, and which go to show so strongly how easily a railroad can be constructed across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. It is sufficient to say, that the absolute practicability has been clearly ascertained."

Garay, who was a Mexican citizen, assigned his grant in the year 1848 to certain Englishmen who were then, I believe, resident in Mexico. The terms of his grant, as are fully shown, authorizing him to assign it to the citizens or subjects of any foreign Power; and those English subjects, in 1849, assigned it to a gentleman named Hargous, who was, I believe, a native of Pennsylvania; certainly a citizen of the United States. Mr. Hargous, to carry on the work, connected with him, as we learn from the documents accompanying the message of the President, certain citizens of New Orleans, who allege that they can command the necessary capital to construct a railway across the continent at this point.

Now, Mr. President, with reference to what fell from the Senator from Texas, [Mr. Rusk,] and what has fallen, on a former day, from the Senator who, with so much zeal and ability, represents in part the State of California on this floor, [Mr. Gwin,] I beg leave to say, in limine, that, although I cannot see any authority whatever in the Government of the United States to undertake the execution of a railway, or any other form of communication between this part of the country and the State of California, yet, be that as it may, there is no conflict, and there ought to be no conflict, between those who desire the construction of a railroad across our part of the continent and those who desire the construction of one across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. Sir, look at what exists now. In the very infancy of our commerce and communication with these seas, by transit across the southern continent, we find that private enterprise alone has made it productive to a degree which enriches all. Already two routes are established and in successful use—one across the continent at the Isthmus of Panama, and another by the way of the river San Juan and Lake Nicaragua, in the Republic of that name; and looking to the great results that are rapidly to follow these short cuts to the Indies, none can doubt, had we a railway connection at Tehuantepec, and another from the Mississippi to the Pacific shore, there would be found ample and remunerative employment for them all—that which was most speedy would command the travel, whilst the exchanges of commerce would be conceded to its competitors.

There is no conflict, there should be no conflict between rival routes, or rival interests, to impair the action of the Government in this matter. It is because the interests of this Government, as I conceive, are more deeply involved in having a transit at Tehuantepec than anywhere else where a road has been projected, that I have felt it my duty to ask, urgently, the attention of the Senate to the posture in which the question now stands between the Government of the United States and the Government of Mexico. It is found to be not only a practicable way, but since it has come into American hands, the entire route has been resurveyed, under the superintendence of a most enlightened engineer, taken from the public service, (Major Barnard,) who was occupied some six or seven months in the work, and has made to his employers a most elaborate report in the book from which I read an extract just now. It is shown by actual survey of the route, that the highest elevation to be overcome (corresponding with the survey made by his predecessor Moro) does not exceed six hundred and fifty feet, and that the maximum of grade upon the whole route does not exceed sixty feet to the mile. The report of Major Barnard further shows that the entire length of a railway from sea to sea will be but one hundred and eighty-six miles. But the river Coatzacoalcos, on the Atlantic side, is said to be navigable for the largest class of ships, as high as the village of Minatetlan, twenty miles from its mouth; and if this be taken as the Atlantic terminus, then the railway will measure but one hundred and sixty-six miles, and the whole cost of the work, including the full equipment of the road, is brought by his estimates within eight millions of dollars.

It is true, sir, that the proposed way lies within the dominion of a foreign Power, and were a choice to be made, that objection would be conclusive of the election. Yet a highway between nations should be the subject of no exclusive jurisdiction, and it is to retain for it that character with which it has been already clothed by treaty stipulation, that I press it upon the attention of the Senate. But, sir, in the view to be taken of it now, there is really no choice. Here we have a plain practicable work, so demonstrated to be by the most competent skill, that may be finished within two or three years, and at a cost far less than has been incurred by many private companies under State charters. Against it you oppose one to be reckoned in its extent by thousands of miles, not a foot of which has been surveyed, and which may, nay, must, cost more than one hundred millions. The first will be in successful operation before you can cut a tree or plant a stone in the construction of the latter.

I do not propose that the Government shall aid this company by contributions from the Treasury, by a grant of public land, or in any other way than by protecting its own citizens against spoliation by a foreign Power. But in doing that, this Government will not only have extended proper protection to its citizens, but it will have secured to itself, what it is entitled to—a way to its possessions on the Pacific coast—the best, the most accessible, and the shortest way, in time, at least, which can be obtained.

In the report of the committee which accompanies these resolutions, the title to this grant has been minutely traced, the committee being satisfied in its judgment, that a valid, undoubted, and unquestionable title had passed from the Government of Mexico to the American citizens, who are now the holders of it, and those gentlemen who may desire to see it will find it there. I come now to show how the Government has been connected with it.

After the title was thus acquired, the Government of the United States, seeing the importance of the subject, invited Mexico to negotiate, not for the purpose of giving validity to, or protecting the title which its citizens had acquired, but for the purpose of giving protection to the right of way when it was made, recognizing the grant, then the property of citizens of the United States, and inviting Mexico to treat by convention to give the protection of the two Governments to the communication when it should be made. We know that a similar act had been done already between the Governments of the United States and England, both Governments assuming a common interest in protecting the right of way, which was projected by means of Lake Nicaragua, through the territory of Nicaragua. A convention was entered into accordingly, which is now the supreme law of the land, the purpose of which was to secure that way through Lake Nicaragua as a common highway to the whole world. Each Government entered into guarantees for its protection, and to keep it open as a common highway. The Government of the United States for like reasons, but of a more urgent character, invited Mexico to form a convention for the purpose of constituting a common highway by means of this grant conceded to Garay, and now in the hands of American citizens. Mexico acceded to it. A convention was framed, and signed at the city of Mexico, between our Minister there and the proper authorities in Mexico, with the approbation of Herrera, who was then President of that Republic, to effect these objects; in which convention the right secured by the grant was fully recognized. When the convention was signed in Mexico, it was sent here. Some alterations and modifications were suggested by the Government at Washington, and it eventually took the form of a new convention, which was sent back to Mexico. The Government of Mexico—I mean the Executive Government—approved it, and it was signed in the city of Mexico, in January, 1851.

Its object and its terms were only to give the protection of the two Governments to that way across the continent, effecting a communication between the two seas.

Now, Mr. President, we have had some experience of the character which unfortunately belongs to the authorities of Mexico, and the difficulty which that unfortunate people have encountered from the very birth of the Republic, either in constituting or maintaining a responsible Government—torn, as it seems to be, from one extremity to the other by domestic feuds or dissensions, and constantly in a state of revolution. It resulted that very soon after this convention had been signed in January, 1852, there was a change in the Government; and it would appear from the best information I can obtain in looking at the history of the occasion, that this grant of a right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec was made the stalking-horse by which one Administration was to get into power, and the other to be thrown out. The consequence was, that in an evil hour for the interests of the world, as well as for the two countries, the Congress of Mexico were induced to reject the treaty. At the time that convention was rejected, the American holders of this grant were upon the Isthmus, in the act of completing their surveys, preparatory to the work. They had been invited to go there by the Government of Mexico—orders had been issued by the central authority of Mexico to the States through which the road was to pass, not only to throw no obstructions or difficulties in the way, but to receive the engineers and their party with hospitality—to place the resources of the country at their disposal, and to give them every facility in their power to execute the work. A previous order which had been issued by the Government of Mexico was reaffirmed, requiring that when they were ready to commence the work, three hundred convicts should be put at the disposal of the company as public laborers. This party had been there from December to June, a period of some seven months—a party consisting, according to my recollection, of nearly one hundred men, in charge of Major Barnard, an officer of our own service, who had been invited to take charge of the work, and who had been allowed to go there by the Government. An immense expenditure had been incurred by the American holders of this grant, in order to effect that survey. They had not only sent this very large body of men, but they had necessarily to send a large store of materials in the form of implements, &c. They had sent provisions; they had chartered ships and steamboats to aid in it, until their expenditure, as I am informed, reached some $300,000.

Thus, while they were at work under the auspices of Mexico—at the invitation of Mexico—the Congress of that Republic, without notice of any kind whatever, passed a law repealing, substantially, the grant to Garay; and an order was immediately issued, in the month of June, 1851, requiring that the whole engineering party then on the Isthmus, should be forthwith expelled—contumeliously expelled—from the territory of Mexico. I do not look upon that as an indignity intended towards this Government. I look upon it only as evidence of the unfortunate imbecility of the country from which it emanated—an imbecility which renders them incapable of maintaining government, even from month to month. It was a sort of wretched oblation by the party that obtained power, to the prejudices of an ignorant race, by filling their minds with strange, vague, and indefinite apprehensions of what the consequences would be, if our people got a foothold anywhere within their territory. The engineering party were expelled from the Isthmus. They were required to discontinue their work at once, and to abandon the country without stretching another line. They did so; the party was disbanded, and returned home.

Protection is always due by Government to its citizens—our Army and Navy is maintained and built only for such purpose—and, in this case, it would seem more eminently due, because these heavy losses were sustained in an enterprise of great value to the country, to which our people had been invited by the despoiling Power, and to which the Government had lent its sanction, in the free use of the treaty-making power.

In the report of the committee to which I have alluded, the ground upon which the law of the Mexican Congress was passed, repealing substantially and in effect this grant to Garay, is fully set forth. It appears from the recital contained in the report, that when the grant was made in 1842, a certain time was given to the grantee within which to commence the work. Before the time expired, a further decree was issued by the Mexican Government extending the time. In 1846, when General Salas came into power as President with supreme power, (as Santa Anna and Bravo had been before him,) the time had elapsed within which the work was to be commenced. Surveys had been made, but the work had not actually commenced, and the grant might have been considered forfeited by a course of judicial proceeding; but that forfeiture was cured. General Salas, in November, 1846, issued a decree giving further time for two years to the holders of the grant to commence this work, and by that decree ingrafted upon the grant additional stipulations and additional provisions, thus constituting a consideration or equivalent for the extension granted. The decree is set out at large in the volume to which I have referred, and can be seen by any Senator.

The time for the commencement of the work thus extended in November, 1846, expired in November, 1848, before which the work was actually commenced, as is admitted on all hands, and thus the grant was saved. The single ground assumed by Mexico for thus repealing the decree of President Salas is, that he had no authority to make it.

This is a simple, and a very narrow issue, and the first remark I should note is, that if this were so, the judiciary was the proper tribunal to determine the question.

If the grant was valid, it was a contract made for valuable considerations, and was beyond the reach of legislation. The sanction of a contract so made, is the honor and faith of the nation that is party to it, and both of these are expressly pledged by the terms of the grant. But Mexico did not choose to remit the party to her courts. Violence, the law of the tyrant, was a more speedy and certain resort.

As to the authority of Salas, it is enough to say that he was, for the time, the sole depositary of power, and that power was supreme. His title was, "President with supreme power." In his will was concentrated the will of the nation, as the Government de facto—and he was so recognized and submitted to by all Mexico, until the Government was changed.

This was not the only decree in the nature of a general law which emanated from this "supreme power" whilst President Salas held it.

Looking through the history of the times, we find the following, amongst others:

1. A decree organizing the Bureau of General Archives.
2. A decree relative to the liberty of the press.
3. A decree relative to colonization.
4. A decree relative to literary property.
5. A decree authorizing popular meetings.
6. A decree concerning naturalization.

All these decrees, and with them that concerning the Garay grant, were communicated to the Congress which Salas convoked, by his Ministers, as laws enacted by the Provisional Government.

They were received and submitted to as such. No protest against them as usurpations was made, not a word from the press even, questioning their validity, or the power that enacted them. On the contrary, the very Congress that subsequently repealed this decree of Salas, on the ground that he had not authority to make it, annulled a law of the State of Sonora, because it violated Salas's decree relative to colonization. It would seem that his power was undoubted for every purpose, save to extend this grant. This needs no further comment.

I have caused to be prepared a paper intended to show, and I believe it does correctly show, the difference, both in time and distance, in passing from different points of the North American continent to the Pacific by these respective ways. The distance from New York to San Francisco, via Chagres, is six thousand six hundred and fifty miles, and the distance between the same points by the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, is four thousand nine hundred and seventy miles, making a difference in the distance of one thousand six hundred and eighty miles. Between New Orleans and San Francisco, by way of Panama, the distance is five thousand six hundred and seventy-five miles. From New Orleans to San Francisco, by the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, the distance is three thousand seven hundred and forty miles, making a difference of one thousand nine hundred and thirty-five miles. Now, as to time, I am informed that the average time now occupied in passing from New York to San Francisco by the Chagres route, is about twenty-eight days, and the quickest time that has been made, is twenty-two days.

Mr. WELLER. It has never been made in twenty-two days.

Mr. MASON. I would like to know what is the shortest time.

Mr. WELLER. Twenty-four days.

Mr. MASON. It is estimated, computing in the same ratio, that the average time from New York to San Francisco, via Tehuantepec, will be nineteen days, and the shortest time probably fifteen days. From New Orleans to San Francisco, by the way of Tehuantepec, it is estimated the time will be fourteen days, and the possible time twelve days.

I get these statements from gentlemen interested in this work, and who seem to have derived them from correct sources.

Mr. President, I have said that the Government of the United States has an interest in this right of way across Tehuantepec which it behooves us to retain, and to insist upon, through the agency of the Garay grant, now in the hands of its own citizens. It is a duty which the Government owes both to itself and to the citizens of the country. This right of way is within the limits of Mexico, and we are not without evidence that, if the Government of Mexico be permitted to repudiate the grant, we shall not have a transit across Tehuantepec for half a century. The Garay grant was a very liberal one. It conceded to the grantee ten leagues (or thirty miles) of the unoccupied lands on each side of the line of communication. It authorized colonization, and gave the colonists almost all the privileges of Mexican citizens. It was very liberal in reference to the tax that was to be exacted on the transit; and Mexico, more than all, precluded herself from imposing any taxes or any political charges on the work for a period of fifty years. The grant, therefore, is a most important one, and if we allow it to be repudiated and annulled, it requires no prophet to foretell that Mexico will either concede no other, or it will be done in such form as to render it valueless as a highway to the world.

How does the matter stand? The Mexican law, to which I have referred, disaffirming the decree of Salas, was passed in May, 1851, nearly two years ago. The Mexican papers inform us that that Government has, from time to time, issued proposals to construct this way by a new company, or in some other form. Two years have elapsed, and yet, notwithstanding the eminent importance to the world of having access across the continent at that point, the whole question stands now just where it stood then. We are informed that in all the propositions which have since emanated from the Mexican Government, in their proposals inviting new companies to construct this work, they have imposed limitations and restrictions which must discourage all from attempting it, or which would have the effect, if complied with, of leaving that work exclusively in the charge of the Mexican Government. The propositions are of this character: The contractors are required, in the first place, to acknowledge the unqualified sovereignty of Mexico over the transit, and her right to impose any political charges whatever upon persons or property passing over it. They are required to acknowledge a concurrent right in the Government of Mexico to fix the corporate charges. They are required to agree to place their mail steamers under the national flag of Mexico, and all their vessels are to be subject to tonnage and lighterage duties. They are required to agree to transport no troops or munitions of war across the Isthmus, except with the express permission of Mexico. They are required to discriminate in favor of such nations as shall guaranty this monopoly, by deducting twenty-five per cent. from the corporate charges in their favor; they are required to transfer the work at cost to Mexico, and, more than all, those who are there constructing this work are required to renounce their right to the protection of their own Governments, and become de facto Mexican citizens. In this point of view, the question becomes exceedingly important to this country.

If Mexico were what Mexico ought to be, an enlightened, intelligent, liberal community, they would do what even those far weaker Central American Republics have done. They would see that it was due to the great family of nations, not to us alone but to the world, that a work of this character, intended to connect the two seas and to pass the immense commerce of those seas, should be under the charge of no one Government, but should have the guarantee and protection of all. They would see that it was a duty which they owed to other nations to make it a common highway, and to renounce the narrow and destructive policy of holding it purely as a Mexican work, subject to the mutations of Mexican policy. And yet it will follow, as certain as night follows day, that if the Mexican Government be allowed to repudiate this grant, it never will become such highway, unless at the cost of continual war. I say then, sir, unhesitatingly, that beside the duty devolved upon us to protect our citizens and their property against the aggression of a foreign Power, there is connected with this subject, a matter of vital importance to our own Government, and to the safety of our possessions upon the Pacific, which compels us in a manner to insist that this right of way shall be maintained substantially as it has been guarantied by the grant in question.

The duty of the Government to protect its own citizens against foreign aggression, I am sure I need not expound to the Senate. All writers on the law of nations enjoin it as a duty; and the reason is a very plain one, not only because of the relations which must exist between the governor and the governed, but it is a principle of public law, as it is of common sense, that the property of the citizen is, to some extent, the property of the Government. It constitutes the respublica—the commonwealth—and thus a Government, in protecting the property of the citizen, is protecting its own property; as in protecting the rights of the citizen, it is protecting its own rights; and this is the sum of what is proposed to be done for the holders of this grant. If their title be good—and I think there will be no question about that with those who will examine it—if they have been induced, as there can be no doubt they have been, to expend large sums of money in order to give effect to that title under the sanction, as well as by the invitation of a foreign Government, we should not allow that Government to crush and to destroy them.

But, sir, I go beyond that. We cannot get anywhere upon the southern continent, or upon the strip of land which connects the two continents, any right of way that will be so purely of a domestic character as this at Tehuantepec. If you look at it, you will find that its Atlantic terminus is in our own domestic basin, the Gulf of Mexico. There is not now a foreign gun mounted in that basin except upon the coast of Mexico; and if I appreciate the spirit of the American people, there never will be a foreign gun mounted in the Gulf of Mexico, unless it be by the coterminous Power, the Republic of Mexico. We have it then, here, comparatively at home. We have access to it from the mouth of the Mississippi, without passing anywhere (except upon the coast of Mexico) within reach of any foreign Power. The mouth of the river Coatzacoalcos, the terminus of the Tehuantepec road, is distant but nine hundred miles from the city of New Orleans, a distance which can be overcome by steamers in three days. It is thus, as it were, almost a part of our own territory, certainly so in regard to proximity.

I come now to look at this question in another point of view. I lay it down, without hesitancy and without fear, that we have a right to a way across Tehuantepec. According to public law, this Government may demand of Mexico a way across Tehuantepec; and Mexico cannot refuse it unless she becomes disloyal to the general compact of nations. What is a right of way? Every one is familiar with that. It pertains to individuals in life as it pertains to nations. I understand that writers upon public law derive it from that primitive state, when the entire earth was common to all men, and passage over it was free to all, according to their varied necessities. Such was the nature of this right before government was formed, or the institution of separate property ordained. By these the right in question, was only limited in its exercise; it was not destroyed; and it revives and resuscitates whenever there is a necessity making the way indispensable. It is illustrated in familiar life every day. If I purchase a piece of land so surrounded by the possessions of him from whom it is derived that I have no way out to mill or to market, I may take it, as a right incident to the acquisition. It is a principle resulting from necessity, and is modified as circumstances may require. A way impracticable in its use is the same thing as no way at all; and such is the exact posture of our present way across the northern continent. We purchased California from Mexico, paid a large equivalent for it, and we have in fact no way across our own continent to get to it. I cannot call that a way which leads through bands of savages, across trackless deserts, and over inaccessible mountains, for some thousands of miles, when there is before us a short and convenient pass in a neighboring territory that may be overcome by artificial roads in a single day's journey.

The principles governing this right are thus treated by Vattel, a work of admitted authority:

"The right of passage is also a remnant of a primitive state of communion, in which the entire earth was common to all mankind, and the passage was everywhere free to each individual, according to his necessities. Nobody can be entirely deprived of this right, but the exercise of it is limited by the introduction of domain and property." * *

"When, therefore, the owner of a territory thinks proper to refuse you admission into it, you must, in order to enter it in spite of him, have some reason more cogent than all his reasons to the contrary. Such is the right of necessity: this authorizes an act on your part, which on other occasions would be unlawful, viz: an infringement of the right of domain, when a real necessity obliges you to enter into the territory of others; for instance, if you cannot otherwise escape from imminent danger, or if you have no other passage for procuring the means of subsistence, or those of satisfying some other indispensable obligation—you may force a passage when it is unjustly refused."

Now, sir, I confidently say, there is an "indispensable obligation" on this Government to secure for itself a practicable and certain way to its connections on the Pacific; and I as confidently say, that at present there is none, without exposure at sea to the armaments of foreign Powers, which dot the whole ocean border through the Antilles and the Caribbean sea; and I further say, whatever respect and forbearance may be due to the dominions of our neighboring Republic, that forbearance may be tested too far: there is a point at which it ceases to be a virtue, and it may rest with her to determine when it shall be passed.

Now, sir, I mean to wage no war in this, with those who say that a railroad can be made across the continent through our own territory. I have no doubt it is in the power of the country to make such a road, but I doubt exceedingly whether it can be used effectively after it has been made. You may make a railroad ten thousand miles long as easily as one ten miles long, if you have the means; but it depends at last upon the climate, and the nature of the physical obstructions you meet, what is to be the use of it after it has been made. Compare a railroad stretched across the northern part of the continent with one at the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, but one hundred and seventy miles in length. We can use the seas with certainty. Steam navigation has proved that; and there is no danger of obstruction from ice either in the Gulf of Mexico or on the Pacific side. But in this Herculean work, which is projected to throw a road between the Mississippi and the Pacific, there can be no security of passage whatsoever. Passing over the depredations of hostile Indians, you are to traverse deserts destitute of either wood or water—both indispensable to motive power. For nearly two thousand miles you are beyond the reach of any resources but such as travel with you; and to end the whole, for nearly half the year the way when opened is obstructed by impassable barriers of ice and snow.

There can be no comparison between the two routes, so far as certainty and security of passage is concerned; and if this railroad across our own continent should be made, the country will find, when done, that there are months in the year when it cannot be used. I say then at once, that comparing any way that can be made across the northern part of this continent with that which can be made at the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, the one furnishes a communication certain and secure, and the other a communication of the utmost uncertainty and insecurity.

I have taken no part in the discussions which have arisen on the bill introduced by the honorable Senator from California [Mr. GWIN] for the construction of this railroad to the Pacific ocean; but the most cursory examination of the bill will show that the whole plan it proposes is crude and immature, not by any means from want of ability in those who project, but from vices inherent in the subject itself; and I understood the honorable Senator to say that he could not refer it to a committee, because former committees had tried in vain to perfect its details.

Here is a work to cost, I suppose, a hundred millions of dollars or more, running for two thousand miles through deserts, amidst hostile Indians, over stony mountains, and yet you cannot have the details of it adjusted, although you expect to make the road. I have not seen the bill that the honorable Senator from Texas [Mr. RUSK] proposes to substitute for it; but I learn that the chief difference between the two is, that one proposes that the road shall be made by a grant of land, and the other by a grant of money as an auxiliary to the land. Whenever this road shall be made—and doubtless it will be at some day after the territory through which it passes is populated—I apprehend it must be done, as all other roads have been, by previous careful survey and exploration. You cannot undertake to make a railroad without knowing where it is to go, and the country through which it is to pass, the grade which it is to be overcome, and the mountains and the rivers which it is to traverse, or whether it can be done at all. Why, it is undertaking to order a railroad to be made by our fiat, whether nature will or will not permit it. I do not mean to assert that this railroad will never be made, for in all human probability it will be; but I doubt much if any man now living will ever pass over it. If you could have an appropriation to-morrow in the form in which it is asked, and supplying all the necessary funds, if I know anything of human affairs, my life upon it the road would not be built in twenty years.

But, I ask, what conflict is there between the two roads? None whatever. The Government embarks no money in this enterprise. In what I propose, the Government will do nothing more than hold Mexico to her public faith. That will insure the making of the road. The work will be in the hands of private enterprise altogether; but when it is done, there will of necessity be conventions between the Governments interested to see that it is held as a common highway.

Sir, it is my purpose to ask the Senate to adopt the resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. They go as far as the committee deemed it necessary or proper to go at the time they were reported. Their purpose is to let the Government of Mexico know, as the deliberate judgment of the Senate, that good faith be preserved on her part in reference to this grant. So far we insist now, and when the time comes, as we may confidently hope it will, when Mexico shall once again enjoy a responsible Government—a Government capable of conducting its affairs, and in a position to be treated with by other Powers, there may at last be no difficulty in adjusting the whole subject. Our relations with Mexico at present are in a very embarrassed condition; not from this alone, but from additional causes; and they must continue to be more and more embarrassed as long as each subject of disagreement and dissension is left unadjusted. I confidently hope, indeed I entertain no doubt, that the Administration which is to come into power, now within a few days, will send to Mexico an able and competent man as Minister; that he will go there under instructions to assure the Government of Mexico that there is no purpose on the part of this Government to oppress or injure them; that all our feelings—the feeling of our whole people, as well as of the Government—are fraternal and kind towards her. All that we ask is, that they will do what any other Government upon earth would have done long since, to allow that way to be opened as a highway of nations; that we will give them aid and encouragement and countenance in doing it; but that we are pledged to hold fast to this grant because of well-founded apprehensions, if it be yielded, the most available and speedy transit between the two oceans which wash our shores, as well as hers, will remain closed to the world.

Should Mexico consider the concessions in this particular grant too liberal on her part, modifications may well be made, based on proper equivalents to the grantees, making the concession more acceptable to her or to her people. But the right of way which that grant concedes, is a sine qua non, and we must hold to it. I should think it would be in the power of a Minister, under proper instructions, to adjust all these difficulties, and once more to restore that harmony and fraternity so important to the welfare of the two countries.

The resolutions under consideration import nothing more than the opinion of the Senate that the Government of the United States is bound to protect the property of its citizens against foreign aggression, in the instance of the holders of this grant; and if Mexico does not, within a reasonable time, make proper reparation in such a way as shall restore to them their just rights, we may be compelled to review our existing relations with her.

This, sir, is no threat of war—Mexico is no fit adversary for such a people as ours. We deplore her weakness, and sympathize in the distresses of her people. We would far rather extend our arm to succor and sustain than to oppress or destroy. But with every feeling of kindness and justice to others, our Government owes a high and stern duty to itself. The weakness of a neighboring Power cannot be admitted as a plea exempting her from the common duty of nations to each other, and to the world. It cannot, and will not be allowed, that our country should be impeded in its great career by the mere imbecility of Mexico. And it remains only to declare, if this transit be considered in the circumstances in which the country is placed, as one indispensable to our welfare, it must be conceded, or it will be taken by strong hand.

THE TEHUANTEPEC GRANT.

SPEECH OF HON. S. W. DOWNS,

OF LOUISIANA,

In the Senate, February 2, 1853.

The Senate having under consideration the following resolutions reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, in reference to the Tehuantepec Grant:

Resolved, (as the judgment of the Senate,) That in the present posture of the question on the grant of a right of way through the territory of Mexico, at the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, conceded by that Republic to one of its citizens, and now the property of citizens of the United States, as the same is presented by the correspondence and documents accompanying the message of the President of the United States of the 27th July, 1852, it is not compatible with the dignity of this Government to prosecute the subject further by negotiation.

2. Should the Government of Mexico propose a renewal of such negotiation, it should be acceded to only upon distinct propositions from Mexico, not inconsistent with the demands made by this Government in reference to said grant.

3. That the Government of the United States stands committed to all its citizens to protect them in their rights, abroad as well as at home, within the sphere of its jurisdiction; and should Mexico, within a reasonable time, fail to reconsider her position concerning said grant, it will then become the duty of this Government to review all existing relations with that Republic, and to adopt such measures as will preserve the honor of the country and the rights of its citizens:

Mr. DOWNS said: Mr. President, I shall not discuss many of the important questions connected with this subject, which were so ably presented yesterday by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. Mason.] It is unnecessary to do so, because he has suggested everything which the occasion required, much better than I could do; and I would not weaken the very able argument which he has made, or dilute it by repeating what he has said. Therefore, in the course which I shall take, I shall assume at once that the various propositions contended for by the honorable Senator must be considered as established; that the Garay grant was a valid one, made by competent authority; that various other acts of the Government of Mexico—that the negotiations entered into—that the whole history of the transaction, which I shall not go into, established this. I shall therefore take for granted all the facts which have been so clearly and so ably presented in the report made by the Committee on Foreign Relations at the last session, and in the speech of the honorable chairman yesterday. I shall offer no argument to the Senate on those points. I shall say very little on another matter connected with this subject, as to the importance and necessity of this communication, and as to the question of how far it may conflict with the proposed Pacific railroad.

Mr. President, in my opinion it is too late to discuss the expediency, the propriety, or the necessity of the Government of the United States taking prompt action on this subject. The period for any such doubts has long since passed. This Government, in the most solemn manner, has taken its position on this subject; and however doubtful it might have been at first (I never had any) I cannot see that there is any room for doubt now. But if anybody more scrupulous than myself might have raised a doubt as to whether it was the duty of the Government to interpose in a matter of this kind, and protect its citizens, the time for doubt has passed. The Government, in the most solemn and formal manner, has interposed, and has said that its duty is to protect its citizens in their rights in this matter; and it would be unbecoming the dignity of the nation; it would weaken our influence abroad; it would be unworthy of the American people, if now, after the Government has taken this position, it should be receded from. The Government's position has been taken, not merely in a casual correspondence of the Secretary of State, but in the most formal manner. Not only that, but it has even gone beyond the ordinary form of diplomatic intercourse. The President of the United States has felt it to be so important and so interesting a subject, that he has departed from the usual course of diplomatic intercourse, and addressed a private letter to the President of Mexico, remonstrating against the course which that Government was then likely to pursue, and warning him of the consequences if it should violate what the Government of the United States considered to be the interests of its citizens.

In a letter from the Secretary of State to Señor Luis de la Rosa, the Mexican Minister at Washington, dated April 30, 1851, after an able and comprehensive review of the whole question, the Secretary, referring to the probable rejection of the treaty by Mexico, (which a letter of the Mexican Minister led him to anticipate,) concludes in the following emphatic terms:

"The President of the United States cannot persuade himself that such a calamity as its rejection by Mexico now impends over the two countries."

Again, in a letter to Mr. La Vega, the successor to Señor La Rosa, of the 15th March, 1852, the Secretary of State says:

"If, however, these hopes should prove to be unfounded, and the convention should not go into effect, this Government will feel itself compelled to take into consideration the measures which its duty to its own citizens may require it to adopt, to protect their rights under a voluntary grant made by Mexico of the transit way across the Isthmus. The Government of the United States can in no event be expected to abandon those rights, and ardently hopes that the Mexican Government will do justice to them in season."

And, finally, in view of the great importance of the occasion, and to avert, if possible, consequences of the magnitude of which to the two countries, whilst this question remains unsettled, none can be blind, the President of the United States addressed himself directly to the President of Mexico by a letter of the 19th of March, 1852, from which the committee quote as follows:

"In addition to the motives I have urged for the speedy adjustment of this matter, I beg leave most earnestly to call the attention of your Excellency to the probable difficulties that may grow up between the two nations, should Mexico break her plighted faith in the grant to Garay. Our citizens, relying upon her good faith, have become interested in that grant; they have advanced large sums of money for the purpose of carrying out its objects; they have surveyed a route for a railroad, and demonstrated the practicability of constructing it; and it is not possible that they should now be deprived of the privileges guarantied by that grant, and sustain the heavy losses that must ensue, without appealing to their own Government for the enforcement of their rights. My anxious desire is to avoid the too probable consequences that must result from such an appeal. We cannot, if we would, be indifferent to it. It is a duty which every Government owes to its own citizens, to protect their rights at home and abroad; and the consequences growing out of the disagreement of the proprietors of the Garay grant and the Government of Mexico are such as no true friend of this country or of Mexico can look upon with indifference."

This, Mr. President, is the position that has been taken in the most solemn manner by the Government of the United States; and if there ever was a time to waver, or to doubt, that time has passed. We have not only the right to interpose, but our Government has pledged itself to interpose in this matter; and we have no option left. It may be urged that Mexico is now weak; that she is in a state of anarchy; that it is hard to proceed against her under such circumstances, and that we ought to be more mild and more moderate to her. There is much in that suggestion, under the peculiar circumstances of Mexico. Perhaps I have as much sympathy for the troubles of that sister Republic as any man can have. I have recently seen the message of the late President of Mexico to the Congress of that Republic, and I consider it a paper of the most melancholy character, and one calculated to excite the sympathy of the lovers of freedom and of mankind everywhere. I have never seen a document of that kind which so deeply and so permanently affected my feelings. It is one of the most affecting documents that I have ever heard of in the annals of any country. He saw his country sinking into anarchy and misfortune; he saw its utterly hopeless condition, and was evidently stimulated by patriotic motives, and anxious to do what he could to save his falling country; but his efforts have turned out to be utterly fruitless. In reading that document, I could not but contrast the prostrate and miserable condition of Mexico with that of the United States. I could not but express the sanguine anticipation that long might it be before the President of the United States should have occasion to send to the Congress of the United States such a message as that.

My feelings, then, towards Mexico, on account of her condition, have much weight with me on this question. I would, therefore, under ordinary circumstances, so far as depends on me, forbear; I would say nothing, I would do nothing to embarrass her in her present condition; and I would if I could wait until more prosperous circumstances should attend her; but I consider that we have no option in this matter. The dispute did not commence lately. If so, perhaps I should be willing to postpone it until the next Administration comes into power; but it was commenced before the present disasters of Mexico arose; and it was absolutely necessary, in my opinion, that the Government of the United States should take the position which it did take at the time; and that position cannot now be abandoned without injury to our character and to our country. We know very well how carefully the Mexicans watch our conduct, how ready they are to take advantage of everything like wavering and indecision on our part, and we ought to be sensible of the great injustice and dishonor which has been imposed upon us by the course which she has taken heretofore. If now, under the promptings of any generous motives, we should forbear to act, and to act as becomes our dignity and honor, Mexico will very probably conclude that she is at liberty to do as she pleases in this matter, without any danger of interference on our part. I consider, therefore, that no option is left us. We must act, and we must act at this time. Our honor is invaded. Let us have sympathy and good will for Mexico, but when our honor is involved we have no option; we must first protect that, and then we may act under the dictates of humanity towards Mexico.

I would ask gentlemen to look for a moment at the aspect of this question. I feel rather astonished that the people of the United States have borne with the conduct of Mexico for such a length of time. What is the position of this question? This grant was considered by Mexico when we negotiated with her for the treaty of peace in 1847, as so well established that she absolutely refused to enter into negotiations with us on the subject because the grant had been ceded to an English company. The rights of that company are now vested in American citizens. Mexico has twice entered into treaty stipulations recognizing the validity of the grant. By special orders and instructions and passports, she has permitted our engineers and officers to go there and survey the route. Yet, suddenly, under circumstances which the Senator from Virginia so graphically and so ably described yesterday, by a mere political turn of the wheel, she took it into her head that the grant must be abrogated, and that the treaty must not be concluded. The Mexican Congress passed an act abrogating the grant. Not only was that done, but the Mexican Government drove from the country the engineers and officers of the company sent there by her special permission.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask the honorable Senator a question. He speaks of the assignment of the grant to American citizens being ratified or acknowledged by treaties. I want to inquire of him if those treaties have been ratified by the different branches of the Mexican Government?

Mr. DOWNS. No, sir; but one of them has been ratified by the American Senate.

Mr. HALE. And rejected by the Mexican authorities.

Mr. DOWNS. Rejected or not acted upon. I give the President and Secretary of State great credit for their course in this transaction, so far as they have gone, but, in my opinion, they might and ought to have gone a step further. When this ignominy was imposed upon our citizens of sending off officers and engineers who had been invited to go there—and one of them was an officer of the United States of high rank—I think it was an indignity which the Government ought to have resented, and not to have permitted quietly to pass by. Then was a proper time to vindicate the honor, and to show the strength of this country. If, instead of pocketing the insult, the President of the United States had ordered one or two of our vessels-of-war, that are not doing much in the Gulf of Mexico, to the mouth of the Coatzakalcos, and had suggested to the company to send their engineers there and put them to work, and that the Government would protect them, they would have gone to work on the surveys, they would have finished them, and the road would have been in progress, and perhaps half completed by this time; and there would have been not only no war with Mexico, but no cause of war. But that is not all.

What has Mexico been doing? After this grant had been thus solemnly made, thus sanctioned in so many different decrees of the Government, and by treaties entered into by this country—after the Senate had sanctioned the treaty of 1851, and it was only waiting the ratification of the Mexican Government, what did Mexico do? Considering all her obligations, considering her faith pledged to the United States as nothing, she held up this grant, huckstering it all over the world to everybody, to see what price she could get for it. If she is allowed to do that, if the United States can stand by tamely and allow that to be done, she would be very apt next month or next year to set up California for sale, and turn out my friends [Messrs. WELLER and GWIN] who so ably represent that State. Or, on the same principle, Spain might set up a right to sell Florida, or France to sell Louisiana; for, in my opinion, the obligations by which those Territories were ceded are scarcely less binding than the obligations which the Mexican Government entered into in making this grant. How, then, can we pause; how can we hesitate in regard to the policy which we should pursue? We cannot pause; we cannot hesitate, unless we say to the world that we will submit to anything, to any indignity that may be imposed upon us; that we are so fond of peace that we will permit everybody to insult us.

Mr. President, this is an appropriate subject for practical action, and not for discussion as a mere abstraction, and I am glad to have such a question upon which to express my views. I prefer it to an abstraction. Abstractions may do well enough for others, but I think the course of policy of our country is better illustrated by acts than by words. And now, when we have a question before us which requires it, I think it is a proper occasion for decided action, and that it will have more effect than any resolutions which we might pass, which are not so practical as these which are before us. I am not in favor of aggressive or violent measures towards any nation. I would not stimulate the military feeling of the people of the United States or their disposition to acquire territory. I think both are perhaps already too great; but I feel that it is our duty to protect our honor and preserve our proper position among the nations of the earth, and show that on all proper occasions our strength and power will be exercised, and that too in such a way as to make it perfectly understood by the whole world; and I think this is a proper occasion for that purpose. Let it not be said that the measures proposed by the resolution are extraordinary, or that there would be anything extraordinary in resolutions, even stronger than these. Not at all. It is not the first time in the history of this country, or of other countries, that a Government has assumed a right to and even taken possession of a territory, and negotiated afterwards. There are many instances of such a course in history. Why, sir, in my own State, for seven years after the cession of Louisiana, from 1803 to 1810, a large portion of the present State of Louisiana remained in the possession of the Spanish Government and under the Spanish authority. In 1810, it was taken possession of by our Government before the treaty of 1819, and it was in our possession for nine years, and the title was settled by the negotiation in 1819 at last. Did it lead to war? No; it produced no war. We had the right, we seized on the territory, and then negotiated for it afterwards, and it caused no war.

Again: gentlemen must not suppose that every foot we place upon foreign territory is an encroachment, and is a cause for war. We have not been so particular heretofore in matters of this sort. Long ago, before we acquired Florida, you know, and the country knows, General Jackson marched an army into Florida, and he actually seized and executed some of the incendiaries who had been exciting Indian hostilities against us, and his course was fully vindicated by the Administration then in power. It would, then, be no novel thing in the history of our country, or of other countries, if, when such an indignity had been imposed upon us by the Mexican Government, we had vindicated our rights, and sent such a force into that territory as was necessary to protect the surveyors and let them go on with the work. It would have led to no war. On the contrary, it would probably have tended to an adjustment of the question in a manner satisfactory to all the parties long ago. So far from energetic measures promoting a war, or not being our true policy, they are often the very best means of preventing war. We sometimes get into wars by hesitating and doubting too much. I believe, sir, in all probability the Mexican war itself would never have taken place, if the Mexicans had been convinced from the first that we would insist on our rights, that we would not hesitate and doubt. But we had claims against them for spoliations upon our citizens; we negotiated treaties of indemnity; there were difficulties in the execution of them; we temporized with the Mexicans; we gave them time; we showed them almost every indulgence. Then we had a dispute with them about the boundaries of Texas. They claimed land east of the Rio Grande, and we were careful not to offend them in that until they came to the conclusion that they could persuade or induce us to do almost anything, and finally they were led to acts which resulted in war. That was forced upon us. I believe there would have been no Mexican war at all if the moment they had failed to fulfill the indemnity stipulated for, we had exacted it at the cannon's mouth, if necessary. Or, when the question was started about the boundary on the Rio Grande, if, instead of negotiating and sending ministers about it, we had sent an army to the Rio Grande, as at last we had to send General Taylor, to arrest their steps, and told them that there they should remain, we would not have had the Mexican war. If those prompt measures had been taken, we should have avoided all that difficulty.

So now, if we act peremptorily in this matter—if we show to the world that we will protect our citizens and vindicate our honor, there will be no war. That will be the best way to avoid war. But if we temporize, and vacillate, and express doubt and hesitation in our action, that very consequence will take place, and we shall go on to quarrel more and more. One change in the Mexican Government has produced the difficulty which now exists between us. When another comes into power, particularly if that arch-enemy of the Union, Santa Anna—as probably he will be—be placed at the head of affairs, we see at once he will think that if this Government tolerated the course pursued by his feeble predecessor, he, with his new power and ability, can take much greater liberty; and, perhaps, being a little vexed at the result of the last war, he will be willing to promote a contest with us; and he will very likely do it, if we temporize, and forbear, and hesitate. Let us lay down the rule, then, to say what our rights are, and that we shall insist on them. If we do so, we shall not be subjected to that difficulty.

Mr. President, I think the policy of our Government towards many of the South American Republics, and particularly towards Mexico, has been a great mistake from the beginning, and I wish to see it changed. At first it was very natural, and I cast no censure on any one for that policy. Those States had revolted from the mother countries, and were struggling to be successful. We wished to lend them a helping hand. It was natural, therefore, that we should treat them with the utmost leniency; that we should not be harsh with, or exact too much from them. But when they established their Republics, when they commenced their career in the world as independent nations, there was no necessity for our pursuing so indulgent a policy. We ought then to have treated them as we did other nations, not exacting anything wrong from them, but insisting on their performing what was due to us. If we had done so, should we have been subjected to the difficulties to which we have been subjected? I think not. What has been the history of our intercourse with Mexico? One continual series of aggressions on her part, and of complaints and treaties and negotiations on ours. During the whole period since she acquired her independence, there has scarcely been a time, either before the war or since, when an American vessel or an American citizen could go into a port of Mexico with any guarantee for the safety of property or even of person. Even your consuls have been sent to jail and imprisoned, and been insulted, and been subjected to all kinds of ignominies; and when the facts have been reported to our Government, instead of demanding that peremptory redress which we should have demanded, and which other nations do demand, the reply was given to the sufferers, as in a case which occurred lately, that we would negotiate with the Mexican Government on the subject. That is not the right policy. There are some nations, in controversies with which the only language that you can speak is cannon and musketry. We should not have had to use so much of that, perhaps none at all, with Mexico if we had acted right in the beginning.

I am told—though I do not know whether it is a fact—that very often when these outrages were committed upon our vessels and citizens, the mere accidental arrival in a Mexican port of an American vessel-of-war, immediately produced redress without any exercise of force, or any very peremptory demands; and if it had been generally understood that our cruisers, under all reasonable circumstances, had been instructed to redress such grievances, our citizens and vessels would not have experienced such a continual series of insults. I do not wish unnecessarily to act rigorously towards Mexico, or towards any other country; but I do wish such a policy to be adopted by this Government, that our citizens, when they go into Vera Cruz, Acapulco, or any other port, may feel that, as American citizens, their property and persons are to be protected. I believe that has not been the case heretofore; and I believe it will not be the case while the tame and vacillating course that has been pursued, is persisted in. I wish to see the American character more respected abroad than it has been. I do not know how it happens that a people so sensible of their honor, personal and national too, submit so tamely, and so much more so than other nations do, to insults offered to the persons, as well as the property of our citizens elsewhere. I would wish to see that Roman feeling, which existed under the ancient Republic, cherished by our people. I would wish that the American citizen should be protected, not by cannon, or vessels-of-war, or by our minister or consul. I wish to see this Government conducted in such a way—and if it were conducted as, in my opinion, it would be proper to conduct it, such a state of things would exist—that the only passport an American citizen would require anywhere, would be that only passport which the Roman citizen required—"I am a Roman citizen." "I am an American citizen." It is not so now; and it never will be so while this tame, vacillating, and uncertain, and not peaceful, but dangerous policy is pursued, for it will lead to more wars and squabbles than an energetic course would do.

I trust then, Mr. President, that the resolutions will be adopted. While, under different circumstances, I should perhaps wish to have them amended, so as to make them more energetic, yet considering that they declare the intention of the Government to vindicate its honor and protect the rights of its citizens, and considering, too, that it is perhaps better not to commit ourselves too far on the subject when a new Administration is coming in, but to leave the matter open to it, and considering, further, the distracted situation of Mexico at this time, I am willing to vote for them as they are. But, under different circumstances, if the Administration now in power was to continue long, and I thought there was any uncertainty about our future course, I should wish to make them stronger.

I stated, in the commencement of my remarks, that I would not discuss the definitive title, or the importance of this road to the interests of the United States. I shall not do so to any extent; but there are some considerations which I wish to offer to the Senate with regard to the importance of the road. The advantages of it can scarcely be overrated, or too much considered. It is important to us and to the world, in two points of view. It is not simply desirable as a means of communication between one part of this country and another. As such, it would be very valuable and desirable; but it has a broader and more important sphere of influence than that. It is to be a means of communication for the world. Admit, then, for the sake of the argument, that we are to have a railroad within our own territory,—I have no objection to that, as I shall presently show,—it will not interfere at all with this road. I shall show that this will be a route not only for the United States, but for the whole world. There are other possessions and interests besides ours upon the Pacific, and there is other commerce to be accommodated, and there is other business to be done there besides that of our own.

It is, then, of great importance to the world to have this route opened so as to have the most practicable, and easy, and speedy communication between the two oceans at a point near the middle of the continent. Independent of any advantage to our commerce, it is a matter of great importance to the whole world. The route is at a point near the center of the American continent, where the goods which are transported from one side to the other can be easily taken to every important commercial port. It will be the great thoroughfare of the word. I shall not enter into a comparison of this route with the Panama route, or the Nicaraguan route, or any other. I believe this is decidedly better than any other route. Long ago, as many as three years ago, an application was made to the Government of the United States to favor the Panama route. I then offered very fully my opinion, and demonstrated, as I thought, very satisfactorily, that this was a more proper route than the Panama, and nothing has been shown since that time to prove that my opinion was not well founded. It has a better climate, is nearer to our possessions, and is easier reached from all our Pacific ports; and, as was alleged by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] it is important to us because it leads directly to the great Mediterranean of America, in which, as he very properly observed, no nation has a right to plant a single gun except Mexico and the United States. It is, then, of immense advantage to us. This great inland sea is of great importance, and will continue to be more and more important as we become advanced in civilization. Sir, look at the map, and see the advantage we possess. I have it laid down here in a line. Take the Cape of Florida, Cuba, and Yucatan, and you will find this is not only an internal sea within three days' sail from any part of it to the mouth of the Mississippi river, which is in itself a Mediterranean, but we have this immense sea so nearly shut up by islands already, by the Cape of Florida, Cuba, and Yucatan, that a few vessels stationed in favorable positions would make the whole as much an island sea as it could possibly be.

Mr. President, it is a matter of some consequence to have this great line of commerce of the world established now, where in future the riches of the Indies are to pass, instead of by the lines of travel heretofore used, and where our own local interests are so deeply involved, especially as it relates to the ports of New Orleans and Pensacola. It is of immense importance to have the route established now, because if the line of trade once becomes established in another direction, it will be much more difficult to change it than to guide it now. Independently of all private or local advantages, this is a great national question, and is of national importance. It has been discussed for years. It is not one of those ephemeral schemes which produce an excitement for a day, and then are passed over forever. Before we made our treaty with Mexico, its importance was perceived. Before we had our possessions upon the Pacific, its importance was well judged of by our Government. Measures have been taken to protect our rights there, and nothing should now induce us to abate our claim, or prevent our exercising our rights. Certainly the inducement is greater now to insist upon them. And I will ask, Mr. President, if there is not something taking place in that country which will make it still more important to our interests that we do this? Are we not likely to have struggles and difficulties in regard to Central America? Are we not to have a contest in regard to the subject of colonization on that coast, contrary to treaty stipulations, as I think? I shall not go into the discussion of that subject now; it is not necessary to do so. But there is a pending question; there is a question relating to all that part of the Isthmus through which the other route passes. Difficulties and disputes may arise, and I wish to keep this route. I do not know that there is any attempt at colonization, or the establishment of positions in the Gulf of Mexico proper; but I wish to avoid any question which may arise hereafter. But if we temporize, if we forbear, and permit ourselves to be insulted, how do you know but that to-morrow, or the next month, or a week after you adjourn, you may see a proclamation of the British Government, announcing that they have established a British colony upon the Gulf of Mexico, or upon the other side of the continent, and near Tehuantepec? I do not see why they should not do it, if we do not vindicate our rights, and say that this position is important, not for ourselves alone but for the whole world, and it shall be kept in such a condition that it cannot be converted to any hostile purposes. Without going into the argument as I might upon this point, I think these considerations are sufficient to show the advantage of this route in the particulars to which I have referred.

But again: I cannot see any reason in the world—and I hope such an idea will not be taken up by anybody—why the pressing of the Tehuantepec route should be considered hostile to the Pacific railroad. I certainly have no such feelings. I do not think they are entertained by any one. I feel, and perhaps my constituents feel, as great an interest in that road as anybody else; because, in all probability, an important branch of it will pass through my State. I will, therefore, go as far as any member for that road, and will devote my exertions to carry that bill through as speedily as possible. But still I cannot be insensible to the fact that there are great difficulties in the way. It is best that we should not shut our eyes to these difficulties. I would be willing to do as much as any man to surmount them, but it is so stupendous a work that it will take years to complete it. If you put the work in motion, and commence operations upon it, and if they go on most prosperously and have no drawback whatever, I suppose no member now here will say that a railroad car will run from the banks of the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean in California in less than ten years. It would be a very favorable anticipation to suppose such a thing. Now, ten years in the national affairs of the United States, particularly when you consider what has been done in the last four or five years, is a period of time which may be productive of results of almost an age.

Shall we submit, then, to the inconveniences of the long voyages, the sickness, and troubles, and exposure incident to them, that would be necessary before we could have the Pacific railroad completed? I think not. I think even when that work is completed it will not dispense with the Tehuantepec route. It will still be a great thoroughfare of commerce, and, in some degree, of passengers also. I know—I am as conscious as any man—of the advantages of railroads. I am conscious of the great advantages which they have in expedition, and in the carrying of light freight; but I am also conscious—and I think I am right—that for long distances, and for heavy productions and merchandise, a water communication will compete with them. In the great line of communication, then, where the heavy commerce of the world is carried on, I take it for granted—and I think history will show I am right—that when by one route we have a railroad communication of some two thousand miles, and by another water communication, a large portion of the heavy commerce will be transported by the latter. I take it for granted that provisions, flour, tobacco, pork, and other heavy articles, would never, at this day, if you had a railroad established from New York to San Francisco, be sent over it. We find that on shorter routes they are sent by water communication in preference to the railroad, and we know how distance increases the difficulty.

In regard to this route interfering with the proposed Pacific railroad, I would further remark, that it is a very general observation, when a railroad is proposed to be constructed in the United States, that we think it is doubtful whether the business of the country is sufficient to justify it. But let it go into operation, and in a little while we find the business of the country increases, and another is established, running in a similar direction, and perhaps another, and all are employed. The establishment of a railroad gives an impulse to the trade which is carried on over it. Be not afraid, then, that if you establish this Tehuantepec route, you will have no use for the Pacific railroad. Believe me when I tell you, that, with California going on so rapidly as she is, and the trade with the East and the islands of the Pacific increasing, when this new route for the commerce of the world is fully in operation, you will not only find use for it, but for your railroad to the Pacific, and other routes which may be established.

I think, then, these resolutions ought to pass. They certainly are as mild as any gentleman can wish. I hope there will be no suggestion from any quarter to abate anything from them, because I think that could not be done without injury to our interests. We have taken the position now that it is our duty to interpose in this matter to protect the rights of our citizens. We have said to the whole world that this is an important route, that vast interests are involved in it; and we have even suggested, in our discussions among ourselves, that it is important to our national defenses. If, after all this, we abate anything from them, I think the consequences will be injurious. Hence it is that I have urged that these resolutions should be taken up and passed at this session. I do not expect any rash or precipitate action of the Government. I do not expect that by the passage of the resolutions anything harsh or injurious will be done to Mexico; but I wish her to understand that we will vindicate our rights in this matter. I wish her to know that we distinctly understand our relations to her, and will protect the rights of our citizens. I do not pretend to say what particular measures ought to be adopted. I am perfectly willing to leave that to the Administration which is coming in; but I do think, before this Congress, in which this question originated, closes, it is proper that the Senate of the United States should proclaim to Mexico and to the world that they will sustain the President in the course which he takes, and will never submit that these insults, this offensive disregard of the rights of our citizens, shall go unpunished or be acquiesced in.

THE TEHUANTEPEC GRANT.

SPEECH OF HON. W. H. SEWARD,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE SENATE, February 8, 1853,

On the Resolutions reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, in regard to the Tehuantepec Grant.

Mr. SEWARD said: Mr. President, history will elucidate this subject, if we can adjust the lens so as to concentrate its rays. The great occupation of the nations of western Europe, from the beginning of the fifteenth century to near the close of the eighteenth century, was colonization and the establishment of empire on the American continent. The year 1775 witnessed the opening of the first act in the great drama of the decolonization of this continent, the end of which is not yet. By the treaties of 1783, to which not only the revolting and belligerent colonies of Great Britain and Great Britain herself were parties, but also France and Spain, Great Britain, who was the most able to keep her American possessions, resigned thirteen of her principal colonies on this continent, not so much because of her weakness, as because of their own already maturing strength, and the aid which they derived from the intervention of France.

Leaving out of view some sparse and unimportant settlements of Russia, the North American continent was now divided between Great Britain, which retained all the regions that laid between the St. Lawrence and the lakes and the north pole; the United States, which reached southwardly to the borders of Louisiana and Florida, and indefinitely westward towards the Pacific; and Spain which retained the remainder, consisting of the provinces or colonies of the Floridas, Louisiana, and New Spain, now called Mexico. The United States were then governed by fixed, domestic, constitutional, representative systems and habits of government. They had long been in the enjoyment of them, although not of political independence; and the government they thus enjoyed, rested upon the foundations of popular education, freedom of the press, toleration of conscience, and above all upon the sacredness of personal rights, secured by common law and statutory safeguards borrowed from England, of the rights of trial by jury, and habeas corpus.

On the other hand, the Spanish provinces had been governed from the first by a foreign despotic Power. The subjects of those provinces were ignorant of any system or principle of representative legislation, or of freedom of the press, or of toleration of religion, or of guarantees of personal liberty. The United States had no elements of wealth except a soil of varied fertility, the more common and useful minerals, and access on one side to the sea. The Spanish provinces, on the other hand, had a more prolific soil in a climate of surpassing healthfulness and beauty, with rich mines of the precious metals which Providence has so sparingly distributed, and access to two oceans. The United States were practically a homogeneous people, consisting of homogeneous States. The Spanish provinces had a population, three fourths of which were native Indians, one eighth Creoles, and only the remaining one eighth Europeans.

The experiment of independence and self-government in the United States was completely successful; and with it came immediately a rapid progress in national wealth and prosperity, attended by an increase in the advance of population unknown in the experience of mankind; a tide formed of natural increase and perpetually swelled by European immigration. On the other hand, the provinces of Spain remained nearly stationary. They caught from the United States the passion for liberty, without, however, obtaining the elements by which it could be preserved. They proposed to secure for themselves the institutions of civil liberty; but they borrowed the form only, while the spirit which gave it life refused to attend it.

These were the relations, and these the conditions of the United States and of Spanish North America at the commencement of this century. This century has thus far exhibited two political processes, continually going on upon this continent. The first, that of general decolonization; and the second, that of a decay of Spanish American power, and the aggrandizement of the United States of America. Spain ceded Louisiana to France in 1800, and in 1803 France conveyed it to the United States. Apprehensions were felt at that early day in New Spain that the United States might advance so as to encroach upon that territory; and those apprehensions were fearfully confirmed when the United States, having first taken possession of portions of the provinces of Florida, obtained, in 1819, a relinquishment of them by Spain. Texas was for a time uninhabited, and seemed to promise that it would remain a barrier for New Spain, or Mexico, against the United States. Becoming rapidly peopled, nevertheless, Texas asserted its independence, and then the hopes of Mexico for its own security and safety rested upon the chance that Texas might remain an independent Power, or put itself under the sovereignty of some European State, which would prevent its annexation to the United States. But these expectations signally failed; and in 1845, Texas came into the United States with possessions, then understood by most of us, to reach only to the river Nueces. The war with Mexico which grew chiefly out of that annexation, and out of the attending border question, resulted, as we all know, in the direct dismemberment of Mexico, and the annexation to the United States of what remained to Mexico of the State of Texas, together with the States of New Mexico and Upper California, by which the United States advanced to the bank of the Rio Grande, and across the continent to the shores of the Pacific ocean.

We have thus seen the action of one great American idea upon Mexico; that was the idea of national aggrandizement. But at the same time, another great American idea was operating indirectly for the embarrassment of Mexico, and that was the idea of civil liberty, guarantied by institutions of federal republican government. The United States from the first, or from an early day, determined that there should be no European colonial power remaining on this continent which they could prevent or remove, and, therefore, they fostered a spirit of revolt in Mexico; and when Mexico, in her revolution, or after her revolution of 1821, arrived at the point where she must definitely choose her form of government, the United States recommended to her, with success, the principles of federal republicanism, which were adopted. The short-lived Empire of Iturbide was abolished; and in 1824, Mexico adopted a Constitution, which, in its most important characteristics, is identical with our own. During the twenty-nine years which have since elapsed, Mexico has had no repose. She has been rent often and in every part by the struggle between the North American principle of federalism, and its antagonist, the European principle of centralism. The people will bear no government but a federal one. Some wise men in Mexico have continually maintained that no other government than a central one can be upheld there. The army has decided the contests as bribery or caprice has swayed its chiefs. The history of Mexico since 1824 is only a history of the contest between these organic principles. The central principle has partially prevailed, for periods amounting in the aggregate to eleven years; while the federal republican principle, and the constitution of 1824, has prevailed during the remaining nineteen years. The war between the United States and Mexico ended, as you remember, with the treaty of peace, commonly called the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

I invite now the attention of the Senate to two provisions contained in that treaty. In the fifth article is the following provision:

"The boundary line established by this article shall be religiously respected by each of the two Republics; and no change shall ever be made therein, except by the express and free consent of both nations, lawfully given by the General Government of each, in conformity with its own Constitution."

The twenty-first is in the following words, to wit:

"If unhappily any disagreement should hereafter arise between the Governments of the two Republics, whether with respect to the interpretation of any stipulation in this treaty, or with respect to any other particular concerning the political or commercial relations of the two nations, the said Governments, in the name of those nations, do promise to each other that they will endeavor, in the most sincere and earnest manner, to settle the differences so arising, and to preserve the state of peace and friendship in which the two countries are now placing themselves; using, for this end, mutual representations and pacific negotiations. And if, by these means, they should not be enabled to come to an agreement, a resort shall not, on this account, be had to reprisals, aggression, or hostility of any kind, by the one Republic against the other, until the Government of that which deems itself aggrieved shall have maturely considered, in the spirit of peace and good neighborship, whether it would not be better that such difference should be settled by the arbitration of commissioners appointed on each side, or by that of a friendly nation. And should such course be proposed by either party, it shall be acceded to by the other, unless deemed by it altogether incompatible with the nature of the difference, or the circumstances of the case."
